We shall never become angels. Yet we may, so great is God's goodness to men, attain a higher honor and glory than they possess. Though now we are a "little lower" than they, yet hereafter those of us who, by being made members of Christ, the second Adam, have become children of God and heirs of the incorruptible inheritance shall be in Him raised to the high position of judges of those other creatures of His hand. "The saints" shall judge not only the world, but also angels.—Selected.

A Visit to Joppa.

Our large ship of the Austrian-Lloyd line, the "Jupiter," anchored in a rough sea about a mile from Joppa. Eighteen passengers were lifted, or rather dashed, into a life boat, keeping time with the white-crested billows. Six stout, swarthy Arabs, each clothed in a loose sack leaving arms and legs bare, heedless of the perils and of our sea-sickness pulled on their strong oars, while the big waves rocked our little boat like an eggshell. With jocund song and importunate demands for "backsheesh," they kept our thoughts from the dangers that surrounded us. A ledge of low, jagged rocks lay betwixt us and the shore, and a passage had to be effected through a narrow entrance, fourteen feet in width. Waves dashed fearfully over the rocks, but our Arab boatmen with ease and skill carried us to land. No harbor, nor dock, nor quay, nor stairway, nor landing place greeted us. The shore was covered with a motley mixture of people, jabbering, screaming, pushing, and offering wares and assistance. Being pulled ashore, we made our way through narrow, winding, filthy streets, amid offensive odors and sights, jostling against heavily laden camels and donkeys, until we reached our hotel. No carriage, no hansom, no omnibus, no wagon, no dray, was seen in the town, and the first experience of the Holy Land was not favorable to poetry or sentiment.

Joppa is one of the oldest towns in the world, and remains, probably, the same in aspect and site as when it received, as the sea-gate of Jerusalem, the timber sent down from Tyre by Hiram to David for the construction of palace and temple; or when Jonah, in rebellious disobedience, took shipping to evade the mission to Nineveh; or when Peter received the vision of the net let down from heaven; or when the same apostle raised Dorcas, full of alms-deeds from death, or when visited by Pompey or the Crusaders. The town is built on a cape, and the houses rise upon one another to a considerable height.

The traditional house of "one Simon a tanner," was visited. One of its rooms is used as a mosque, and from its flat roof a fine view of sea and country is obtained. I strolled into the market-place, and found it sale-day for donkeys and camels. Some of them would have answered the description of one of the horses mentioned in the "swap," in "Georgia Scenes." Such a collection of poor, half-starved animals I hope never to see again. While the men were lazy and filthy, fit food for plague and pestilence, the fruit would have tempted an anchorite. Such piles of dates, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, radishes, egg-plants, plums, onions, melons! Around Joppa are luxuriant orchards of lemons and oranges. Taking two of my female fellow travelers, I received admission into an orchard on payment of a small gratuity. About twenty acres were covered with verdant trees, whose boughs bent under the abundance of the rich golden fruit. We stood on the ground and plucked and ate until we were satisfied. No oranges, for juiciness and flavor, are comparable to those which grow in the neighborhood of Joppa.

A girl's mission-school, in a large and new building, erected chiefly through the active exertions of the devoted teacher, Miss Arnott, a niece of the celebrated Dr. Arnott, was visited by our party. The school had about sixty pupils, who sang in Arabic and in English, "Jesus loves me, that I know." School and visitors sang together, "Shall we gather at the river?" and these old familiar sunday school hymns, in a far-away land, reminded us of our own schools, and we shed grateful tears.

At night the jackals, the same as Samson's foxes, barked and howled vigorously in the enclosure of the hotel, indicating their hunger and very inhospitable desire for American food. These animals are not dangerous, except when impelled by long unappeased hunger, and then they are not courageous. They dwell mainly in caves, and are fond of graveyards.

Tabitha, or Dorcas, full of good works lived at Joppa, and the miracle of restoring her to life caused many of her fellow-townsmen to believe on the Lord. By a significant object-lesson it was there revealed to Peter that the middle wall of partition was broken down, and that the name of Jesus was the only name given under heaven for the salvation of Jew and Gentile. No more blessed exposition of Christianity for us "outside barbarians" was ever made than this "vision of tolerance."—J. L. M. Curry, LL. D., in S. S. Times.

There is only one way of keeping the commandment; for we do not properly keep it, unless both the thing done, the manner of doing it and all the circumstances, are right.—John Wesley.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.

Letter from Brother Colegrove.

I sit down to do what I feel unwilling longer to defer—send you something of much that is in my mind. The RESTITUTION of June 6 contains much interesting matter, especially relative to the blessed land, that is, Palestine. How much I would love to go there, and write home a letter every week! How I would love to go to Jerusalem, and drink into my eyes and through my eyes into my consciousness, the scene of all that hallowed region! See where Jesus walked and talked, lodged and rested, toiled and suffered! One might even drop a hook into the sea, where Peter fished, and catch a lineal descendant of the very fish the disciples caught, and whereof our Lord himself did eat. But this visit may not be, at least until that better day at hand, when the saints shall journey with delight in the Lord's company, he having come back to take his rightful possession.

I have a whole chapter to write on Gethsemane when I get time. I should think it might be a dozen or fifteen years since I read the very article you copy from Joseph A. Seiss, about the manner of the Advent, and the removal of the saints. I believed it, and I believe it yet. And I believe all God's Word concerning the future glory of Israel, and it is delightful to read concerning the earliest beginnings of the grand development of prophecy, tending toward the reunfolding of that bountiful land, bountiful in prophecy and promise, and bountiful in resources, as well as in all historical vicissitudes and transactions full of tragedy and pathos.

If we only live a few years, what may we not behold! True, if so very happy as to be made immortal without dying, it will be glory! glory! And who knows but this may happen any day? To some, sufferings may be in reserve, whereby they may glorify God. But one thing is clear: I believe we are coming to the focal place of grand converging lines. The arrow-points of prophecy are meeting. The pregnant ages approach a parturition hour. If pangs begin in the church, a deliverance is coming, too. That which is to be born may be quickly born, and that which is born will not, that I know of, suffer the parturient anguish itself. This is something, it may be, worth looking at. But I fear that a heedless church will suffer—a church in which the very denominational organs have not one word to say of the imminent advent of the ascended Son, nor even of the on-coming crisis of the ages.

True, all Christians suffer; even the first fruit itself cannot escape; but I suppose it will escape that hour of temptation which shall try the myriads of the oikoumene, or habitable earth. Some suffer more than others, and if we have not a quality of endurance, an enduring power of faith, a kind of toughness which cares not much for buffetings, why, then pain seems hard to bear. Some are sensitive to pain, or sensitive to trial, which exacerbates pain. Especially is pain the keener without instant submission. This opens a wide field, but I must stop square short now.

I desire to introduce a quotation from a recent letter of my friend, Mr. Russell, of Canada. He says:

"We had the Rev. W. H. Poole of Toronto, last week, lecturing on Anglo-Israel, Jacob's Pillow, and the Great Pyramid. These lectures were intensely interesting. Mr. Poole is a powerfully built man, possessing an excellent voice, with great capacity of utterance. He is a whole-souled Christian of rare ability. He says Colonel Howard Vyse spent $250,000 examining the Jeezeh Pyramid, in his lecture on the Great Pyramid, he directed the attention of the audience to the Eastern question, and the symbolisms at the upper end of the Grand Gallery. He said the Hegira was in 622 A. D., to which add 1209, and we have 1831—1882. The prince Imperial comes of age—25 years—in 1881. The Turkish bonds come due in 1880. The French Septennial ends Sep. 20, 1880, the Pyramid says 1881. To 1882 add 420 B. C., the time of the renewal of the sacrifices by Nehemiah, and we have the 2300 days of Daniel. The six thousandth year of our worlds history ends in 1881. [According to a much-credited chronology.—C.] The present parliament of the house of Israel will come to its natural close in 1881. The great transit of Venus will occur in 1881. Mr. Poole said that it was the opinion of some that the termination of the Grand Gallery symbolized the close of this dispensation and the coming of Christ. He did not express an opinion of his own as to that, but thought that Turkey would be divided, and that Egypt and Palestine were about to fall to the British.

"I am watching with deep interest the progress of the crisis in France. Is it not a little remarkable that it should occur at the present time, when Europe is distressed with perplexity? It seems to me we are approaching the time of Jacob's trouble. The Hon. David Mills, Minister of Interior, has just lent me diagrams and specifications of the "Euphrates Valley Rail Road. The report was published at the request of Her Majesty. Mr. Poole said the royal family were taking deep interest in the Israelitish question. This he said to me privately. I think we are rapidly approaching some great and wonderful changes. The Lord is our Helper, and the hope of the children of Israel."

The above is deeply interesting, and with nearly every thing in it I quite heartily coincide—in faith or in sympathy.

I am well aware that some points in what might be termed Great Pyramid chronology do not seem to sustain the system of Usher, but I am waiting further developments on this question, without wishing to express myself positively either way. Piazzi Smyth evidently thinks our more commonly accepted chronology defective as a whole. I should be exceedingly sorry if any weak, or even not very weak Christians should be perplexed on this account. Let us have unbounded faith in God. He will make all plain in good time.

I much, very much regret the reprint of an error (previously corrected in the RESTITUTION and A. C. Times,) which is found in the latter half of the fiftieth page of the new pamphlet on the Great Pyramid. I have only to repeat that the north air passage does NOT enter the Grand Gallery. When a writer lives half a thousand or more miles away from the place of publication, perhaps it is not altogether strange that an error should get in. I believe this is the only uncorrected mistake of any particular consequence in the pamphlet.

I will close by giving part of a letter from J. Cockburn Muir, the author of a very elaborate and excellent diagram of the Great Pyramid. He writes from Victoria Chambers, Westminster, under date of May 15:

"Your very interesting letter is received this day. The troubles now coming on the nations are the beginning, only, of the sorrow and tribulations which are to precede the second advent of our blessed Lord. It is not what Mr. Hine says, but what Daniel and the Apocalyptic John say, that guides us as to the times and seasons, aided by the measures of the Great Pyramid. The "Abomination of Desolation," that is, Islam, represented by the Turkish power, standing in the "holy place," Jerusalem, (El Kudseh, the holy place, was its name from the very earliest times,) was to last 1260 years. The Mohammedan era begins from the Hegira, or flight of the prophet, A. D. 622, and 622 plus 1260 equal 1882, as the end of that and the beginning of the great tribulation. The duration of this tribulation is typified by the small, low inlet from the Grand Gallery to the Ante Chamber. It indicates about fifty-two years from 1882 onward. But says Daniel: "Blessed is he who cometh to the 1335 years (days)." That is the time of Christ's appearing, and it is seventy-five years beyond the 1260 which finishes in 1881-2. But the position of the Boss is as nearly as possible that seventy-five inches from the end of the Grand Gallery. Therefore we say, most cautiously, as the line lines near the entrance 2150 inches from the beginning of the Grand Gallery, are the beginning of "time," so the Boss marks the end of "time."

"Again, before his coming all things have to be restored. You cannot suppose that our Lord will descend upon confusion and strife! That twenty-one inches or thereabout, (I do not remember exactly,) from the beginning of the Ante Chamber to the Boss, indicate that number of years of return to order and preparation for his blessed appearance, when time shall be no more, except for that 1000 years of his reign to be succeeded by the second resurrection, the judgment, and then the second death. I have spent, within the last five years, over £200—$1,000—on matters connected with the Pyramid subject; but now I can do no more, except give up, as I am doing, my whole time and energies for morsels to it, hoping only for my reward in heaven. Your country and ours have got to be requited before the end comes."

I have thus given Mr. Muir's views, and with great respect for his industry, intelligence and judgment. Yet, so far as my own opinion goes, I think he does not sufficiently consider the pointed emphasis due to the very thing already hinted, and that is, an eruption and immortalization of ready saints, signified by the first fruit, which is preserved out of the great tribulation, even allowing that that is to begin in 1882 or thereabouts. I have for many years believed that such a salvation would be realized, and I believe it yet; and that practically, to those who are prepared, the coming of Christ may occur between this and 1882. This allows for the view long ago promulgated by Dr. Seiss, and others, relative to different stages in the advent. Besides, the opinion has been expressed, that as the passage ceases to be oblique at the end of the Grand Gallery, and the floor becomes horizontal, the scale of computation may be changed, and the time denoted by space, in the adit, much expedited or abbreviated. How this is, I know not. But it does seem to me the ready saints will never enter a period of tribulation. In regard to such a season, we have a hint of troubles unknown, and dangers unfathomed, in the approach of another presidential contest in 1880, in this country, of which more some other time.

Mr. Muir would be glad, no doubt, if his diagram were freely ordered from America, which, he says, he "hopes to have ready about the end of June. But the labor is immense, and far more than I dreamed of."

Having received letters of inquiry relative to the prophetic revelations, if I may call them such, before spoken of, I may simply remark that it would not be best to particularize at present. There may be error in them, although some things are remarkable. The Word of the Lord is our grand guide. It is true I am looking for unusual and even supernatural indications, but not in any spirit of foolish or curious wondering, I trust. We are to wait on God, Scripturally, soberly, teachably, intelligently and patiently. We may see or hear nothing supernatural, until our Lord comes, and that will be supernatural and glorious.

May he be pleased to grant us a part in his very earliest blessings of saving grace, and we will bless his holy name forever, even forevermore.

Smithville, Erie Co., N. Y., June 10, 1877.

P. S.—Is not Davie Campbell, of Boston, who is trying to issue something now and then, to help our understanding of prophecy—worthy of encouragement? In a little tome, entitled "The Millennium," he has many valuable thoughts.

Response.

Pure coin right from the mint,—bright and clean was the spontaneous outflow of our hearts as we finished reading the first article in the May 30th number of this paper, headed: "What it is to be a Christian." We were just then finishing the reading of The Apocalypse, by J. A. Seiss, D. D. The closing exhortation of which is so complete a counterpart to the article referred to, that we send it entire.

He says: "Behold, then, my friends, the dignity and glory of the Christian calling! Having put on Christ, we belong to a fellowship, for which the sublimest things are reserved! Living a life of faith on the Son of God, we are maturing for a wondrous accouchement! These wrappings and disabilities of time are soon to give place to the liberty and blessedness of a glorious immortality! Instead of these aches, and ills, and bills, and disabilities, and many anxieties, shall presently be the elastic vigor and untiring strength we now see in the angels! Instead of these doubts, and fears, and contests with evil in and around us, there shall be accomplished redemption, beyond all further vicissitude or danger! And for these crosses shall come crowns of imperishable dominion with Jesus! It amazes and confounds me when I attempt to survey the astounding changes that await the faithful. I am overwhelmed with the sublimities of exaltation and power which are set before the poor sinful children of men in the Revelation of God.

We are often disheartened with our hardships and trials, and begin to think it too hard a thing for us to be Christians. Nature is so weak and depraved; there is such a burden in the incessant toil, and self-denial, and watchfulness, and prayer; the way is so steep, and narrow, and different; I also tempted again and again to give up. But when we think what the dear Lord has done for us, what glories he has set before us, what victories are to come to us, what princedoms and thrones in the great empire of eternity await us, and how sure is all if we only press on for the prize; we have the profoundest reason to rejoice and give thanks every day that we live, that such opportunities have been vouchsafed us, were the sufferings even tenfold severer than they are.

Blessed be God, for his holy church! Blessed be God, that he has called us to be members of it! Blessed be God, that every faithful one in it is on the way to a glorious birth-hour to immortal regency and power! Only let us see to it, that we rightly appreciate our mercies, and give the diligence to make our calling and election sure. And "the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered awhile, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you. To whom be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen."

Yours in the mighty struggle for eternal life through the all-conquering name of Jesus our glorified head. Pray for us.

"Fulness of Joy."

"Thou wilt show me the path of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore." Psalms xvi. 11.

Perpetual pleasures and fulness of joy are not found in the broad way that leadeth to destruction, but in the narrow way which leadeth unto life. Matt. vii. 13, 14. We should, then, follow the path of life—the way of life—the Prince of Life," if we would obtain everlasting joy and endless pleasures. Endless pleasures and joy that cannot be increased, is found only in God's presence. In thy presence is fulness of joy, at thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore. Who will dwell in God's presence, and bask in fulness of joy? Those that put their trust under the shadow of thy wing. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures. Psalms xxxvi. 7, 8.

Pleasures as a mighty river will be ours to enjoy, if we fear God and keep his commandments. Eccl. xii. 13; Micah vi. 8. For it is written "The upright shall dwell in thy presence," where there is fulness of joy; whilst evil shall not dwell with thee. Psalms v. 4-6, 9-12.

Remember, kind reader, that the pleasures of sin are but for a season; that the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment. Job xx. 4-8, 29; Heb. xi. 1-26. O! leave the evanescent pleasures of sin, and seek enduring pleasures at God's right hand. You can then rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy. Psalms lxxiii. 3; 1 Peter iv. 13. You can then dwell with God on the earth renewed; when sin shall be obliterated, death destroyed, the curse removed, and the kingdom established. Rev. xxi. 1-4; Psalms xxxvii. 9, 11, 22, 29, 34; Prov. ii. 21, 22; x. 30; xi. 31; Isa. lx. 21; Matt. v. 5; 1 Cor. xv. 26; 1 John iii. 8; Dan. ii. 44; Rev. v. 9, 10; xxii. 1-3. You can enjoy the regal honors of the age to come. You can rejoice in the possession of an endless life, to be enjoyed in God's presence, where there is fulness of joy, and at his right hand where there are pleasures forevermore. You can enter the city, whose walls are of jasper, whose gates are of pearl, and whose streets are of gold. God will then give you beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. "Everlasting joy shall be unto them." Isa. lxi. 3, 7. "Your sorrow shall be turned into joy." John xvi. 20. God's presence shall cheer you, his grace sustain you, and his arm protect you. Truly, happy is that people, whose God is the Lord. Psalms xxxiii. 12; lxv. 4; cxliv. 15. Enter into fulness of joy through him who is the door. John x. 7-9.

For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. For the Lord God is a sun and shield; the Lord will give grace and glory; no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. Psalms lxxxiv. 10, 11. "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." Psalms xxiii. 6; xxvii. 4.

Let us, like David of old, desire this "one thing," that we may behold the beauty of the Lord, and dwell in his house forever. "Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty; they shall behold the land of far distances." Isa. xxxiii. 14-17. "And ye now therefore have sorrow; but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." John xvi. 22. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Psalms xxx. 5. "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." Psalms cxxvi. 5, 6. O! enter through the open door into the fulness of joy. Rev. iii. 8.

"Behold an open door!
It stands ajar for thee!
For thee, poor sinner, to secure
Bless'd immortality.

The Savior calls from sin,
And bids you enter there;
'Tis life, and light, and joy within,
And bliss beyond compare.

When clos'd by his command,
Your tears may stain the sill.
But yet that door will ever stand Fast bar'd against you still.

'Tis mercy's only gate
That leads to life and home!
Then haste, ere it be too late,
And flee from wrath to come."

AUSTIN CURTIS.

Confession in the Greek Church is ordinarily made but once a year—during the first or last week of Lent. During the previous six or eight days the penitents attend mass twice a day and fasts. It is not necessary to acknowledge any particular sin, as in the Catholic Church, but simply to confess themselves guilty of having broken one or more of the Commandments. The rite is generally performed at home, and a priest attends for the purpose. Children are expected to confess, but not to fast.

An area of 100 miles of the territory of Tripoli and Barbary, on the Mediterranean coast, has been devastated by locusts, involving the destruction of crops, and bringing distress and the horror of an imminent famine upon the inhabitants.

Sententious Paragraphs.

In this simple fact that we cannot accurately foresee the future, lies a refuge from despair. Lessing.

Our sorrows are like thunder clouds, which seem very black in the distance, but grow lighter as they approach.

"'Tis hard to reap when toil is almost vain—
In barren ways;
'Tis hard to sow and never garner grain
In harvest days.

Examples are few of men ruined by giving. Men are heroes in spending very cowards in what they give. Bacon.

Vulgar companions—If you go into a field of beggar ticks in autumn, when you get home your clothes will reveal the fact.

There are occasions when the general belief of people, even though it be groundless, works its effect as sure as truth itself.—Schiller.

By-and-by comes the autumn's rich fruitage;
Meanwhile the frail form and fair flower
Must wait all the tender unfolding
That cometh through sunshine and shower.

Sterne says in his Koran, "I never drink—I cannot do it on equal terms with others. It costs them only one day, but me three; the first in sinning, the second in suffering, and the third in repenting."

The Bible is full of alarm bells as well as of sweet notes of invitation and rich chimes of devout melody. So let us be thankful for every honest voice of warning. There is need yet of Daniels and Ezekiels in God's Church.

Nothing secures so many friends as success, and this is quite natural, for only a few truly succeed, and by that success they manifest that they are men of sterling quality who have the will and the power to shape destiny itself.

We smile at the ignorance of the savage who cuts down the tree in order to obtain its fruits; but the fact is, that a blunder of this description is made by every person who is over-eager and impatient in the pursuit of pleasure.—Channing.

"Rose of the garden—blushing and gay,
Ever as we pluck thee—fading away.
Beams of the morning—prophets of day,
While we are gazing—fading away.
Spring's fairest blossom—summer's bright day,
Autumn's rich cluster—fading away.
Song of the wild bird—heart-stirring lay,
Even as we listen—fading away.
Hope's fairy promise—chorus to betray,
All that is earthly—fading away."

Not what we do alone, but what we are, decides our final destiny. But what we are may depend largely upon what we have done. A life of persistent iniquity, or of weak and easy yielding to temptation writes its awful history upon a blackened and ruined soul. Some one has said, "Sow an act reap a habit; sow a habit and reap a character; sow a character and reap a destiny."

"Sunshine" Suspended.

It is with much regret that I announce this fact. It is only when my own means of continuing it, is exhausted, that I consent to let it die. It has never had the undivided support of even our own people, and now the hard times which are so severe on all newspapers, has caused the withdrawal of so much of its former patronage that I am compelled to suspend it.

I am happy to announce, however, that Brother H. L. Hastings, of Boston, will fill my list for the remainder of the year, with his most excellent paper, The Christian, which I sincerely hope will continue to visit the homes of all the subscribers to SUNSHINE. The Little Christian will be sent to all the schools now provided with the SUNSHINE, and it needs no prophet to foretell that all such will gladly arrange for its continued visits. To all my co-laborers for the dissemination of SUNSHINE, I return thanks for their assistance, and bid them a grateful farewell. J. F. WILLCOX.

In Russia every citizen upon attaining the age of twenty-one years is obliged to serve his country as a soldier if required. The full time of service is fifteen years—six with the active army and nine in the reserves. But various circumstances modify this term—education, voluntary enlistment, and the necessities of the country. But all able-bodied men from twenty-one to forty years, if not enlisted, are held in reserve, to be incorporated into the active army whenever needed.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 20, 1872.

WE are getting along with the paper week by week and trust its future with God who hitherto hath helped us.

WE have also received a copy of Brother Colegrove's pamphlet of which we expect to give a more specific notice soon. As our paper is nearly ready for the press, we must waive further notices.

BROTHER H. V. REID has gone to Iowa to attend some meetings in that state. We trust his visit will promote the cause of our soon-coming King, and be for the edification of the brotherhood.

A WORK, entitled, "A Complete Harmony of Daniel and the Apocalypse," by Rev. J. Litch, has just come to hand. Have had no time even to glance at its contents. It is a work of 300 pages published by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger, Phil., Pa.

The Coronation Chair and Stone.

There is a very interesting article in the July number of Harper's Magazine, on Westminster Abbey, from which we make the following extract. It is claimed by quite a number of writers in England and Scotland that the English are of Ephraimitish origin, and to post our readers on the questions of the day, we give an occasional paper on this topic without endorsing any theory relative to the subject. The extract is as follows:

"Two features give to Westminster Abbey a peculiar character. For years it has been the birth-place and the burial-place of royalty. Here every King of England since the days of William the Conqueror has been crowned, and here the royal ashes have been laid for their repose, certainly ever since the days of his predecessor, Edward the Confessor. Coronation was eminently a religious ceremony—of all religious ceremonies the most solemn, imposing and important. It lends, therefore, to Westminster Abboy no slight additional grandeur in the eyes of a devoted adherent of royalty that for over eight centuries, the kings of England have been crowned in it. The two objects which the berger shows the tourist with the greatest reverence are the coronation chair and the coronation stone.

The stony pillow on which Jacob slept was carried by his descendants into Egypt. (Since we are going into tradition, we may as well go as far back as tradition can carry us.) This stone, after various migrations, which the ancient chronicles narrate with great particularity, at length reached Ireland in its wanderings. Here it served a useful purpose to a rude age by detecting the false claims of would-be monarchs. Each new claimant to the throne was placed upon this stone. If the chief was the true successor, the stone was silent; if he was a pretender it groaned aloud. How so useful a tester of royal character slipped out of Irish hands, tradition saith not, though doubtless the fact that Ireland has been in a state of chronic anarchy ever since, except when kept quiet by foreign domination, is to be attributed to the absence of this invaluable bit of rock. At all events, Edward the Confessor found it in Scotland, in the Abbey of Scone, inclosed in a chair on which, for a length of time history refuses to measure, all Scottish kings had been crowned. He brought it with him to England, had built for it a chair which still contains it, and re sisted, as have all his royal successors, every attempt on the part of Scotland —and they have been numerous—to recover this holy "Stone of Scone." From that day to this, in this chair, and on this very stone, every English sovereign, from Edward the Confessor to Queen Victoria, has been inaugurated. Once only has it been moved out of the Abbey, and that, says Dean Stanley, 'for an occasion which proves, perhaps, more than any other single event since its first capture, the importance attached to it by the rulers and people of England. When Cromwell was installed as Lord Procter in Westminster Hall, he was placed in the 'Chair of Scotland,' brought out of Westminster Abbey for that singular and special occasion.'"

As there is an allusion to this traditional stone in another part of this number of THE RESTITUTION, and as some information in regard to the coronation of English sovereigns in connection with this rock of a remote antiquity, wherever it may have come from, may be of interest to our readers we give this piece of history.

The Last of Table Rock.

On the 24th ultimo, the last of what was known as Table Rock, at Niagara, broke off and fell into the river. The mass weighed nearly sixty tons, and up to 1810 over four thousand names of visitors had been carved upon it. The part which fell on the 24th composed only half of the original rock, the rest having fallen in. On Saturday Jan. 21, 1820, a surface of the rock supposed to be the size of half an acre, forming the bed of Maiden Walk, fell into the immense chasm below. The crash was heard five miles away, and the effects near by resembled those of an earthquake. The shock on the 24th was distinctly felt for three miles. Several of the trees that stood on the rock are still standing in the river.

Exegetical.

Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. Heb. xi. 1.

The Greek word hupostasis-hypostasis—is thus defined by SCHLEUSNER: "A ground-work, fulcrum, that upon which anything rests, a basis, that by which anything is so sustained that it can not be moved or overturned, but must remain immovably fixed." It is rendered "substance" in the text above, but more properly means that "assured impression, and mental realization," of the "things hoped for" that makes those future things become present subsistences.

The word elegxis—elenchos—which is translated "evidence" in the text, is thus defined by the same lexicographer: "A confidence and intellectual persuasion that is sustained and upheld by substantial proofs; a conviction, apprehension by mental grasp." This word has a logical signification denoting strict proof or demonstration; but the inward conviction, resulting from the faith that regards as substantial realities all those objects of hope proposed in divine revelation, is what is intended by the apostle.

"The faith by which the just shall live" is something more than a cold formal assent to the truthfulness of what God has revealed as the grand objects of human hope. Its life-determining power is illustrated in the records of that righteous nobility "of whom the world was not worthy." In hope of the resurrection unto eternal life; in hope of inheriting the heavenly country and that "city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God," the moral heroes lived as "seeing him that is invisible," and "died in faith though they did not receive the blessings promised; for descrying them afar off, and being persuaded of their certainty, and embracing them, they confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth." Macknight, Heb. xi. 13.

How specific is the apostle in presenting the precise objects that animated the faith, hope, zeal, and life-long constancy of the divinely catalogued examples of that elect class whose faith pleased God. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob pitched their moving tents in the very land of promise itself, and died in faith of that restitution when it shall become the "better country" by becoming "heavenly." The land made over by solemn sacrificial covenant became the Fatherland, Greek, patrida—patrida—after which the pilgrim strangers sought. Upon no fancied heaven "beyond the bounds of time and space" did the faith of Heaven's approved ones rest. The life that the martyred ones expected, was the resurrection life. But not to expatiate fully on the coming glory, let us ask ourselves as to whether we be in the faith or not. Are we really expecting God's Son soon from heaven? The slumbering and almost extinct faith may deepen into conviction when it is too late, and we find ourselves excluded from the heavenly nuptials. Let us not grasp shadows and lose the substance. Let us "not look at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." As "we walk by faith and not by sight," let us walk worthy of our heavenly calling. May the too feeble assent of our wavering hearts deepen into unshaken convictions of future realities.—ED.

Not Peter Nor Paul, But Christ.

It is claimed by many that all authority to establish churches in apostolic times, was conferred by our Lord upon Peter, and that all churches not having his apostolic seal are spurious. It is further claimed that the Catholic church is the true and only church which possesses the apostolic seal or blessing. Volumes have been written to sustain this view, and as many more to disprove it. It has been stoutly affirmed that Christ transferred his power to Peter, and that he was the constituted vicar of Christ after our Lord ascended. This point rests chiefly upon that celebrated text in the 16th of Matthew where our Lord gives Peter the keys of the kingdom, etc. Another important point has been raised with regard to Peter's visit to to Rome.

It is not our intention to argue the above points in this article. We have another question of graver hue for the Romanist to consider, and one, too, which will require some careful reasoning to evade. Our argument will not trench upon the old issues, but upon another phase of the great question entirely separate, and to some extent, new field of inquiry.

Whatever view Romanists take of Peter's keys or of his visits to Rome, we shall not stop to investigate at present. It matters little whether Peter possessed the requisite power, or whether he was ever in Rome. Our question lies beyond this and requires another answer.

The question relates more closely to the mission of the Apostle Paul. If all authority to establish churches, ordain elders and deacons, was in the hands of Peter, then, indeed, the argument of the Romanist is admissible. But, of course, even this admission would not prove the Roman church to be the one ordained by Peter.

Now, if it can be shown that Peter did not always superintend the establishing of churches, either personally or by his divinely commissioned agents, then, indeed, the boasted argument of Romanism falls without hope. Let us examine the point under consideration, carefully.

We propose showing that the gospel was preached, men converted and churches established, entirely outside of the personal authority or apostolic agency of Peter. If this point can be sustained fairly, it forever settles the question as to the Roman claim. To us the argument is overwhelming, and at once puts an end to the pretensions of the Catholic church, and brings all true believers into fellowship with the Father and the Son.

That the Apostle Paul was set apart as the Lord's ambassador to the Gentiles, there can be no question. In Romans, the apostle says: "That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost." Rom. xv. 16. In this text the whole mission of Paul is plainly expressed.

1. He presents the great truth that he was constituted an ambassador.

2. That his message was the Gospel of God.

3. That the Gentiles were the especial objects of his mission.

4. That those Gentiles who accepted his message would be blessed of heaven, seeing that they were sanctified by the Holy Spirit.

The Gentiles, then, were co-heirs to the blessings and immunities of Christ our Lord. This being true, we would ask:

DID PAUL GET HIS AUTHORITY FROM PETER?

If the theory set up by Romanists, is true, that Peter was Christ's vicar, and that he alone held the keys, then Paul must have derived his power from him. But, is there any proof to sustain this view? We answer, there is none. On the contrary the evidence is very pointedly against it. Paul, in addressing the Galatians, says: "But I certify you brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me, was not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Gal. i. 11, 12.

This testimony is very explicit and settles the point so far as the apostle is concerned. The gospel and the power to preach it, did not come from man. The commission to preach was direct from Christ. This can be proven from the commission itself: "Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles unto whom now I send thee, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me." Acts xxvi. 17, 18.

There can be but one more point needed to clinch the argument and place it beyond the possibility of doubt. Did Paul in any way get his authority from Peter or the apostles? Paul is very explicit on this point. He says: "Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia and returned again to Damascus." Gal. i. 17.

To sum up the evidence as given above, we have the following plain facts:

1. Christ and not Peter, appointed Paul to the work of the ministry.

2. The power to preach, the gospel to be preached, were derived from Christ and not Peter.

3. The Gentile church established by Paul, were recognized by the Jerusalem brethren as belonging to the body of Christ, and, in all respects, worthy of fellowship.

The question of Peter's keys was never raised. Certain Pharisees objected to the Gentile converts on the ground that they were not circumcised and did not observe the law. But the Peter part of the objection is not recorded. In general, therefore, we may conclude that there is no evidence to sustain the monstrous assertions of the Romanist. Men who accept Christ and obey his Word, are not to recognize the Roman church as the body of Christ. The true foundation is Christ and not Peter. The gospel is God's power unto salvation. Let all receive this gospel, obey its commands, and share its blessings. Amen.

H. V. REID.

David's Prayer for the Restoration of Zion and the Salvation of Israel.

Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad. Psa. xiv. 7.

These earnest and prayerful utterances for the building up of Zion and the return of Israel are but the natural products of an enlightened mind, a heart interested in the commonwealth of Israel and truly devoted to the service of God. The Psalmist is truly said to be a man after God's own heart, and hence his heart ever beat in unison with the heart divine. The singular prophecy of the woman Abigail, seemed to have its exact fulfillment in the holy and devoted life of David, namely—"the soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord my God," etc., 1 Sam. 25, 29. He appeared to have no separate interest of his own from the interests and purposes of Him with whom he was mysteriously bound up in the bundle of life, and of whom he says "I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand," etc., Psa. xvi. 8. This prayer of the sweet singer of Israel is an enlightened and intelligent one, and indeed is prompted by the divine afflatus. David was well aware, as other portions of his prophetic songs clearly define, that the salvation of Israel which should emanate from Zion was contingent upon the building up of Zion, the reconstruction, renewal and beautifying of Jerusalem. As he expressly states "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory." Now, there is something pointed out more than a mere empty display of the divine grandeur, for this glory is inseparable from the restoration of Judah and Israel unto the bosom of his love, and their re-settlement in the land of promise. The context here makes this quite clear, as it is said he looked down from heaven, etc., "To hear the groaning of the prisoners, to loose those that are appointed unto death, to declare the name of the Lord in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem," etc., Psa. cii. The glory here to be manifested then of the Lord is in the restitution, the rebuilding again of the David'ic tabernacle which is fallen down, and repairing the ruins of many generations. As a proof "I will bring near my righteousness: it shall not be far off, and my salvation (for Israel) shall not tarry, and I will place salvation in Zion, for Israel my glory." Isa. xliii. 13. David, having a proper view of the subject, it is no way surprising that his petitions should have been expressed as they are in the words of our text, and in their precise chronological order. He was well aware of the supreme importance of Zion and the relations its rebuilding bore to the salvation of Israel; he was well aware of the high estimation in which Zion was held by the Most High and of its future glorious destiny. These facts we may gather from his own utterances alone, aside from other scriptures. As we hear him saying "The Lord loveth (even the very) gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob; glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God." Psa. lxxxiii. He here refers to other statements which are recorded in various places relative to her splendid future. See especially on this, Isa. lx, we see that Jehovah has selected it above all other places for His residence in the coming age, "For the Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest forever (the aion age); here will I dwell for I have desired it; I will abundantly bless her provisions (Bethel was formerly the house of bread, but now Zion is chosen, and is to be amply provided with all the rich cereals and vianda—especially with the bread of life, for the nourishment of the saints). I will satisfy her poor with bread; I will also clothe her priests with salvation, and her saints shall shout aloud for joy." While here it is also where the horn of David is destined to bud and blossom and fill the face of the world with fruit. Psa. cxxxii. compare Isa. xxvii. 6; xxv. 6. It is then when life everlasting will be imparted to all its denizens as the next Psalm shows, as he says, in speaking of the dews of Heaven and those vivifying dews that anciently descended upon the mountains of Zion, he declares "for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forevermore." But this blessing is predicted upon Zion's rebuilding, and the Lord taking up his abode there, "So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain; Then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no strangers pass through her any more, (no more surveying expeditions of the Holy Land, no more tourist, no more sceptics to scan the situation of things and then return, declaring the utter impossibility of Palestine ever recovering from its desolations,) and it shall come to pass in that day that the mountains shall drop new wine (here the plenitude of fulness is pointed out again in the most glowing language, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters and a fountain shall come forth out of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley or shittim. But Judah shall dwell forever, and Jerusalem from generation to generation, for the Lord dwelleth in Zion." Joel iii. 17 21. By looking over the entire chapter here we see that the watchword is to pass over first; and that the shaking down of Gentile kingdoms, and the beautiful state of things predicted, is the outcome of the general wars and great battles which are to come off in the valley of decision where the Lord is to sit in judgment on all the heathen round about, and give the wicked to the sword. When this new economy is established on the top of the mountain as it were, then the nations and much people will flow unto it; then "out of Zion shall go forth the law and the word of the Lord out of Jerusalem," etc.; then, as David says, the people in waiting shall receive the heavenly benedictions which are there in reserve for them, "The Lord shall bless thee out of Zion, and thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem all the days of thy life. Yea thou shalt see thy children's children and peace upon Israel." Psa. cxxviii. 5, 6, compare Psa. cxxxiv. 3. It is then the ransomed of the Lord shall return, (return from their captivity, as the streams in the south, a metaphor to denote the great influx at this time toward the Holy Land by the many people) and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads," etc. The apostle tells us that the deliverer is to come to Zion and the work he is to accomplish is to turn away any ungodliness from Jacob, from the very fact that Jehovah had covenanted with the fathers to do it. Deliverer implies deliverance of a people whose servile and oppressed condition calls for deliverance, which is here synonymous with salvation. See Rom. ii. It is then when he makes Zion the place of his rest and seat of his royalty, that upon the walls will be inscribed salvation, and her gates will be ornamented with those ascriptions which are comely to the Lord—Praise. As it is said, "Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion, and unto thee shall the word be performed," etc. And this is the order marked out by the Psalmist in his present supplications for Zion's exaltation, for the establishment of the Messianic kingdom, the inauguration of Zion's King on Zion's holy hill. Psa. li. 6. In the text, however, we would remark, he does not make this any part of the burden of his prayer, as he does in so many other portions of his song, only by implications, as he well knew that salvation could not come out of Zion before Zion was built up and in a position to confer this deliverance here implied. When this is completed "that all the ends of the earth may see the salvation of God," then the captivity will have terminated, and there is a definite time, as there is a "set time for Zion" when the Lord shall arise and have mercy upon her. The adverb of time "when," makes this obvious, "O that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people." Then follows the day of ineffable gladness. Joy cometh in the morning. "Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad." This gladness will be mutual as with the father and the returning prodigal, that being a type of the return of the lost tribes, and, as is indicated in the parable, Israel is still conscious that after wandering away so many centuries in a far country, that there is bread enough and to spare beneath the paternal roof, and feels confident on his return he will meet with a most hearty reception, the preparations are on the most magnificent scale. It will be a feast of infinite joy, "a feast of fat things, of wines of the lees, of fat things full of marrow," a royal banquet of delights, nothing being spared or wanting to make it so. The inner man as well as the intellectual man is here to be amply provided with all which may contribute to his happiness. Does he desire physical refreshment? here it is under the symbol of the "fatted calf;" is it in the way of physical exercise? here he may go in the dance to his heart's content. Dance! say you, in the restitution? Yes. "Again I will build thee and thou shalt be built O virgin of Israel; thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets, and shall go forth in the dances of them that make merry." Jer. xxxi, 4. Is it music you wish? You shall have abundance of that and of the sweetest strains. Is it song? There will be no lack of this; music and song will be in that age two of the chief things which make up the divine service. For there "the Lord's song will be sung in the land of Judah," Psa. cxxxvii. 4; Isa. xxvi. 1; "yea they shall sing in the songs of the Lord." Psa. cxxxviii.

5. "They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness and sing of thy righteousness." Psa. cxv. 7. This Psalm treats entirely on the future age, when it will become a topic of general conversation, "To speak of the glory of thy (God's) kingdom, and talk of thy (His) power" when all his works are represented as praising him, and all his saints as blessing him. When they will "sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praises in the congregations of saints," when Israel will join the glad anthem, "and rejoice in him that made him, and the children of Zion be joyful in their King." "The tongue even of the mules shall be unloosed to swell and enlarge the mighty choir." Isa. xxxv. 6. "With the voice together shall they sing, when the Lord shall bring again Zion." Isa. lii. 8. The predictions which refer to this feature of service in the new age, are very numerous. Let it suffice, it will resolve in one grand and universal song of praise and adoration unto Him that shall sit enthroned in Zion and unto the Lamb for the age of ages. And in view of the "glorious things" which we will obtain when Jehovah shall arise in answer to this prayer, let us unite with the Psalmist ever and anon, "O, that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad." Amen and amen.

Editor Restitution:—As I am almost alone in the faith here, I feel the need of all the helps I can get. I long for the society of those who believe the gospel, but, in my loneliness, I am so thankful for the precious Bible. This is the same in every place, and teaches the same blessed truths. You may hear from me again ere long. May the dear Lord bless his people everywhere, and enable us to be watchful in these evil days.

M. ROCK.

St. Joseph, Mo.

Editor Restitution:—I send you a small sum for the RESTITUTION. I thank the Lord and you for the precious truths it contains, as it gives us invaluable information on the Word of God, as we are isolated and have not the privilege of meeting with those of like precious faith. I have received great consolation in my loneliness. God bless you for your labor of love.

Your humble sister in the Lord,

A. S. JOHNSON.

Ogden, Ill.

Editor Restitution:—As my subscription is about at a close I send for another six months. I am old and feeble, and we have no preaching here of our views. It is a great comfort to me, in the decline of life, to be able to pay for its continuance, as it is a great privilege to receive its weekly visits. I hope it may be sustained, and still bear its tidings to a lost and perishing world. I delight to hear from the pen of those that I could once hear orally proclaiming the glorious message, "Behold I come quickly." O, what a rich feast it would be to hear their voices once more, but, alas! we may never meet again till we meet in "that beautiful land"—Paradise restored. This hope sustains me amidst the perils of the last days. O, glorious morning, my heart swells with raptures as I see the day approaching. Cheer up, brother and sister; we are almost home. Our trials and conflicts will soon be over, and we shall enjoy that "rest that remains for the people of God." Let us be of one heart and one mind, striving to build each other up in our most holy faith that when our trials and conflicts here are ended, we may meet in our beautiful Eden home. Faithful is he that has promised, and, while the nations of earth are in deadly strife, and the prophecies are nearly fulfilled, and knowing our time is short to awaken a slumbering world, may we be diligent, united in heart and purpose to sound the cry, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." United, we stand; divided, we fall. May we be united as good soldiers, that we may finally be able to possess the goodly land where we can sing the song of Moses and the Lamb. Go on, my brethren, in the Lord, till we reach that heavenly land. Farewell.

From your unworthy sister in Christ,

HARRIET COVEY.

Osco, Wis.

Editor Restitution:—I remit for the RESTITUTION as I will not do without it as long as I am able to pay for it, and it can be had. I do sincerely hope the brethren will do their utmost to keep it up, for I don't see how any of the brethren could do without it. That there is not so much bitter feeling among brethren in reviewing subjects, is an improvement in the paper. The Eastern question is very interesting.

Yours in hope of eternal life through Christ.

A Spring Morning.

High on a hill-top, all alone,
Among the birds and near the sky,
I sit, and listen to the tone
Of Nature's morning melody.

The voice of wood, and field, and wood,
Of wave and sky makes music sweet;
I gaze on mountain, mead and flood—
The foaming river 'neath my feet.

Still shines on high the morning star,
Beaming upon enchanted eyes;
And still the moonlight on the wave
In mystery of beauty lies.

The creeping grass to deck the earth
Is marshalling its verdant blades,
And bright violets come to birth
In sheltered nook and forest glades.

The birds are singing to the leaves,
And soon the ardent sun will call,
"Come forth and aid, while Nature weaves
Her magic royal robe for all."

O Lord of beauty and of grace,
The works do praise thee everywhere;
Thou last in Heaven thy dwelling place,
But Thou do'st make thy footstool fair.

Correspondence.

Dear Brethren and Sisters:—I awoke quite early this morning to look over with a feeling of disappointment and despondency, the results of our meeting now about to close. Brother Hatch came Friday evening and has been preaching ever since to quite small audiences, yet we think, notwithstanding the indifference of the many, that some dear souls have been strengthened and confirmed in the faith, and will remain steadfast unto the end. For this we are thankful, and when we knelt in prayer, just before breakfast, our hearts were poured out in gratitude for even this proof of our Father's love. An almost audible voice whispered to me as I was pleading for strength—come BOLDLY for help in every time of need! Over and over the words were repeated; come boldly! come boldly!—I obeyed, and I believe the help will come.

"Though the tempest rages,
To the rock of ages
I am anchored fast!"

Though the battle waxes fiercer, and we feel the hot cannon's breath, though the fires of persecution are closing around us hemming us in on every side, though the professed followers of Christ try with withering scorn, and discourteous acts to silence our voices. Oh! thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ, we shall reap at the proper season if we do not relax.

We cannot deny our Lord. We dare not be ashamed of the words of Jesus. It were easier for the present, to go with the popular current, but oh that future that is to come! that crown of glory that fadeth not away would then be lost! the inheritance would not be ours! We have obeyed that form of doctrine delivered unto us, and God helping us, we are determined to stand firm in one spirit, with one soul, vigorously co-operating for the Faith of the Glad Tidings.

Yet we cannot help feeling sad that men and women will turn away their ears from hearing the truth and turn unto fables, that they will not receive Jesus as the life giver, nor learn to rejoice that his coming is near.

O, to think that the servant who says in his heart, "My Master delays to come," will have his portion appointed with unbelievers. Is it not a fearful, fearful warning to those who are saying, "The coming of Christ will not be for thousands and thousands of years!"

A few cry out with burning heart,
"King of Kings! reveal thy throne,
Visit this, thine earth again,
Gird thy sword upon thy thigh!,
Take thy mighty power and reign."

These have embraced with gladness the truth, and have become grounded and settled in the faith of the Gospel; others not having root within themselves, go back when tribulation comes because of the word.

These are perilous times. Let us take heed lest any of us fall through unbelief. Let all be careful that their garments are kept spotless until Jesus comes.

Bro. Hatch has boldly set forth the truth while among us. He is keeping the faith. He has set himself for the defence of the Gospel. May the Lord abundantly bless him and give him some sheaves in the great day of harvest. Quite a number of the brethren cheered us with their presence on Sunday. The Lord reward them.

The Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Be faithful in holding up the hand of God's servants. Remember the interests of our prayer. The light must go, for the end is nearing. Make every sacrifice for the truth. Jesus may come sooner than any of us are looking. Be ready.

To all the Members of the Church of God,—Greeting:

The members of the Church of God, assembled in conference at Havens, Lawrence county, Missouri, May 20, 1877 after consultation and deliberation, desire that all the members of the body, in south-west Missouri, south-eastern Kansas and north-western Arkansas, that possibly can, and all others, who desire the triumph of our most holy cause and the soon coming of our Lord and King, meet with us at our annual conference, for the purpose of perfecting some plan, by which we may work together for the furtherance of the cause we have at heart, for consultation and for exhortation; that we may build each other up in our most holy faith. Conference will be held at the Ashley school house, one mile east of Chambersville, in the south-west corner of Dade county, Missouri, commencing on Friday before the third Sunday in August, 1877.

By order of the Church.

The Eastern Conflict.

The Sultan, the Mussuerrs, the Turk, The Mysterium at of Turkey, Reform Impossible, Views of the Missionaries, the War.

CONSTANTINOPLE, May 11, 1877.

To-day I saw the last of the Sultans—a pale man on a pale horse, and the horse was the better part of the show. As is usual on Fridays—the Mohammedan Sabbath—the Sultan rode in great state from his palace to the mosque to perform his devotions. The young sovereign, recently elevated to the throne after the removal of his brother and the suicide or murder of his father, slowly rode on a magnificent white charger, preceded and followed by footmen in gaudy Oriental splendor. He wore a red fez, a black broadcloth suit, and looked blank, weary and sad. A mechanical applause arose for a moment from the soldiers, who lined both sides of the street between the palace and the neighboring mosques, while the multitude of spectators silently looked on.

The spectacle seemed a faithful type of the present condition of Turkey. "The sick man" of Constantinople proclaimed to the world that, if necessary, he would unfurl the green banner of the Prophet and march at the head of his army against the infidel Russians. This appeal to the fanaticism of his Moslem subjects reveals his danger and the ferocious character which the present conflict may assume. Those who remember the frightful massacres of Damascus and the Lebanon, and the more recent atrocities of Bulgaria (which, I am told by our Bulgarian missionaries, have not been exaggerated by our Consul, Mr. Eugene Schuyler), know what may be expected from a race which owes its power to the sword, and which treats Christians like dogs. The instincts of the Turk are essentially barbarous. He is by nature ignorant, indolent, stupid and proud. He respects no argument but powder and the cannon ball, and that argument is now used against him. He must be humbled before he can be improved. His days of conquest are over, and in a single handed fight he will surely be beaten by Russia. His life was barely saved in the Crimean war by the aid of Catholic France and Protestant England. He promised to reform, and on that promise he was received into the company of civilized nations. He did not keep his promise. The boor was introduced into a parlor and behaved like a boor. Instead of punishing the leaders of the Bulgarian massacres, he has rewarded and promoted them. He has rejected with scorn the advice of his former allies. Now he must run the risk of total dismemberment or of being driven out from Europe, which he has so long disgraced and insulted by his presence.

After travelling for more than three months in Mohammedan countries, I cannot conceive how an intelligent Christian man can any longer sympathize with a government that has for centuries cursed the fairest portions of the globe, and held millions of Christians in a state of degrading slavery. The Turkish government is a hopeless system of corruption and oppression. It defeats the first object of government—the protection of life and property. It is no government at all, in the proper sense of the word; it is simply the relation of the conqueror to the conquered, continued without even an attempt to conciliate them. It makes loyalty and patriotism on the part of the latter impossible. It rules only to ruin. It cares nothing for the countries and peoples under its sway, except to extract tribute from them; and it degrades taxation to a system of legalized pillage. Christians are not allowed to testify before court, to bear arms, to defend their country. The Turks keep all the power and all the powder in their own hands, and prevent the possibility of a successful revolution or redress of grievances. The recent constitution is only a shrewd contrivance to checkmate Russia and the European conference, and will prove a mockery and a delusion. Such a government cannot be reformed. It allows everything to go to decay and ruin. Nearly every improvement in Turkish dominions is due to foreign energy and enterprise, and exists in spite of the government.

Much is said of the tolerance of the Turkish government under which our missionaries have been able to pursue their work for the last fifty years. But that tolerance springs from indifferentism and contempt, in part also from fear, not from principle, not from any respect for the rights of conscience. The more the Christian dogs fight among themselves, the better for the Turks. Of religious liberty they have not even the most remote conception. Their religion commands them to massacre all idolators who refuse to become Moslems. Christians may be allowed to live, but subject to Moslem rule in a state of servitude. The Moslems themselves have no liberty to change their religion except at the expense of their lives.

Some of our missionaries fear that Russia may deprive them of that liberty which they enjoy at present, under the Turks, and prefer to let Turkey die a natural death. But this is a narrow, and, I may say, a selfish view. The fate of a few hundred converts—not from the Turks, but solely from older Christian sects,—weighs little compared with the fate of millions of Christians who have borne the yoke of slavery for centuries, and who deserve some credit at least for their steadfast adherence to the Cross against the brutal force and standing insults of the Crescent. The great majority of the missionaries, however, with whom I have conversed on the subject in Constantinople, Beirut, Damascus, and other places, take a more comprehensive view, and heartily desire the speedy overthrow of this intolerable despotism.

The Eastern conflict is by no means a conflict simply between Russia and Turkey. It is a conflict between the Cross and the Crescent; between Christian civilization and barbarism; between liberty and despotism. Russia may have selfish objects of conquest in view, but she is only an agent in the hands of Providence for a higher and nobler purpose. England, unfortunately, is no less selfish in her policy. Mr. Gladstone represents the conscience but not the purse of England, and the purse seems to rule the conscience as far as the action of the Disraeli government is concerned. I am confident, however, that the Christian people of England will not allow her rulers to fight another Crimean war, and will force them to keep neutral at least so long as Russia does not threaten Constantinople. As it seems to me, from what I can learn, that Russia does not aim at Constantinople, but at Armenia and the ports of the Black Sea, to strengthen her Asiatic power, and at the emancipation of the European provinces of Turkey from Mohammedan rule. Constantinople—the finest city in the world by situation and natural capacity of power—ought to become a free city with political and religious liberty for all under the joint protection of Christian nations.

The solution of the Eastern question has begun in earnest, and we stand in awe of events to come. No one can foresee the result. We hope and pray that the war may end in the overthrow of the political power of the Turks, and of the supremacy of the Koran, and prepare the way for the moral and religious regeneration of the lands of the Bible. Then and then only will the Mohammedans themselves become accessible, and present to the Christian world a vast field of missionary labor.—Rev. Philip Schaff, D. D., in N. Y. Observer.

Conference Report.

The Church of God in south-west Missouri, met in conference according to appointment, at Havens, Lawrence county, Missouri, on Friday before the fourth Sunday in May. There were but few present, owing to the wet weather preceding, throwing every one behind with their work. Total number present, seventeen. The business before the conference was of a varied character, nearly all of which was disposed of satisfactorily; and I think the cause in this region stands in a better condition to-day, than at any time in the last five years; the brethren seem to have thrown off that lethargy by which they were possessed, and seem determined to go to work in earnest. The preaching was done by Brother Stringer and myself, there being no other preaching brethren present, but Brother Jonah Pierce, and he was unwell.

On Sunday evening we met around the Lord's table to partake of the emblems of our Lord's broken body, and each one present seemed to realize that the time is not far distant when we may be permitted to eat of it in the kingdom of God. At the close of our meeting on Sunday night, three came forward and demanded baptism, so we adjourned to meet at the crystal stream on Monday morning, when they were assisted by the writer in putting on Christ by baptism. This makes four that have been obedient. I having baptized Brother Cuce at my last visit on the third Sunday in April. After baptism, we met at Brother Robertson's house, where we again assembled around the Lord's table, thanking him for his loving kindness and mercy towards us, and for his blessing upon our labor. After we had eaten, while the brethren and sisters were singing a hymn, we took the parting hand to go to our several homes, expecting to meet at our annual conference, with many from different parts of like precious faith, and if denied this privilege, may we so live, as to stand with boldness before the Son of Man, and have an abundant entrance administered unto us in the everlasting kingdom of God, is the humble prayer of your brother in love.

The Christian Armor.

Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is the Word of God. Eph. 6: 16, 17.

The Bible, or the Word of God, furnishes the Christian with a complete armor for the warfare to which he is called; it is adapted either for attack or defense. The sword, in particular, which is here identified with the spirit, reasoning from analogy, we must come to the conclusion that it is well adapted for both purposes, viz: attack and defense; to use a military phrase, as the apostle has done in the text above quoted. It constitutes a complete arsenal, armory or magazine, which is always on hand ready for any and every emergency.

Here, with all due deference to our Orthodox friends, (as they are pleased to call themselves,) and the Quakers, or, (as they choose to be called,) Friends, often, with the Bible in their hands, wait for the moving of the Spirit. I have often attended their meetings, and have known them wait hours for the Spirit to move. I do not wish to speak derisively of this sect. Far from it. They do right in discarding carnal weapons; but the Word (the spirit) enjoins upon them and upon all who are called Christians, to use the weapons which the Spirit prescribes, and fight the good fight, to become valiant soldiers of the cross; to endure hardness, as soldiers on the tented field of strife.

Having the whole paraphernalia at hand, and at all times, for the prosecution of the Christian warfare and the motive which is held out, the great prize,—eternal life in the kingdom of God—certainly ought to be a sufficient stimulus to us, as soldiers of the cross to acquit ourselves like men and be strong, and like those to whom Paul refers as running the race, in allusion, no doubt, to Grecian games, where the candidate divested himself of every unnecessary weight, and where every muscle must be taxed to its utmost tension in order to attain the prize. The apostle has well said, that they run for a corruptible crown, but we run for an incorruptible.

Periodical and spasmodic actions are not characteristics even of soldiers fighting for conquest or a corruptible crown; much less should we expect the soldier of the cross to be thus actuated.

Not long since, I heard an eminent Methodist minister say it was "a shame that when business was not very urgent in the winter season, as paradoxical as it might seem, people get warmed up and they would almost invariably cool off in the summer season, when business drove; and," said he, "we think we have performed some great feat when at the end of the year we bring the people up to the point where we left them a year previous. No business man would invest his money where there was no actual gain, but he would seek some new field for the investment of his money."

This preacher did assign the cause of this declension; but it needs no prophet's ken to understand the true and only cause. Another spirit, outside of and independent of the Word, is invoked to do the work, thereby ignoring its claims. "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." Each weapon must be used for its appropriate work, and they cannot be misapplied with impunity, but every wrong committed, or any duty omitted, will recoil upon our own heads, as sure as effect follows cause. A famine, not of bread, but a famine of the Word, is the sole cause of the sad declension. If we lose sight of the crown of life as the reward, we shall surely suffer loss—the non-inheritance in the kingdom. This is the great beacon light to guide us into the desired haven. Victory is vouchsafed to the overcomers, and to those only. The servant is not greater than his Lord. If they have persecuted him, they will persecute his followers also.

BERLIN, June 15.—The Post says that since the outbreak of the war the Mohammedans in Palestine have again become particularly hostile to foreigners. Germany has renewed her representations to the Porte and Great Powers to insure the safety of German colonists there.

A Vienna correspondent telegraphs that advices from Constantinople show that great irritation is felt about the attitude of Titus of Greece. Pressing orders have been sent to the army to pacify Montenegro so that the troops may be sent to Thessaly as soon as possible.

A Bucharest correspondent sends the following: "The Minister of Foreign Affairs has just communicated to me the contents of a document emanating from the Commander-in-Chief of the Ottoman army, that every Roumanian soldier taken prisoner shall be put to death."

A Ploiesti dispatch states: "It is supposed operations will soon commence, as everything is prepared, but the Danube falls very slowly. There have been many departures from this place, but the destination of those who leave is kept profoundly secret."

A dispatch dated Shumla, June 12, says: "An attempt to cross is hourly expected. There is great excitement at Rustchuk and Shumla. There is every appearance of desperate fighting shortly."

LONDON, June 16.—Portugal has proclaimed her neutrality in the Russo-Turkish war. Germany will not issue a special proclamation of neutrality.

The Russians have definitely determined to make the passage of the Danube midway between Piketo and Turnu Magurieli. The preparations indicate early operations.

Count Schouvaloff is to assure England that the route to India by way of the Suez Canal and Persian Gulf is free; that the treaties will be observed and that the question of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles will be settled at the end of the war by European Congress. Beyond these points no engagement has been undertaken.

It would be uncharitable too severely to condemn for faults without taking some thought of the sterling goodness which mingles in and lessons them.

God's anger rests on the world of sinners, but his grace and love on the remnant of believers.

God's promises should be the guide and measure of our desires and expectations.

ZELL'S ENCYCLOPEDIA.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

This truly noble work contains 150,000 articles, 2,000 engravings, and eighteen splendid maps. Though a marvel of condensation, it is probably the best work in the language as a source of universal information.

George E. Plumbe, corresponding editor of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, says: Its conciseness, comprehensiveness, accuracy, and the scholarly treatment of the articles of a scientific, historical, biographical, and geographical nature, make it more desirable for the general reader than any other with which I am acquainted, and prefer, be at double its cost, certainly, to any other cyclopedia work of a similar character. I make this statement with pleasure because I firmly believe that a copy of Zell's Encyclopedia placed in any family containing young or middle aged people would be a stronger incentive to study and thought than could be afforded by the expenditure of double its outlay in any other direction.

Wendell Phillips says: I have examined Zell's Encyclopedia, and found in it almost everything I thought of looking for. The subjects are treated with a fulness which surprised me. In accuracy, I think you can risk comparison with any of your rivals; and one feature is especially valuable, that when you are unable to exhaust a topic, you can find out where fuller information may be found. It is just such a work as every one needs in his house for immediate reference, even if the Boys near a great public library.

John Emory, 146, East Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois, is special for this work, to whom all remittances should be made. T. Elwood Zell, Davis & Co., publishers, Nos. 17 and 19 South Sixth street Philadelphia, Pa.

Price $ [illegible]

Isaiah lxii. 6, 7.

Until in earth a praise
Jerusalem shall be,
Unceasingly your voices raise
Who Zion love—O, ye!
Till God himself arise,
Let Him your voices hear;
Till the Redeemer from the skies
In glory shall appear.

How long, O Lord, shall we Thy servants, wait the day?
Though long we wait, we trust in thee,
And still in faith we pray.
Come forth in might, O Lord,
And in thy glory great;
Through all the earth thy name be heard,
Thou only Potentate!

B. Hayes.

The Christian's Hope.

We're a little band of happy Christians here,
All a waiting for our King;
He has promised us he's coming back again,
And we know his word he'll redeem.

We will wait, we will wait,
We will wait till Jesus comes.

Yes, the bridegroom will come, though he has staid
His bride now to behold;
She will meet him then all beautiful arrayed,
In her clothing of wrought gold.

Then we'll watch and pray as we journey on the way,
While we're looking for our King;
For the signs declare that his coming is not far;
Oh, what a joy this will bring.

Rev. W. H. Poole's Course of Lectures.

"ANGLO-ISRAEL," "JACOB'S PILLOW," AND THE "GREAT PYRAMID."

The Rev. W. H. Poole, of Toronto lectured at Ridgetown on the 16th inst., on The Lost Ten Tribes of Israel;" at Palmyra, on the 17th, on Jacob's Pillow, and at Highgate on the 18th, on the Great Pyramid.

The lecture at Ridgetown, on Anglo-Israel, was deeply interesting, as was manifested by the marked attention of the audience. The reverend gentleman showed from Scripture that the twelve tribes were once united under one king, in the land of Palestine, but afterwards became divided into two kingdoms—the House of Israel, or the ten tribes, under King Jeroboam, and the House of Judah, or the two tribes, under King Rehoboam. It was shown that the ten tribes went into captivity about 725 years B. C. The distinction between the captivity of Israel and the captivity of Judah was clearly defined; Judah's captivity did not take place until about 588 B. C.; the ten tribes were carried into Assyria, the Jews to Babylon.

The lecturer then went on to state that the house of Israel, or ten tribes, had never returned from that day to this, while the Jews, or two tribes, (Judah and Benjamin) did return, after seventy years' captivity. Our Savior had commanded his disciples to "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any of the cities of the Samaritans go ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Matt. x. 5. It was shown that the disciples went into the very region where the ten tribes were dispersed, viz: Media, Pamphylia, Galatia, Cappadocia, Bithynia, Illyricum, etc.

Josephus was quoted as showing that up to his day the ten tribes were still beyond the Euphrates, an immense multitude, not to be estimated by numbers. The lecturer then quoted largely from the classic authors, viz:—Homer, Strabo, Herodotus, Diodorus, Pliny, etc., proving that the ancestors of the Anglo-Saxon, or British race, came from the very quarter to which the ten tribes were carried captive, and that their migratory course was westward until they landed in the British Isles, where, by immense increase, they have spread abroad to the east, west, north and south.

The following passages were quoted as applying to Israel after they had become settled in the British Isles: "The isles shall wait for his law," Isa. xlii. 4. "Sing unto the Lord a new song, the Isles and the inhabitants thereof," Isa. xlii. 10. "Hear the word of the Lord, O ye nations, and declare it in the isles afar off, and say, He that scattered Israel will gather him. Jer. xxi. 10. The lecturer produced some very ancient maps, showing that the western coast of Spain was called Tarshish, and that the British Isles were called the Isles of Tarshish; hence the importance of the expression in Isaiah lx. 9: "Surely the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold with them." This, the lecturer said, referred to the future return of Israel and Judah to Palestine, for which the events in the East were now rapidly preparing the way. The lecture occupied nearly two hours in delivery, embodying an amount of Scriptural and historical research that was truly marvelous.

"JACOB'S PILLOW."

Mr. Poole's second lecture was also listened to with much attention. The lecturer endeavored to prove that Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, was literally descended from the royal house of David, and that the Coronation Stone in Westminster Abbey, on which Queen Victoria and her ancestors have been crowned, in succession, for over 2,450 years, was the identical stone on which Jacob slept on his way to Padan-aram, when he had that wonderful dream of the future, and saw the ladder reach up to heaven, with angels ascending and descending on it. In Gen. xxviii. 18-22, we read that "Jacob rose early in the morning, and took the stone that he had put for his pillow, and set it up for a pillar, and poured oil on the top of it. And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, so that I come again to my father's house, then shall the Lord be my God: and this stone, which I have set for a pillar shall be God's house.

This stone was called by the Irish and Scotch, "Le Fail," and "The Stone of Destiny," but called chiefly by the English, "Jacob's Pillow." It was called the Stone of Destiny because a Prophetic Rune had attached itself to it for some 2,400 years, to this effect:

Cionioidh Scuit soor an fine,
Man he breag an Fats dine,
Mas a sin fuichte an Lia Fail,
Dligaid Flaithean do grabhail.

This Irish-Celtic verse had been rendered by Sir Walter Scott thus:

Unless the Fates are faithless grown,
And Prophet's voice be vain,
Wherever is found this Sacred Stone,
The Wander's Race shall reign.

The lecturer stated that this stone was carried in the procession by King David in the ascent to take possession of and consecrate the threshing floor of Araunah, the Jebusite, to install it, according to the Rev. F. R. A. Glover, as the chief corner stone of the future temple of Mount Zion. See Psa. cxviii. 22-28. It was supposed that Jeremiah—at the time of the Babylonish captivity—took this stone from where it had been placed in the temple, together with the holy vessels belonging to the temple, with Tephi, the daughter of Zedekiah, king of Judah, took passage in one of the ships of Dan, and landed in Ireland about 580 B. C. An Ulster prince had just been elected as Heremone, to rule over Ireland. He married the princess on condition that he would expel Baalism, and worship the true God, and form a College of Olams, or learned men. Jeremiah was commissioned to plant and to build, as well as to throw down and destroy the monarchy of Judah. Jer. i. 10; xlii. 10. Thus through this wonderful princess, a direct line of sovereignty perpetuated from the royal house of David down to Queen Victoria. The promise of God to David was that he "should never want a man to sit on the throne of Israel forever."

"THE GREAT PYRAMID."

A large diagram accompanied this very interesting lecture, intended to illustrate some of the leading features of the internal, as well as external structure of this vast monument.

The Great Pyramid was supposed by the lecturer to have been built by some one inspired—perhaps Melchizedek. It stood in latitude 30 degrees, at the center of an arc which swept the Delta of Lower Egypt. Mr. Poole quoted Isa. xix. 19, as having undoubted reference to the Great Pyramid: "In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt." This witness testimony, according to the Astronomer-Royal for Scotland, was only to be made manifest in the latter days.

The Great Pyramid, as shown on the diagram, was 480 feet in height, while its base covered nearly fourteen square acres. The date of its building was shown to be long before any profane history; yet it embodied most extensive thought, wonderful information, and far-reaching designs. Besides its prophetic utterances, it was far more scientific than any building yet erected. The Astronomer-Royal for Scotland spent five months measuring it, and has given his results in a work of sixteen hundred pages, and another work of five hundred pages. Colonel Howard Vyse has spent $360,000 exploring it.

The Great Pyramid gave the length of the sacred cubit, and contained the the whole system of Metrology employed by Moses. It gave the distance to the sun, the number of days, hours, minutes and seconds in our solar year.

It calculated the vast cycle which our sun performs around the brightest star in the Pleiades group, through the precession of the equinoxes. It gave the date of the dispersion of mankind—the date of its own building—the date of the giving of the law of Moses, and the exodus out of Egypt. The Great Pyramid also gave the date of our Saviour's birth, the length of his earthly life and ministry, showed his death and descent into Hades, as well as his glorious resurrection.

In his concluding remarks the reverend gentleman called especial attention to the Eastern question, now so deeply agitating the world. He mentioned several events that might be expected to happen in the East at no distant day; while the Great Pyramid, as he stated pointed to the year 1881 for some great event to transpire.

We understand that the people of Ridgetown are desirous to have the reverend Mr. Poole return and deliver a whole course on these subjects, now so deeply attracting the attention of so many of the learned and thoughtful, especially in Great Britain.

Surely I Come Quickly,

Last words are precious. Those spoken at partings, or by dying friends, are of peculiar value to us, and so are laid up in our hearts. There we remember them, treasure them, and ponder them as long as we live.

These are Jesus' last words to his church—his last revelation—his last promise—his last parting postscript to his closing letter—his last word of good cheer to his sorrowing bride—his last encouraging message to his elect church on earth, and his last warning to his foes who despised his reign.

SURELY I COME QUICKLY.

This is Christ's solemn warning to a wicked world. The world that rejected, derided and denied him, is summoned to meet him in judgment, and the period cannot long be deferred.

"Surely I come quickly," saith he that is faithful and true, who wears the many crowns, who treadeth the wine-press of the fierceness of the wrath of Almighty God, and who slayeth the wicked with the breath of his lips. Ah, the world may mock and rail, and deride, but the time is short. The King shall put on his blood-stained vesture, and, leading the armies of heaven, shall come in all his glory. Then shall wrath kindle her flames as above Sodom and Gomorrah of old—then shall vergeance robe herself in habiliments of war—then shall fiery indignation devour the foes of God, and stern justice shall slay the despisers of his grace.

Let not the proud vaunt themselves; let not the sinful exult; let not the mighty rejoice; let not the great grow presumptuous; for one greater than they all shall come and call them to his bar ere long.

Careless reader, Christ's solemn message to thee is, "Surely, I come quickly." Have you heard the tidings? The King of kings cometh to reign! Are you ready to meet him? Are you ready to stand before him? Are you at peace with him? You must meet—can you meet him in peace? Can you smile to see his face? Can you greet him with rapturous shouts and songs of glory?

Christ admonisheth and warneth the world, and his admonition and warning tell us that he cometh quickly. He sends this as the terrible potent in the ears of the unbelievers,—he lifts it up as a warning to the worldly, the money-seeking, the pleasure lovers, the gay and the vain and the proud. "Surely I come quickly." Who will hear the warning? Who will turn from buying and selling, from scheming and cheating, from voting and quarrelling, from dressing and flaunting, from feasting and rioting, to hear and heed the Savior's solemn words?

Christ blesseth his church with a parting promise, "Surely I come quickly." O, ye widowed and lonely ones!—O, ye sad of heart and stricken of soul!—O, ye children and desolate parents!—O, ye despised and grief-worn pilgrims!—to you Jesus says: "Surely I come quickly!" Count not the moments long—count not the toil too severe. The long-suffering of God is salvation. He is not slack concerning his promise. His measures of time are not limited like ours. One day with him is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

He cometh quickly. Though the weeks seem years, and the years seem ages to you, he seeth it all. He knows the sadness of your souls. He understands the agony of your spirits. He knoweth the deep yearning of the believer's heart, and he says, "Surely, I come quickly."

A little while and we shall see him. "Quickly," the dead shall awake and live. "Quickly," the scattered saints of God shall meet to part no more. "Quickly," the broken heart-strings shall be reknit in the eternal unity.

Beloved, let us be diligent, that we may be found of him in peace. Let us labor to save others, and let us answer our Savior's promise, "surely I come quickly," with his apostle's prayer, breathed from the depths of loyal and honest hearts, "Amen; even so come, Lord Jesus!"

May grace, mercy and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, be with all who love him sincerely, till we meet in glory. Amen.

Restoration of the Jews.

The general press in several countries, and even in Turkey, has lately frequently referred to the restoration of the Jews to their own country. Some papers have sneered at the idea, others have simply ridiculed it, while others again have spoken of it approvingly, and seem quite prepared to give it their support. Even the Times deemed it expedient to publish a letter in which the subject is ventilated, and we have at this moment before us an article in the Oriental Star, the organ of the league in aid of the Christians of Turkey, in which this restoration is commented upon in a friendly spirit. We can hardly be surprised at this. At a time when the existence of the Turkish empire trembles in the balance, and politicians begin to speculate on the possible heirs of the Ottoman dominions, the idea naturally suggests itself that there exist claimants to a portion of the succession, whose right cannot be disputed. The subject has been only very lately fully discussed in these columns. We need not travel over the same ground again. Whatever the aspirations of of Orthodox Jews may be—and we do not deny our sympathy with them—it is quite clear, while the obstacles pointed out by us are in the way, this desideratum next to it in importance, which is quite realizable, and in which the numerous friends of the dominant faith, who long to witness this achievement, and in whose minds it is associated with some of their holiest cravings, could lend us a helping hand. It is not in the power of the Jews to bring about their restoration. But it is in the power of individuals among them to go there to purchase land, to form settlements, and to organize communities that shall obey the Law of Moses in those hundreds of particulars which cannot be observed beyond the confines of the promised land. This process can only be gradual. But it requires means. An agency for promoting the material welfare of such settlers is already in existence. A fund is being collected in the name of the Montefiore Testimonial Fund, and administered by an influential and practical committee in our metropolis. Let those Gentile friends who long to see Israel's restoration come forward. Let those among them who wish to see this consummation lend a helping hand. Their contributions to this fund will be most acceptable. By such contributions they will show that it is not all talk, mere skin-deep sympathy; and that the debt of gratitude which they profess to owe to the Jew is not paid by mere advice that costs nothing—or idle talk of the wealth of the Jews, which, by the bye, is not true, the Jews as a race being exceedingly poor, although there are among them some very wealthy individuals; but they are ready to put their shoulders to the wheel, and subscribe to the fund mentioned as liberally as they do for the impracticable scheme of the conversion of the Jews. Indeed, the two ideas of restoration and conversion, so often united in the mind of the believer, are antagonistic and mutually destructive. For the converted Jew has no longer any reason to long for restoration, since his religious aspirations can be just as well gratified where he now is, and the Jew longing for restoration cannot but abhor the idea of conversion, since he craves for restoration, chiefly because he is anxious to fulfill the Law of Moses in all those particulars which Christianity professes to have abolished.—Jewish Chronicle.

Many Unto Thousands.

It has been a celebrated question whether the language of the second commandment means that God will visit the sins of sinful fathers upon their descendants unto the third and fourth generations; or that the third and fourth generations that suffer judgment are only such as themselves hate God. Evidently the former is meant, no matter how severe it may seem that even those who love God must suffer for the sins of their ancestors. The matter is greatly relieved when we consider that these entailed judgments do not pertain to the destiny of the soul, but only to the condition of disease, poverty and other physical effects.

In the same commandment is a gracious promise to those who love God and keep his commandments, even though they are suffering in this life from the sins of their fathers. God will show "mercy unto thousands of them that love" him and keep his commandments. "Thousands" means so many, or an infinite number of generations, not generations of the descendants of the faithful, whether good or bad, but thousands or any number of generations of them that love him will be granted mercy.—Religious Telescope.

Prophecy and the Turko-Russian War.

Mr. Wiley Jones, of Norfolk, Va, delivered a discourse in the Arcade last Thursday evening, which engaged the errupt attention of his audience. We give below a few points which we think will interest those of our readers who are watching with solicitude the course of the Eastern War.

He maintained that, if our interpretation of prophecy be correct, the ultimate destruction of the Turks is predicted in Revelation xvi. 12 to 16, under the symbolism of the drying up of "the great river Euphrates." In symbolic language a river is often put for the nation dwelling on or issuing from the region watered by that river. Thus in Isaiah viii. 7, "The Lord bringeth upon them the waters of the river, strong and many, even the King of Assyria and all his glory." Here the Assyrians were the ancient Euphratean power, just as the Turks, who issued from the regions bordering on the Euphrates, are the modern Euphratean power. Fleming, a distinguished writer on prophecy, considered that as the sixth trumpet (Rev. ix. 14 to 18) brought the Turks from beyond the Euphrates, so the sixth vial exhausts their power. Long ago, Martin Luther, in his "Table Talk," said "When the Turk begins to decline, then the last day will be at hand, for the testimony of Scripture must be verified." Luther had evidently been reading the 9th and 16th chapters of Revelation, the former predicting the rise, and the latter the fall of the Turks. But why do we say that the coming of the Lord is connected with the drying up of the Euphrates? Because the announcement of His coming occurs under the same vial with the announcement of the evaporation of that power. "The waters thereof were dried up. Behold I come as a thief; blessed is he that watcheth." Since A. D. 1821, the great Euphratean flood which had devastated so much of Europe, Asia and africa, has been constantly running out. By revolts, massacres, plagues, conflagrations, etc., within; as well as by persistent encroachments upon its territories by foes without, the Turkish empire has been gradually approaching its end, in fulfillment of prophecy.

But, wonderful to relate, another sign of the nearness of the Lord's coming is to be seen simultaneously with the decay of the Turk. That other sign is the southward march of the Russian. The present Russian tactics bear a striking resemblance to those of Grant and Sherman, when the latter marched to the sea. While the Czar is holding the main body of the Turkish army on the Danube in defence of of Constantinople, one of his generals is cutting his way through Turkey in Asia; and may perhaps come out at Joppa in Asia, or at the Persian Gulf. In the 38th chapter of Ezekiel the Russian is represented as issuing from his place, "out of the north parts" (ver. 15) and coming "against the mountains of Israel" (i. e. Palestine, ver. 8.) "in the latter days" or "latter years," verses 8, 16. And "at the same time" the Lord will come, for He says (ver. 18, 19,) "all the men that are upon the earth shall shake at my presence." Then will the Czar and his confederated host of nations be miraculously overthrown by pestilence, blood, hail, fire and brimstone. In the translation by the "American Bible Union I find the following notes appended to Gen. x, 2, "Magog, inhabitants of Caucasus and neighboring regions, the western Scythians; mentioned in Ezekiel 38, 2, as the people (or country) of Gog, "the prince of Rosh, Meshec and Tubal," as properly translated, Rosh according to the best authorities) is identical with Rus and Russian, and is the earliest trace of that powerful people."

Do not understand me to say that the present war must rush, without any cessation or interruption, to the end here described. There may be a short "breathing spell," a brief "peace," either before or after the Czar shall capture Constantinople in his southward march. But that peace will be brief indeed; and then will come the grand overthrow of all human governments, for the Lord Jesus will appear personally on the scene, and establish, literally and visibly, "the kingdom of God" on all the earth. "When ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. Lu. xxi. 31. In conclusion the speaker implored his hearers with fervent exhortation, to believe "The gospel of the kingdom of God;" to be "baptized for the remission of sins;" and to continue henceforth in holiness of life that so they may be saved in that awful day "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the gospel."—Elizabeth Daily Journal, June 9, 77.

The second part of Luther's Old Testament translation in the Reformer's own handwriting, dating as far back as 1528, has been discovered by the director of the Ducal Archives at Zerbst, Anhalt.

The first attempt to rival English journalism in India by a paper in Hindostance is soon to be made in Bombay. It is to be edited by native Mohammedans, though probably an European will be employed as an associate.

The equality in point of numbers of the sexes is most nearly attained in France. For every 1,000 men there are 1,007 women. The other extreme is found in Paraguay, where there are 2,089 women for 1,000 men.

Whole trenches of bones have been discovered on the plantation of Sheriff Black, at Middle Sound, S. C. Some of the skulls are in a fine state of preservation, and from their shape, as well as the presence of various implements, it is thought the spot was an ancient Indian burial ground.

A Providence man who is fond of statistics, conceived an idea about a year ago that he would keep a memorandum to show just how many men with whom he should have dealings, would do as they agreed. Thus far only four out of 623 have the right kind of a mark against them.

In the annual report of the Michigan State Board of Health, Dr. Scott describes a disease that he thinks is a result from the use of tobacco. The patient feels a violent pain in the left side, and believes his heart is affected. The trouble is a rheumatic condition of the wall of the chest. Abstinence from tobacco cures.

Among the interesting relics in Paris are the celebrated lilacs in the gardens of the Luxembourg, which at last accounts were in full flower, at the age of 350 years. They were planted by Maria de Medicis. Cardinal Richelieu was a passionate lover of flowers, and among these lilacs he frequently walked, plucking the branches, with which to decorate his reception room. There are eighty trees in all, and frequenters of the garden have never found them in such exuberant bloom as the present year.

It has become understood in diplomatic circles that England is negotiating with Turkey for the purchase of the Island of Crete. By this Turkey will acquire a large sum for war purposes, and England will acquire another important maratime position in the Mediterranean. Engineers and scientists are now exploring the island, with a view of reporting to an English company upon its mines and other resources. This company will aid in the purchase by paying the British Government a large sum for land and rights.

Gold has been discovered in Persia. The story is that in a village about 180 miles from Teheran, an old man has been observed to make mysterious visits to the mountains. His house was searched by an official, and a small crucible, a forge, appliances for melting, and nearly $80 worth of pure gold were discovered. The man stated that for several years he had found gold in the mountains, and expressed his will ingness to show the spot. As the mountains were then covered with snow, no investigation could be made immediately; but considerable excitement has been aroused, and it is rumored that the Shah himself will visit the spot in the spring.

Mrs. Thompson, a daughter of Alexander Campbell, founder of the sect of Campbellite Baptists, and a famous man in Kentucky in days gone by, has been appointed postmistress at Louisville, Kentucky. Alexander Campbell was born in Ireland in 1788. His father was a presbyterian clergyman, as was the son. After completing his theological course at Glasgow, he joined his father who had a short time before sailed for America. They at once united in a movement against the stringency of Church creeds, and agreed on a platform and a name on which they thought all sects might unite. The platform was, "The word of God without note or comment;" the name was "Christians." At first they had no thought of forming a new sect, but to work with and in the Presbyterian Church; but their rejection of infant baptism and insistance on immersion led to a separation. In 1815 their followers had increased to five or six congregations. They soon became unacceptable to the Baptists, who in 1827 excommunicated them. After this they organized separately. At present they maintain a large number of educational institutions, nine weekly papers, fifteen monthlies, and one quarterly. They have representatives in England and Canada, but are most numerous in the Western and Southern states. Their number in the United States is about 6,000 churches and 600,000 members.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates no name to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as priests with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance, and baptism as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Turkey and Russia in Prophecy and History.

An Interpretation "Of What shall Come to pass Hereafter."

A. B. MAGRUDER.

He would be justly deemed a bold man, who should undertake, from the strength of his own intellect or the resources of his own wisdom, to foretell or even to foreshadow the future destiny of our race and world. In no case, perhaps, would there be [illegible] to deliver this lecture, and in selecting as its title an enquiry so broad and startling as, "What shall come to pass hereafter?" I am not unconscious of the animadversion I may provoke by embarking on a discussion generally regarded as obscure and difficult, the solution of which has called forth the efforts of the wisest and most learned of mankind. If, indeed, I relied on any knowledge or capacity that I possess to guide me in this investigation, or any means of information other than those accessible to any other ordinary man in the community, I might well shrink from the responsibility of the work before me; but, in truth, I make no such pretensions. I attempt no such vain task. My humbler office is to interpret what is already written by the Highest wisdom; to investigate, modestly, yet fairly, the two great volumes of reason and revelation which lie open before us; to survey the broad field of prophecy and history in the grand departments of the past and the future, and combining with the light radiating from these sources, a just estimate and rational understanding of present current events as signs of the times, to cast the horoscope of human destiny and work out the problem of our impending future. Whilst thus hastening to disclaim in advance all prophetic gifts or powers, may we not, however, lawfully occupy ourselves with what has long been written in the prophetic records and with what we know of human history, and logically trace out results which these sources of knowledge open to us?

Prophecy and history have definitions. Prophecy is justly defined to be history unwritten, while history is prophecy accomplished. Prophecy is history written beforehand, and history is the record of the fulfillment of prophecy. One treats of the future in advance of events; the other of that future when accomplished and enrolled in the records of the past and transmitted to posterity. These volumes mutually support each other, and are both contained, mainly, in one Book. They claim the attentive investigation of all intelligent beings, for they affect, of necessity, the destiny and fortunes of man and his dwelling-place.

"Tis true we are often checked, in mid career, in our efforts to discern the future, even in a matter which so nearly concerns us, by the chilling criticism or the stern warning that we can know nothing certain of the future; that the prospect before us is confessedly—even designedly—obscure and impenetrable," which no man hath seen or can see," and that it is but waste of time to seek to explore it.

This common but strong prejudice against any attempt, however modest and cautious, to propound an accurate statement of coming events is, perhaps, natural, and if this disability be referred to our limited intellectual vision, unaided by Divine revelation, the charge is readily confessed; for, in this sense, it is indeed true that "we know not what a day may bring forth;" but if we suppose that our Maker has purposely kept us in the dark and supplied us with no light by which we could certainly know the future; that we cannot discern "the things which shall come to pass hereafter," such a conclusion is, in my humble judgment, a great mistake. The knowledge we seek—knowledge of the great future before us, is not to be found, however, in the haunted stores of human science or learning. If we follow such blind guides we shall only add one more to the scattered wrecks which strew the shores of previous navigators of an unknown sea,—explorers who have come back to us only to report their bitter disappointment and thus confirm the epitaph written by the finger of God, and still legible on the tomb of nations, that "The world by its wisdom knows not God." Hence it is to God himself, in history and prophecy, we make our appeal. We do so,

1. Because it is the Supreme Intelligence alone that can reveal the future to us, and

2. Because the Holy Scriptures form the most authentic and venerable, in fact the only true and faithful repository of the history of mankind.

If we accept the contrary position, that we cannot discern the future, which is thus beyond our apprehension, how can we escape, on that cheerless hypothesis, the obvious conclusion that that which is unintelligible is useless, and hence that all the prophetic writings, comprising fully one-half of the sacred volume must be of little or no value to mankind. Would not this be to impeach the Divine Wisdom and plainly to contradict the statements of the Holy Record? If, on the contrary, we concede the Bible to be a full and complete revelation from its Author, having seen its exact fulfillment of the past as attested by history, may we not safely confide in its prophetic statements and pictures of the future?

If, indeed, we close these volumes for the time and allow the voice of enlightened reason alone to speak, we should certainly argue, with inexorable logic, the wisdom and necessity of some design in the human creation and of the revelation of that design to man who is to be affected by it, for we may rationally ask, must generations of men and animals and a countless series of flora and fauna perpetually succeed each other? Must human history always repeat itself? Must men be ever rehearsing their respective parts in the drama of human life and never actually performing the final role? Is there no issue or end to the Book of human life and destiny? We cannot so affirm without shocking reason, confounding common sense, all the instincts and convictions of our common nature, and all the statements and reasonings of revelation, which point us to the past and present as well as the future of our race and world, as plainly declared to us in the Bible. If these Divine oracles be permitted to speak for themselves, and we bend a listening ear to their voice, how can we doubt, either their intelligibility, their authenticity, or their significance? How shall we venture to ignore such plain and positive statements as the following, without mentioning many others which might be accumulated to the same effect:

David saith: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will shew them his covenant."

Isaiah: "Behold the former things are come to pass and new things do I declare. Before they spring forth, I tell you of them."

Daniel: "There is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets and maketh known to the king, Nebuchadnezzar, what shall be in the latter days." That in reference to events "at the time of the end, the wise shall understand."

Again, our Lord saith: "All things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you."

Peter saith: "Ye do well to take heed unto the sure word of prophecy as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn and the day star arise in your hearts." And, finally, that Amos, one of these prophets, saith very pointedly, "Surely the Lord will do nothing but that he revealeth his secrets to his servants the prophets." And St. Paul is very emphatic, when quoting from Greek the imposing and oft cited passage in support of the opposite conclusion, that "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him;" he adds the declaration that "God hath revealed them unto us by his spirit in the Bible, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God."

From such premises we can safely abide by the conclusion that our future hath been wisely disclosed to us, and that we have the material, in prophecy and history, for working out the problem of what shall be hereafter.

After these preliminary observations tending to clear the horizon of the clouds of doubt and difficulty which would otherwise obstruct our view, we proceed to enquire: What say the Sacred Oracles on the premises before us? How readest thou?

We open the Bible then, and turning to the first verse of the first chapter of the first Book in it, we read these words: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," and turning to the last part of the last Book of the same Record, we read: "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away."

Was ever Book placed in man's hands with supreme claims to his interest, his admiration and his astonishment; opening with the announcement of the creation of one world and closing with the promise of the creation of another!

From this great primal truth, taught us in Genesis i. 1, we deduce, by simple logic, the following imposing conclusions:

1. That the Bible contains, within itself, the two volumes of prophecy and history. It acquaints us with the origin and history of one world, and foretells the creation of another with its characteristics, "wherein dwelleth righteousness."

2. The present world is not—as philosophy and scientists maintain—an end, a finality, but a means to an end yet future; that we are living under a temporary and provisional, not a permanent government; that our world awaits new decrees of destiny from its Divine Creator.

3. That it is the purpose of the Great Founder and builder of all things, at some time in the future, to supersede and remodel the present cosmos, and, out of its elements to reconstruct a new dwelling-place for man—though still on this earth—which shall "never be moved out of its place," and which "endureth forever," wherein he shall work out the great destiny for which God intended him in the beginning, when "the seed of the woman shall have bruised the serpent's head;" when there shall be reconciliation and harmony between God and man, and the long-promised "glory to God in the highest and on earth peace and good will among men" shall be happily realized.

Now we are to consider the means by which these ends are to be compassed; for God works by means to accomplish his will to-us-ward; for as by man sin came into the world and death by sin, so by man e mes also the resurrection from the dead, and redemption from the bondage of sin and death.

It is declared by Moses in Deuteronomy xxxii. 8, that "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance; when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel." Now this "segregation of the sons of Adam" took place in the year 2218 before Christ (Gen. xi. 8), and at the dispersion of the people at the attempted building of the tower of Babel, and 267 years before the calling of Abraham, which was the beginning of the Jewish nation, the house of Jacob.

Such is the early record of God's purpose and design to regulate and control the affairs of the human race of all nations, with special reference to his own land and people, even before they were called and chosen.

The Apostle Paul taught the same great truth when he told the Athenians that God "had determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their (the nations') habitation .... Because he hath appointed a day in the which he would judge (rule or govern) the world in righteousness by that man whom he had ordained, whereof he hath given assurance unto all men in that he hath raised him from the dead.

There was this further and peculiar evidence of God's same special purpose in respect to the children of Israel as recorded in Num. xxiii. 9, that "they (Israel) should not be reckoned among the nations," etc., a decree which has always distinguished and separated them from all other people; and from the beginning they have been known in Bible history, not as a religious sect, as generally supposed and treated, but as a peculiar people, God's "nation," once peopling but now for many centuries dispersed and scattered from God's land ("the land is mine," saith the Lord), to which they have been long ago promised they should be restored. One of their prophets, Hosea, chapter iii., saith of them, prophetically, long ago what we see now about to be fulfilled: "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a King, and without a Prince, and without a sacrifice, and without a pillar, and without an ephod, and without terraphim. Afterward shall the children of Israel return and seek the Lord, their God, and David (the beloved son) their king, and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days."

We see in these plain statements a clear purpose of the Great Architect of our world and the Divine Ruler of its peoples, to shape our ends and all human actions and events with constant reference—thus early declared—to a pre-determined result which shall secure man's ultimate happiness and exalt his own wisdom and benevolence. He divides the race of mankind, in his vocabulary, into two classes, nationally, viz.: The Jews and the Gentiles; the former being the hereditary descendants of his chosen friend, Abraham, through the line of Isaac and Jacob; and the latter, comprehensively, as all other nations. Hence we have in the Bible the generation or dispensation of the Jews and the times of the Gentiles; and in the epistle to the Ephesians, the union of both, in the phrase "the dispensation of the fulness of times when God will gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth (divine and human) even in him, in whom we (Christians) have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated (whether Jew or Gentile, according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."

Both David and Daniel tell us plainly that it is not man (who in his vanity, pride and self-sufficiency thinks so) that really rules in this world. It is God that overrules him, and makes all his plans subsidiary to his own purposes; for we are taught in the Divine Record that God makes even "the wrath of man to praise him and the remainder thereof he restraineth."

Psalm xxii. teaches us that "God is the governor among the nations;" and Psa. lxxv. 6, 7, that "promotion cometh neither from the east, nor the west, nor the south; but God is the judge: he putteth down one and setteth up another." And Daniel admonished Nebuchadnezzar that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."

Now, it is thus purpose of the union or unification of all races and peoples under one government that invests with peculiar interest and significance the modern idea, so conspicuously prominent in the recent desire and movements of separated peoples of the same or kindred races and religions, of common traditions, historical antecedents and national or racial sympathies, to mingle in association to reconstruct their ancient nationalities and thus fuse into one grand and harmonious combination. Thus we already have, as the result of these ideas, an united consolidation of the smaller kingdoms of the Italian peninsula as "one Italy" under Victor Emanuel, the old nationalities of the Magyars and Sclavs coming to the front, and being known in the Austrian empire as part and parcel of the one modern nationality of Austria-Hungary, the head of that government being known and declared in all international relations as Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary. So, too, we find the innumerable and heterogeneous masses of the little German states shattered and moulded into one, under the broad banner and strong and wide sceptre of the Prussian Kaiser, known as "Emperor of Germany." This process of decomposition and re-construction, all under one law found expression, too, in western Europe, in the open assumption, on the first day of January, 1877, by the Queen of England, with the full sanction of parliament, of the comprehensive additional title of "Empress of India." France, too, in championing the cause of papal Rome, not many years ago, and in keeping a French army there for more than ten years, was impelled by the well-known idea of Louis Napoleon to create and consolidate a sort of protectorate over the Latin nations of Europe under his supremacy, by the comprehensive name of Pan-Latinism as a counterpoise to the Russian ambition of uniting all the Greek and Sclavic races under a similar system, begun by the Autocrat Nicholas and yet pursued by his successor, and known as Pan-Sclavism.

Now, it is just this broad and wide-spread agitation of such schemes and ideas that has produced the present crisis in international politics known as the eastern question, the solution of which now begins to convulse all nations.

Ideas are powerful levers. They always precede and produce revolutions. They impel these struggles to their final issues. Like engines or other descending bodies on an inclined plane, they soon get beyond the restraining powers of engineers and brakemen, and the catastrophe ends only in wreck and ruin. Such are the perils which now environ this war in the east. It will prove a Pandora's box of ills which will disturb and afflict all those who may desire to maintain that persistent statu quo ante bellum, which European publicists so ardently desire—"the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire"—of Turkish rule in Europe. This further perpetuation of savage rule, of brutal domination by these cruel and barbarous Turks, over a country and people not their own, is plainly forbidden by the Divine decree, no less than by all the instincts of humanity, and God is about to bring to nought the wisdom of the wise and the understanding of the prudent, in reversing their arrogant mandates. A signal rebuke, an indignant overthrow, is about to be administered to the daring audacity—it may be the thoughtless impiety—committed by the Great Powers in decreeing as they have done by their paper bulletins and protocols for half a century past, that Turkey shall not die; that the Autocrat's "sick man" shall continue sick indefinitely; and yet they see daily the steady progress of the fatal disease, the atrophy which is rapidly consuming his vitals! What presumption in them to decree perpetual health and vigor to a moribund patient that the course of events no less than God's righteous displeasure has doomed to certain and rapid dissolution! It is these incontestible facts that rivet the conclusion on all fair minds that the situation cannot be improved or averted, and that "the drying up of the great river Euphrates," the evaporation of the Turkish rule in Europe and Asia, is now a manifest destiny.

These obvious considerations bring us in direct contact with the pending war between the Czar and the Sultan, and oblige us to look to its issues and results. Turkey, in Europe, has long weighed too heavily on the fairest and most highly favored part of that continent. Descendants of Ishmael and Esau, "their hand is against every man, and every man's hand against them." They acknowledge no community of feeling or interest with Europeans, and utterly fail to comprehend, far less to sympathize in, the sentiments and ideas of union and co-operation of races and nationalities to which we have just referred, as impelling all European nations to unity and consolidation under one chief. A gluttony, irresponsive stationary despotism, holding the gateway between two continents, and desolating and destroying where they should build up and bless, it now stops the way of national progress and improvement, and becomes a curse to her unhappy subject populations of a far different and superior race.

Turkey in Europe is now plainly a nuisance and an obstruction to progress of which all Europe is tired and ashamed. To drive her, with her hordes of cruel, ferocious and savage bandits and brigands, out of Europe, into her native Asiatic deserts, is the acceptable task which the Russian Autocrat has undertaken, independently, in which he is heartily sustained and upheld by every enlightened friend of humanity who takes means to inform himself.

It is not, however, with reference to this special result, desirable as it is, that we propose to deal with the subject here. It is in connection with great and world-wide events associated with the coming downfall of the Moslem despotism, that we are chiefly concerned at present. This event with its immediate consequents is the last grand finale of the achievements of Gentile times. It ends that great epoch in prophetic chronology and history, and proclaims to mankind the end of "the times of the Gentiles," and thus closes up that Bible era. The fall of Turkey necessarily works the liberation of Palestine, Jerusalem, and God's ancient people—the Jews—from Moslem rule, and opens the new era appointed for their full restoration to the long-forfeited favor and protection of Jehovah! It is this that gives it supreme significance in the eyes of the watching and waiting servants of God, for the Lord Jesus saith to his disciples, in referring to these latter day events, "when you see these things begin to come to pass, then know that the end is nigh, even at the doors;" then "lift up your heads for the kingdom of God is at hand, and your redemption draweth nigh." Also, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled."

Paul, too, saith to his Roman brethren, as if preparing us, their successors of these latter days, for a full apprehension of the events now passing before our eyes: "If the casting away of them (the Jews) be the reconciling of the (Gentile) world, what shall the receiving (restoration) of them (the Jews) be but life from the dead"?

Now, from these premises, we see that the overthrow of the Turks by the Russians in the pending war means, not alone the redemption of the Greek and Sclavic populations in eastern Europe from the Turkish yoke, but also the emancipation of the land and people of Israel from Moslem domination and tyranny under which both have suffered so long and so severely. This latter means the recolonization of Palestine by the ancient people of God, according to numerous and unconteatible prophecies to that effect, with all their immense wealth and resources of modern civilization, by which in a few years, the land so long desolate and smitten by the hand of God, will be restored to its ancient and wonderful fertility and prosperity, the Jews from all quarters, flocking to their ancient heritage—the once famous land of their fathers. This ingathering will be the immediate harbinger of the coming of Christ, the King of Israel, in great majesty and power, from his present position at God's right hand in heaven; the re-establishment of David's throne on Mount Zion; the ultimate discovery and return of all the tribes of Jacob to Jerusalem; the resurrection of the saints from their graves; the change of the living servants of God on earth when he comes, and the immortalization of both classes (this being the first resurrection), and their association, as kings and rulers with the Christ who is then King of kings and Lord of lords, over all nations and peoples "under the whole heavens;" the consequent downfall and supersedure of all existing empires, kingdoms, republics and other governments and institutions civil, social and ecclesiastical, among men, and the erection on their ruins of God's kingdom, ruled by his Son, our Lord, according to numerous promises and predictions, notably Psa. ii. 6-10; Luke i. 30-35; Rev. xi. 15; v. 9-11; xx. 4.

It would require a volume to present the arguments and testimony in detail. The limits of our task forbid enlargement. An outline of the great subject is all that can be attempted. The hearer and reader must supply the obvious deficiencies of our work, by searching the Scriptures for himself.

The Restitution.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 11, 1877.

WE will find place for conference reports next week; also for several communications from different brethren.

SOME of our friends are desirous of having what was called the Preachers' Directory published at least once a month. Shall try and do this in a week or two.

WE are in receipt of the June number of The Common School Teacher, published monthly at $1.00 a year at Bedford, Ind. The sample is creditable. Address the Teacher as above.

THE July number (No. 4) of a new paper entitled, The True Citizen, is at hand. It is a monthly of thirty-two pages. The number sent is very readable. It is from the N. Y. Mercantile Journal Co., 320 Pearl St., New York.

OUR brethren are talking up the question of holding a general meeting for the whole state. The conferences in the state are now virtually one, and if matters could be arranged it would be a good idea to have a general meeting at some central point in the state.

OUR brethren in Iowa were greatly in need of a tent. The one used at the camp meeting belonged to a private party. We are pleased to announce that enough money was subscribed on the camp ground to buy a new tent. Each state should have a tent for its annual meetings, and also for the convenience of those localities where there are no houses of worship.

OUR publication expenses are met and nothing more. If brethren will promptly renew and do a little extra we hope to get through the remaining six months of the year without further breaks. Our editorial services are free this year. At the end of the year we anticipate resigning the paper into hands better qualified for editorial responsibilities. Thus far the Lord has helped us. Praise to his holy name.

DO NOT fail to read the article from Brother A. B. Magruder on account of its length. It will repay a careful perusal. Our readers also will be gratified to see a communication from Brother H. Wilson, once more. His articles are always instructive, and we hope he will employ his pen far more frequently both to edify the brotherhood as well as to enlighten the honest inquirer after truth.

FOR the satisfaction of all, and the particular benefit of one or two individuals, we will say, that there has never been a single penny of dividend made to stockholders belonging to the Christian Publishing Association. They do not expect anything of this kind in the present age. What they have done has been freely done for the cause of truth. These very brethren, that have already given sums varying from ten dollars to four hundred dollars, are the very ones that are paying for extra papers for the poor, unable to pay for themselves, and for the widows.

Our Western Trip.

Brother Chaplin:—Having just returned from Iowa, I will give you a brief account of my journey. When I left home (June 15), I was afflicted with a severe hoarseness, which lasted me all the time I was gone. Was able, however, to speak to the people upon the great questions of our faith and hope. The camp meeting, at New Hartford, was a great success. Not a jar among those who are interested in the gospel of the kingdom of God. There were six meetings each day; three social meetings and three for preaching the Word. We met at this meeting many whom we had never seen before, and were happy to find so many intelligent believers in the gospel of our blessed Lord, in Iowa. The cause of truth is on the rise in that young and flourishing state, and we trust that many who now see men as trees walking, will soon behold the beauty and simplicity of the ancient faith. We met a goodly number of those who labor in word and doctrine, and found them intelligent and progressive, willing to receive all the light possible from the Sacred Word of truth. The preaching was practical, instructive and harmonious; the interest was all that could be desired, and the outlook is very encouraging. Thousands from the outside world were in attendance on Sundays to hear the Word of life. We left the camp feeling that much good had been done for the cause of our dear Lord.

From this point we went to West Irving, Iowa, where there is a noble band of earnest hearts struggling for the crown at the coming of our King. We remained at this point one week, speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. Brother Stephenson was with me, and did his share of the preaching. This church has been much strengthened during the last year, under the efficient labors of Brother Myers, whose influence is excellent in the community. We were much pleased with our new acquaintances and were made glad to meet those whose faces were familiar in times gone by. May the good work go on, not only in Iowa, but throughout the world, is our earnest prayer.

H. V. REED.

Exegetical.

Beware, lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ.—Col. ii. 8.

It is not perhaps known to the mass of English readers, that the word "spoil" in this text is not used in the familiar sense of injure, mar, corrupt, make useless, in which sense, in fact, the word, is scarcely ever used in our version of the Bible, but as equivalent to making a prey—"beware lest any man make a prey of you through philosophy and vain deceit." The word is συλαγωγων, one who carries anything off as spoil, from συλη or σιλον, a prey, a spoil, and αγω, to lead away. The term is of course usually applied to depredations upon one's property or effects, but here, by a striking figure, to persons. And so also Prov. xxii. 23, "For the Lord will plead their cause, and spoil the soul of those that spoiled them." The same import of preying upon instead of thieving, is to be recognized in the following passage: "Or else how can one enter into a strong man's house and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man? and then he will spoil his house." Matt. xii. 29. In both these last cases the original word is διαρπασαι, to rob, to plunder, to take away by violence.—Prof. Bush, in Hierophant.

[The word which is the subject of Prof. Bush's exegete, occurs only once in the original of the New Testament. Bagster's Analytical Lexicon says the word means, "metaphorically, to make victims of imposture in the later Greek. Schleusner paraphrases the text—"Cavete, ne quis vobis libertatem vestram (nempe a lege Mosaica cæremoniali) eripiat per fraudem doctrinæ judaizantis;" which we render, "Be cautious, lest anyone should plunder away from you your liberty (that is from the ceremonial law of Moses) through the frauds of Judaism."—ED.]

Eastern Items.

Bucharest, July 6.—The 120,000 Russians who have crossed the Danube at Sistova embrace 20,000 cavalry and 250 cannon. About 8,000 more Russians are concentrated between Simnitza and Turnu-Magurelli. The army which crossed at Sistova has been divided into three bodies, the principal of which is marching on Rustchuk, and the other two toward the Balkans and Nikopolis respectively.

It is rumored that the first act of the Skuptschina will be a declaration of Servian independence.

An official despatch announces that the Dobrudscha is completely cleared of Turks as far as Trajan's Wall.

The Russians continue to cross the Danube uninterruptedly day and night.

Constantinople, July 6.—The arrival of the British fleet in Besika Bay is regarded with great dissatisfaction by influential Turks, who consider it simply as a sign that England is preparing to seize her share of the plunder.

St. Petersburg, July 9.—The following is a dispatch from the Czarewitz, dated yesterday: "A body of cavalry, with one battery, surprised Tirnova Saturday and captured the Turkish camp with ammunition and baggage. The Turks retreated to Osman-Bazar. Our infantry and artillery are approaching Tirnova."

London, July 9.—It is said the Government has information that the Russians intend to occupy Constantinople at all risks, unless the Turks anticipate that event by making peace on the Czar's terms.

The Sultan recently, at a private audience, declared to Mr. Layard, the British representative, that he would not guarantee protection to the Christians if the Russians continue to excite rebellion in Bulgaria and perpetrate atrocities in Asia Minor.

A very singular feature in the marine landscapes between Terra del Fuego and the contiguous mainland, is the floating gardens of seaweed. The plant frequently grows to a length of between 300 and 400 feet. It gives cover and pasturage to every species of crustacea, great and small, while the intertangled mass, swaying like a ponderous curtain on the winter, effectually breaks the shock of the most tremendous rollers.

The "Second Coming" of Christ.

Although we nowhere read this phrase in the Bible yet the doctrine is plainly taught. The prophets wrote of the coming One as a sufferer, and a glorious King, but they do not distinctly divide his first and second advents. The apostle Peter says that the prophets searched and inquired diligently as to what manner of time the spirit did signify "when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow." 1 Pet. i. 10, 11. They clearly predicted the facts of the humiliation and glory of the Messiah, but not the period of time that should elapse between the two. The apostles themselves did not understand this matter, until enlightened by the spirit. Then, they could plainly state, that Jesus had been exalted by the right hand of God, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God, "until his enemies be made his footstool," and "until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Acts ii. 35; iii. 21; Heb. xii. 2. The same Jesus that was taken up into heaven is to come in like manner. Acts i. 11. A real, literal, personal, visible coming. "Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Heb. ix. 28. This is no mythical affair. It cannot be figured away. It is the true disciple's hope. To him, everything centers in and depends upon the return of his Lord. When that event takes place, if he should have fallen asleep in Jesus, he knows he will hear the Master's voice and awake with his likeness. (Psa. xvii. 15; 1 John iii. 2.) If alive and looking for Him, he knows from apostolic testimony, that with the resurrected ones he will be gathered together unto him. (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17; 2 Thess. ii. 1.)

The second coming of Christ is revealed to us in the Scripture in a twofold aspect. First, as a quiet, stealthy, thief-like affair. Second, as public, visible, and attended with demonstrations of power and great glory. A coming for his saints and a coming with his saints. And yet not two comings, but one in two stages. The testimony, I think, is plain and convincing on this point. An article appeared in the RESTITUTION some time ago, denouncing those who thus divide the future coming of Christ into two parts, and stigmatizing as deceivers, and not to be believed, all who preach a secret coming; and the dear reader is cautioned to beware of such deceivers. Now, in common with many others, I have for a long time believed and taught such a doctrine, because I believe it to be so revealed. There is such a thing as "rightly dividing the word of truth." Such workmen need not be ashamed. 2 Tim. ii. 15. Let us labor for this honor. The Word is consistent with itself when properly understood. If there seems to be a want of harmony between its statements on some points of doctrine, it is because we do not properly divide it, and misapply what it says. I will state a few propositions with reference to the second coming of Christ, and adduce proofs to show that it must be in two stages and to two classes.

1. When Christ comes in his glory his saints will be with him. Zechariah the prophet, when describing the inauguration of the day of the Lord, predicts the gathering of the nations against Jerusalem to battle. Then he says "then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle." At that time he comes to Mount Olivet, and all the saints with him, and delivers his people the Jews from their enemies. Zech. xiv. 1-5. This battle of the nations at Jerusalem, is referred to in Rev. xvi. 14 as "the war of that great day of God Almighty" when the kings of the whole habitable will be gathered together. In Rev. xvii. this is given more in detail, and designated as the war of the ten kings with the Lamb. "These (kings) shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings; and they that are with him, are called, and chosen, and faithful." Verse 14. This same war and conqueror is alluded to in Rev. xix. 11, where John says: "And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war." This many-diademed rider is followed or attended by a splendid army of heavenly cavalry, arrayed in fine linen, white and clean. These are the glorified saints, who come with their Lord. Jude writes that Enoch prophesied, saying, "The Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment on all that are ungodly," etc. Verses 14, 15. Paul also writes to the Thessalonians about the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints. 1 Thess. iii. 13. Do not these passages prove that when Christ comes in power and great glory that his saints will be with him?

2. If the saints are with him when he thus comes, then they must have been reaurrected or changed, and gathered together unto him prior to his descent on the Mount of Olives. What other deduction can we reasonably make? And is not this positively proved by the revelation of Paul to the Thessalonians by the word of the Lord, when he says, "the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. At what point in the aerial this meeting will take place, I know not, for it is not revealed. Jesus was taken up, and so the approved ones will be. To some point in the atmosphere Jesus will come when he leaves the heavenly regions, and there the saints will meet him, and from that place of meeting the Lord will come with his glorious church. Some one may object and say that Paul uses language descriptive of this coming of the Lord which implies publicity and grandeur, for he says "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God." The objector must admit, however, that Paul says nothing here about the shout, voice, or trumpet being heard by any one but those who are immediately concerned. Indeed, the language would imply that heaven is the place where the sounds are uttered and heard, as it is from heaven that the Lord descends into the aerial. True, our Savior has said "the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God," and that "the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth." John v. 28. Also, Paul states that "the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (the living) shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv. 52. This he calls the last trump. There is no evidence whatever, that the world at large will hear one note of this trumpet blast, or be made aware by that means that the King of kings is on his way from heaven to earth. Jesus in his parables and conversations with his disciples intimates that he would come first to to his servants, "in an hour when ye think not." Also, that it would be sudden and thief-like. "I tell you, in that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding together: the one shall be taken, and the other left," etc. Luke xvii. 34-36. Jesus promises the Philadelphian church, or those who keep the word of his patience, "I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth." Rev. iii. 10. He will keep them in his pavilion; "thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man." Psa. xxxi. 20. "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." Isa. xxvi. 20, 21. Thus it will be with the saints who are gathered together unto the Lord, before he comes in his glory. How long they will be thus hid with Him, before His and their manifestation takes place, is not plainly revealed, but it may be for some years. As I understand the Word on this point, during this interval of time, of Christ coming for and with his saints, Antichrist must be developed, and the wicked become ripe for the judgments of God; the everlasting gospel proclaimed to all nations, and a great harvest be gathered in; the vials of wrath be poured out upon the beast, his throne, kingdoms and worshippers; the fall of Babylon take place, culminating in the destruction of the "Lawless One" by the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ. It takes time to accomplish all things, and these events can not transpire in a day. There is nothing unreasonable in the faithful ones being preserved in an ark of safety from the evil to come. If Noah and his family were safe in the ark before the Lord brought in the flood upon the world of the ungodly—if righteous Lot was delivered before Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed—if the harlot Rahab, who received the spies in peace, believing their word, perished not with the inhabitants of Jericho, when its walls fell down, and it was burnt with fire—if the disciples, obeying the admonition of Jesus, fleeing from Jerusalem before its destruction by the Romans, were saved from a miserable death;—so why may not those who are watching, praying and keeping Christ's word, be saved from that hour of trial and peril, and be accounted worthy to stand before the Son of man? This is the Savior's promise to them, and will be fulfilled.

2. The coming of Christ in power and glory will be public, and universally known. As the coming of a prince to a city may be private and unknown, save to his adherents, so may the return of "the Prince of the kings of the earth" before his appearing to the world at large. When Jesus was taken up from the gaze of his astonished disciples, it was secretly, quietly, away from the populace of Jerusalem. And the disciples are told by angels, "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner, as ye have seen him go into heaven. Acts. i. 11. But when he makes his descent on Olivet, his saints will be with him, and it will be in the presence of the embattled hosts of the nations at Jerusalem. "Every eye shall see him, and they which pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." Rev. i. 7. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Matt. xxiv. 27. At his first advent, Jesus was thirty years with his own kindred before he was made manifest to Israel, or the nation at large. A forerunner announced him, and prepared the people for his coming, not his birth, but his official coming; and so in the future, or second advent, his faithful ones may be with him for years before his coming in regal and judicial power and majesty. This will be no secret or private affair. The signs in the sun, moon, and stars; the distress of nations; the shaking of the heavenly powers, and the sign of the Son of man in heaven, will be prominent and visible tokens of the approach of the King of kings and Lord of lords. And as the signs which herald his coming are public, so will his appearing be also. After such a coming as this it would be foolishness for any one to say "Behold, he is in the desert," or "He is in the secret chambers," for it would not be believed. But it is evident that previous to this manifestation, and the accompanying signs, that many will be deceived by the declaration that Christ is here, or there; for false Christs and false prophets shall arise, having power to work miracles, and many shall be deceived." See Matt. xxiv. 11, 12, 23-26; Rev. xiii. 13, 14; 2 Thess. ii. 9, 10. When the "man of sin," the "lawless one," shall be revealed, he will claim to be the Messiah. He will come in his own name, and many of the Jews who reject Jesus of Nazareth will accept him. John v. 43. But the Lord Jesus will consume him with the spirit of his mouth and destroy him with the brightness of his coming. 2 Thess. ii. 8. See also Psa i. 2; Isa. lxvi. 16; 2 Thess. i. 8.

The reader will already perceive from the foregoing remarks, and passages of Scripture, that Christ first comes to the air, and gathers his saints, dead and living, to himself. This agrees with the parable of the nobleman as recorded by Luke xix. 11-27. When the prince returned, having obtained the royalty, he called his servants unto him, to give an account of what use they had made of their lord's money. The faithful servant was rewarded with a position in the kingdom; the unfaithful was deprived of everything. So it will be with faithful disciples. The Master calls them to himself, and shares with them his honor, his throne, his kingdom. They are permitted to be in his presence, and to see his glory. They are then united to the heavenly Bridegroom as his spotless Bride, and become indissolubly one with both the Father and the Son. (John xvii. 21.) As such, they come with Christ when he makes His public and glorious appearing. "When Christ, our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Col. iii. 4. In the first stage of his coming his servants meet him, in the next stage they are manifested with him. In the first stage it is the resurrection and translation of the household of faith, and their gathering together unto him from all ages, and all places. "Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice. And the heavens shall declare his righteousness; for God is Judge himself." Psa. l. 5, 6. And this for judgment, and reward according to their works. In the second stage of His coming, or public appearance in the clouds of heaven, it is for the execution of judgment upon the world; he will "destroy them that destroy the earth." Rev. xi. 18. This judgment begins at Jerusalem upon the beast, false prophet, and their armies. They meet a complete overthrow. Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 11-21.

The grand design of the second coming of Christ is to "bring in everlasting righteousness," (Dan. ix. 24.) by the establishment of the kingdom of God upon the earth, to abrogate all human government, and establish the Divine; to fulfill the promises made to the fathers, in blessing their fleshly descendants, and with them all nations upon the earth. In order to accomplish this grand design, Jesus of Nazareth was anointed with the Holy Spirit and power when he began to preach the gospel of the kingdom, so that he might demonstrate to the people that he was the Christ of God—the one foretold by prophets, who should sit upon the throne of David, to order and establish his kingdom. And though rejected by his own nation, yet his father God justified him, and placed him at his own right hand in the heavenly regions, until his enemies are made a footstool for his feet. Then he will return in power to reign. He will be then the King of the Jews de facto; and not only King of Israel, but "king over all the earth;" in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name one." Zech. xiv. 9. But what a work to do before Jesus will be universally acknowledged as supreme monarch of the world! The father has given him this distinguished honor. "Every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Phil. ii. 11. When he comes he will find everything against him and ready to contest his right to the throne and kingdom. "His land," the territory of the kingdom in the possession of his enemies, and just at the juncture of his advent myriads of armed men besieging Jerusalem, under the leadership of one claiming to be the Messiah. But this is the culmination of evil, and now comes the grand crisis in the world's history. Jesus comes! Not as "a man of sorrows," but as a mighty conqueror. Not as the "Lamb of God," but as "the lion of the tribe of Judah." To deliver the faithful remnant of Judah, then suffering under persecution, "the Lord of hosts shall come down to fight for Mount Zion, and for the hill thereof. As birds flying, so will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem." Isa. xxxi. 4, 5. Their enemies will be destroyed, and the land wrested from their grasp, and given to the rightful owners. From this place and point of time, will the restitution commence. Messiah, as the antitypical David, will go forth as a man of war, conquering his enemies round about, establishing his kingdom with judgment and justice. Then, having "raised up the tribes of Jacob, and restored the desolations of Israel;" as the antitypical Solomon he will reign as "the Prince of peace." "He will make wars to cease to the ends of the earth." He will teach the nations, and give them his law. He will give them righteous administrators of law. He will give them good teachers—priests who will have the law of God in their hearts, and from whose lips the people will learn knowledge. Thus evil will be restrained and truth and righteousness encouraged until "the knowledge of the glory of the Lord" shall fill the whole earth. Lord, hasten the day. "Let thy kingdom come; let thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Amen.

There's Sunshine After Rain.

There's sunshine after rain, dear friends,
There's sunshine after rain;
And twilight comes when darkness ends,
To usher day again.
Spring brings to life the sleeping grain,
And varied flowers gay;
And hope, when all is grief and pain,
Shines o'er the heart's highway.

Then never let the fiend Despair,
Enchain our troubled mind;
Nor let the clouds of bitter care
The soul's bright mission blind!
For if life's morn be dark and drear,
By gloomy ills o'ercast,
A glowing noontide, bright and clear,
May cancel troubles past!

The meads grow richer for the storm,
And sweeter smell the flowers;
And why not learn to prize the charm
From e'en embittered hours!
Good with the evil ever blends,
Weed- grow among the grain,
So there is love for all, dear friends,
And sunshine after rain.

The Holy City.

Oh, city of the Lord of Hosts,
My long expected, happy home;
When shall I reach thy shining coasts?
When shall I to thy glory come?

Thy multitudes no tongue can tell;
Thy joys no mortal heart can know;
Thy songs, with glad triumphant swell,
Shall drown each memory of our woe.

Jasper and pearl, and ruby's gleam,
Blazing in light celestial fair,
And golden street and crystal stream.
Give token that the Lord is there.

Yea, brighter far than gems and gold,
Without which they were dark as night.
More precious than all joys untold,
Is Christ, its glory and its light.

Without his presence and his love,
Heaven would a desolation seem;
But with him dungeons bright would prove,
While he illumes each gloomy scene.

My First and Last Lesson.

I have purposed for years to write concerning the 2300 days of Daniel viii. 14, but have delayed from time to time till now, when "the logic of events" proclaims to me, that I should withhold no longer. My first lesson in chronology is my last. Twenty years ago I thought I had learned from the prophet Daniel that the 2300 years of indignation, comprehended, embraced and covered the entire period of the subjugation of Judah and Jerusalem to Gentile supremacy and domination. I read in Dan. viii. 13: "How long shall the vision be concerning the daily sacrifice and the transgression of making desolate, (margin)—to give—both the sanctuary and the host, to be trodden under foot"? Then, in verse 14, I read the answer: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." But, unto 2300 days (years) from when, what, and to whom? Here was the enigma, and here must be sought and found the solution! To this end the angel Gabriel was sent to expound the vision to the prophet, which exposition is comprehended in chapter viii. 19-23. But the prophet understood not. He had made a mistake; he had misapprehended; he had understood from books the number of the years in which the desolations of Jerusalem should be accomplished (completed) were seventy. ix. 2. So he seeks wisdom from on high, fasts, makes confession and supplication, and God sees, hears and answers. Consequently the prophet tells us in ix. 21, that the same angel whom he had seen at the beginning of the vision (viii. 15-17), i. e., Gabriel touched him and said: "O Daniel I am now come to give thee skill and understanding, ... therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision. Seventy weeks are determined (are cut off from the 2300 days) upon thy people and upon thy holy city." Verse 24. Then Gabriel proceeds to explain how this seventy weeks shall be filled out, and gives the events to transpire in their fulfillment. "Know therefore and understand that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem, shall be," etc., ... Verse 25.

Now, oceans of ink have been shed, and years of toil and research given to learn and show in what year B. C. that commandment did go forth, so as to tell the world when the indignation should cease, and "the sanctuary be cleansed," but of all the efforts made, and theories put forth, every one has failed in consummation, and only one can tell how, when, and where the sanctuary was cleansed, and that one has had to go up above the clouds, get out of sight, and hide their sanctuary in the heavens, lest ocular demonstration should reveal to the world the ignis fatuus nature of their attenuated and tenebrious theory, while they employ a medium to give them "visions," and "report progress" in the celestial region*s*. But "the vision" began on earth, related to the "worldly sanctuary," and will be completed where it began, on earth, and have its end in the earth. To the prophet a knowledge of the date of the beginning of the seventy weeks was highly important and very necessary, for he lived before and in the era of that beginning; but to me, and all of us who live subsequent to their termination, it is more essential to know when and where the seventy weeks ended, for having been "cut off" from the 2300 days, how can we know what the remaining 1810 years shall be added to, in order to find the end of the whole sum from which they were taken, except we know the ending of the period containing the less sum? On reading the rest of the 25th verse from the word "Jerusalem," down to the words "shall Messiah be cut off," in the 26th verse, it seems as if the "cutting off" took place in the middle of the seventieth week; but on reading the rest of the 26th verse with the 27th, one can not well avoid the conviction and come to the conclusion, that in some way, and somehow the seventieth week, or a part of it at least, reaches to, embraces and covers the destruction of Jerusalem; for Gabriel joins the cutting off of Messiah with and to the coming of the people of the Prince that shall destroy the city and the sanctuary, ... and he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and (then) that determined shall be poured upon the desolator. (Mar). The war, ending in the destruction of Jerusalem, began A. D. 67, and ended in A. D. 70, and there, I believe, the seventy weeks ended; for Gabriel said to Daniel, "seventy weeks (490 years) are determined upon thy people (the Jews), and upon thy Holy City," .... (Jerusalem). I understand that Christ spoke of this vision when he said in Matt. xxiv. 15: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, ... stand in the holy place, then let them who be in Judea, flee unto the mountains." Luke has it (xxi. 20): "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh," .... from which time (verse 22), "Jerusalem was to be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Seventy weeks are 490 years, which taken from 2300, leaves 1810. The 490 years end with the destruction or desolating of Jerusalem by the Romans A. D. 70, leaving 1810 years of the 2300, for Jerusalem to be trodden down by the Gentiles. But we are seventy years this side the cross when the larger period begins. To find, therefore, in what year of our Lord the 1810 years of down treading will end, add to the 1810 the preceding seventy years, and we are carried down to A. D. 1880, where the 2300 years of indignation will end, and "the sanctuary be cleansed," for 420 years of the 490 had been previously devoted to Judah and Jerusalem, which added to the A. D. 1880, gives us the full period of the 2300 years of indignation. And now we are in "the last end of the indignation," as also in "the day of his preparation." "Coming events cast their shadows before."

The Sabbath.

But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day. Matt. xxiv. 20.

This is considered by many as very conclusive in behalf of the Sabbath obligation. But when we contemplate the circumstances and facts connected therewith, the evidence resolves itself into a slight inference at best. The Master, in foretelling the fearful doom of the Jews and Jerusalem, very kindly points out, not Christian duties, or great sins, but their duty relative to their own welfare amid the obstructions of those trying times. Jerusalem forms the centre of events in this heart-rending scene, as Luke records it: "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it (Jerusalem) depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto." Note the impediments: "Woe to the pregnant and nursing women" as their flight must necessarily be retarded. Also the cold winter would be very unpropitious and adverse to such a flight. The Sabbath can not be safely reckoned in this verse otherwise than an impediment, first, from the connection in which it is found, and, secondly, from the instructions God had given relative to the gates of Jerusalem and the inhabitants thereof in relation to the Sabbath day. Jer. xvi. 19-21; Neh. xiii. 15-22.

To remove any remaining vestige of doubt, we offer, in the third place, that it would be no sin whatever to flee on the Sabbath day to save life. So the slight inference vanishes away; otherwise it would be sin to slip out or dodge off to save one's life or the life of one's family. We ask in all candor what must be thought of modern Sabbath observance? Also of Jesus who, though Lord of the Sabbath, not only walked about on the Sabbath, but, when in danger, would withdraw and flee away? See Matt. xii., and Mark iii.

Correspondence.

Dear Brethren and Sisters:—I would that you all could have stood with me by the dying couch of a dear one who has but just passed away. It was a privilege to be there; for faith had taken all terror from death, overleaped the dark valley and showed her, her own glorified form, standing in robes unstained and white, on the green shores of the promised land. We who stood by her, felt more like shouting than giving way to tears.

"Oh that I could preach a sermon, or sing a song!" she said, as she was sinking into the arms of death, and one by one the friends in the room were called to receive her last exhortation, and to bid her adieu. The book of Holy Writ was brought "that she might hear about Jesus' coming back to earth again."

Her triumphant boast was, "That she was in the faith," her comfort, on looking into the eyes of death, "that she should sleep but a little while;" her prayer, "that the blessed Savior might quickly come."

"Have we not a blessed hope?" questioned her husband, as he sat holding her hand in love's last agonizing clasp, "Oh have we not a blessed hope?" "Jesus says, 'I am the resurrection and the life.'" "Though we fall asleep, we shall be raised from the dead when Jesus comes, and be fashioned like unto his own most glorious body."

She nodded yes! yes! was again and again responded, to his earnest words; and I said to myself, "faith conquers, love is the victor here. Surely I have caught a glimpse of Eden. The affection of these hearts, built up and strengthened by a mutual faith, is a leaf from Paradise."

She was a little slower than her husband in grasping the truth of life only through Christ, and of a glorious kingdom near at hand, to be established at the coming of our Lord, for her frail health gave her no opportunity to hear; yet through his patient teaching she grasped them at last, and died, believing in God, as did Abraham of old.

"She was the dearest little woman in the world," was the outburst of her husband's heart when she had passed away. And when the bright sands of the grave yard were heaped in a shapely mound above her, he said with outstretched, waving hand: "I must leave you now, Callie! I must leave you now, but Jesus has power to open the grave. 'Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.'" It was the grandest triumph of living faith that I ever saw; a scene over which angels might rejoice.

May our Heavenly Father keep him in the faith, striving lawfully unto the end, that he may with her who "sleeps in Jesus," receive a crown of life that fadeth not away. Pray for the afflicted one.

We have laid our friend and sister away to rest. We leave her there.

"Turf of the shaded churchyard.

Watch the toil-worn sleeper,
Till the awaking day

Our Letter Drawer.

Editor Restitution:—For a long time I have felt it my duty to write, but sore eyes have almost entirely prevented me from reading or writing for the last five or six months, but at this time they are so far recovered that I am again able, though with some difficulty, to write a letter, and thus speak a word of encouragement to the brethren generally. Our dear RESTITUTION makes its regular visits to our home. We feel that it is indispensable, although we do not endorse some things therein; still it cheers us to read the letters from different parts of the country. I wish to say to the brethren that I read Brother Sweet's exposition of the parable of the rich man and Lazarus some time ago, and think it is the only exposition of that Scripture that is just the thing. Read Three Worlds over one year ago. Many good things, especially his exposition of Spiritualism. I like Brother Campbell's Millennarian, published in Boston, as his views on the time of the end are very much in harmony with mine. I send one dollar on subscription, and hope to donate something for the RESTITUTION soon.

Your brother, patiently waiting for the development of prophecy and the establishment of the kingdom.

G. W. SMITH.

Emporia, Kan.

Editor Restitution:—I see my time is out for the RESTITUTION, which I cannot do without. I have been a reader of its columns ever since Brother Marsh's day, and it is the only preaching I have, except what I get from reading my Bible, which is full of the glorious promises of earth's coming glory. It exhorts us to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. I am trying to do the best I can; which I shall always continue to do as long as the blessed Lord keeps me in this age of sin and sorrow. But I hope it will not be long till the Lord will come and reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously. Now if any of our preaching brethren who may be passing this way will stop, they will ever be welcome at my humble residence, one mile west of Gifford, Hardin Co., Iowa. As I am getting hungry for some wholesome gospel food, who will be the first to come?

It is estimated that there have been forty-eight executions for murder in the United States since the 1st of January, and that nearly all of these criminals expressed the belief on the gallows that they were prepared to die, and expected to go straight to Paradise.

The German correspondent of the London Guardian states that the improvement in Prince Bismarck's health is a matter of general remark. His great ailment in Berlin was sleeplessness, but in the country he has regularly taken five hours horse exercise, and he has got sleep back. He will now go to Kissingen for six weeks, then make a tour into the Bavarian Alps and return home.

In Jerusalem tenement houses for Jews of different nations are rapidly building by societies organized for the purpose. They are going up on the Jaffa road, and on both the north and the west sides of the city, and even within the walls near the reputed tomb of David, a large group of tenements is now in process of construction. The poor are to have free rooms for a time, and those able to do so are to be permitted to purchase their habitations. Until recently, the Jews had their "quarter." Now they can live anywhere outside or inside of the city's walls.

A mountain at Saint Foy, in the Department of Savoie, France, has fallen. Some days previous indications of the state of the mountain were observed by the inhabitants of the district, but before they had time to retreat the first crash took place, destroying several hillside hamlets. After the first disastrous movement of earth a series of landslips took place, totally burying several other small villages. The number of hamlets which have disappeared is about ten, and the rumbling with which each additional fall is accompanied is heard at a distance of eight miles. The inhabitants have been able to escape with their lives, but the loss of property is enormous.

At the Harput missionary station, in Eastern Turkey, the pasha himself has visited the female seminary, and expressed himself as much pleased with the manner in which recitations were made, and said he "had not expected so much from a school of females in that part of the country." Afterward a number of Turks, including five members of the new board of education, attended an examination of the Turkish department of the Normal School. They expressed much satisfaction; and not long afterward the Minister of Education sent through the pasha a message of thanks to the missionaries for what their schools were doing accompanied by a donation of five books, which he wished to be presented to the five best scholars. The church at Harput was organized twenty years ago with ten members. There are now 221.

CONFERENCE IN MISSOURI.

The members of the Church of God, assembled at Hamden, Lawrence county, Mo., May 25, 1877, after consolidation and Bible talking, decide that all the interests of the Body in Southern Missouri, South-eastern Kansas, and Northwestern Arkansas, and all others who possibly can, meet with us at the annual conference at Ashley school house, one mile east of Chantersville, in the southeast corner of Dade county, Missouri, commencing on Friday before the third Sunday in August, 1877.

By order of the church.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Bradnack, Congregational minister, and W. Kellaway, editor of Bible Echo, and scholar of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that such in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 35c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 30c; postage 8c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A. late Prebendary of Cork, Ireland. 320 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly due in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price 35; postage 10c.

"We call this book with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has laid hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet to the first edition to a handsome volume of force hundred and fifty pages like the present, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance..... We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the work to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will speedily be much more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this particular misunderstood department of Christian theology.—The Rainbow.

Hades: or, The Intermediate State of Men. Crown 8vo, 75 million. Price $1.25; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, a keen logic, and a clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

It is characterized by his usual rigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Missionary.

Bible Echo. Volume I, May to December, edited by W. Kellaway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing fac-simile papers and discussions on vital matters, and the news concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $4.75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II., January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III July to September, 1875. This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 3 months of last year, is $3 00.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Enquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the gardener, and the housekeeper. 378 pp. Price 50c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Earnest Words for Home Scripts. Nearly 300 pp. Well printed on heavy toned paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 60c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of none others in every way so pleasing to those who see the necessity of maintaining the Bible as a revelation from God. We would in some than content, we would be proud, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so original, so forcible, so readable, it would be hard to guess where its circulation will end. Everybody should possess a copy."—El. Bible Echo.

Bible Triumphant. A new supply is expected. Price, paper cover, 50c; cloth 70c.

This preliminary survey brings us now to the lecture delivered on this subject in Charlottesville, Virginia, on the 24th of July, 1854, nearly a quarter of a century ago. It was then reported in one of the city papers, the Jeffersonian, whose reprint I now have before me.

It must be premised that in that long interval, many eventful incidents and occurrences on the theatre of human affairs have taken place, and I submit to the intelligence and candor of my audience to decide whether these intermediate events tend, in their judgment, to sustain or weaken the conclusions and results, announced in the interpretation, then offered. The opening of the Suez canal; the construction of the railway from Cairo, in Egypt, in a direct line eastward; the projection of a similar line up the valley of the Euphrates; the opening up of new and improved lines of trade and travel to the Holy Land; the greatly increased emigration of the Jews to Palestine, especially to Jerusalem, chiefly under the auspices and protection of the English government, American missionary, agricultural, educational and reformatory efforts and enterprises in the same direction; the establishment of consulates from Europe and the United States, with quasi diplomatic and national powers designed for the safety and protection of Israelites who are now there, and are daily settling in the country; and especially the earnest exertions, liberal contributions and warm sympathy of Israelites themselves throughout the world, to favor the immigration and settlement of the Jews in their native land, guided and stimulated by their most illustrious compatriot, the aged and benevolent Sir Moses Montefiore, baronet, now in the ninety-sixth year of his age and on his sixth mission to Jerusalem, expending all his large means, and all he can procure, to urge on and prepare for the work of colonization and permanent occupation of the land of their fathers and the city of the great King. These all show what has been done of late years. And to this we add the patent fact, known and read of all men, that the old and bitter prejudices of mankind against the Jews, have been almost, if not quite broken down; that they are the wealthiest people in the world, and actually hold the purse strings of the nations, and command and control the money markets of the world. Another testimony in support of the same conclusion is to be found in the rising prominence and importance of the Israelites in all countries; their occupation of many of the high places in science, literature learning, and the arts, and in elevated judicial, political and diplomatic positions under the various nations of the earth, with Disraeli—prime minister of the great British and Indian empire—perhaps the most exalted station in the gift of any sovereign, and only next in influence and importance, to royalty itself. The significance of these "signs of the times," with others of equal value, can not be deluded or disparaged. They certainly portend astounding results and events in the near future, affecting the fortunes and destiny of the human race, and will not be ignored as unimportant by intelligent and thoughtful minds, who will consider them.

[Here the speaker proceeded to read the printed synopsis of the lecture of July 24th, 1854, as follows, with the title prefixed:]

SYNOPSIS OF A LECTURE

On the Mission of the Russian Autocrat in Prophecy—His extraordinary Career of Conquest and Domination in Europe and Asia—His Ultimate Catastrophe and Extinction by the King of Israel, Coming in the Clouds of Heaven, to Great Power and Glory, and Establishing His Kingdom on Earth and over all Nations for the Millennial Period of One Thousand Years.

Delivered in the Town Hall of Charlottesville, Virginia, on the 24th July, 1854, by Allan B. Magruder.

The lecturer held the Bible to be a full and complete revelation from its Author, of the past, the present, and the future, and that we may confide freely in its prophetic pictures of the future, because we have seen its exact truthfulness in its history of the present and past.

Dissenting in toto from the common idea that we can know nothing of the future, that the prospect ahead is designedly obscure and impenetrable, he cited many passages of Holy Writ to prove the contrary. He maintained that what is to happen in the future is plainly delineated in the writings of the prophets; that one of these—Amos iii. 7—had said, "Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret to the servants the prophets." That David had said, Ps. xxv. 14, "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will show them his covenant." That Isaiah said xlii. 9, "Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare; before they spring forth, I tell you of them." That Daniel said in reference to events "at the time of the end," "The wise shall understand." That in his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, he showed Him "the things which should come to pass hereafter in the latter days." That the saying of Jesus that "no man knoweth the day or the hour when the Son of man cometh," was not contradictory to the above testimony, for no prophet has foretold, and no sane man would undertake to name the day and hour of that event. That these words, however, were spoken in the present tense, and before the New Testament had been written and its revelations completed. That the Book of Revelation written afterwards is entitled, "The Revelation which God gave to Jesus Christ, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass;" and that Paul's testimony in 1 Thess. v. ought to be conclusive of all further controversy, as he says expressly of the day of the Lord's coming, that although he should come "as a thief in the night" to the world at large, yet "ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief," a clear proof that Christians, being "wise," should understand and be prepared for the event—which can only be by their expecting it, and interpreting its approach by those "signs of the times" to which Christ has directed their attention, and which, if heeded, would enable them to know when it was "nigh, even at the doors."

Conceding, then, that what is to happen in the future has been disclosed, to the diligent student of the Scriptures, the question recurs, "What are the signs of the times?" What is the prospect before us?

It seems to be generally admitted that we are in the midst of an eventful era of the world's history; an intense and universal excitement in reference to the social, ecclesiastical and political affairs of mankind, evidently prevails. The whole continent of Europe is a slumbering volcano; Asia, too, with her untold millions of human beings, is passing at this moment through the throes and convulsions of a mighty struggle between ancient and driveling superstition on the one hand and young and upheaving innovation on the other; and our own America, though far removed from the immediate scene of this excitement, is herself restless, ambitious, impatient of restraint, and eager to rush forward in the path of her manifest destiny. The conviction that such a state of things cannot long endure, forces from every one the anxious inquiry, "What is about to happen?" The lecturer maintained that this universal excitement of the social mind was the natural result of the extraordinary posture of human affairs, not only in the old world, but throughout the habitable globe. That the common observer, no less than the practiced statesman, could discern nothing in the present or future aspect of human affairs but change, insecurity and revolution; that it seemed human wisdom was wholly unequal to the task of providing for the public safety and happiness. That this conviction had naturally begotten an expectation that society must pass through some mighty crisis before it could reach the desired haven of peace beyond—what that crisis was, none could presume to say—and that this vague and indefinable future naturally produced and augmented those feelings of dread and apprehension which we beheld universally prevalent.

In such a crisis as this, Divine wisdom was our only refuge for light, the Bible was our only safe guide to correct conclusions; and when we turn to its pages, we learn that mankind are on the eve of that mighty revolution in human affairs which was indicated by the prophet Daniel, when he interpreted the Babylonian monarch's vision of "the things that were to come to pass in the latter days." By turning to the 2d chapter of Daniel, we read at the 44th verse this remarkable declaration: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." The context explained to what kingdoms the prophet alluded, and showed that the kingdom to be set up by the God of heaven had never been manifested as yet. The lecturer maintained, on the testimony of ancient history, the interpretations of Bishop Newman, Sir Isaac Newton, and other commentators, as well as from the historical parts of the Holy Scriptures, that the great metal image seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, and interpreted by Daniel, represented four great empires, which were to have dominion successively over the nations of the world. He enumerated these empires in the order of their appearance, as the Assyrian or Babylonian empire under Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar; the Medo-Persian empire, under Darius and Cyrus; the Greco-Macedonian, under the Greeks and Alexander the Great; and the Roman empire, under the Cæsars and their successors. It was in reference to these last, to the kings or kingdoms now reigning on the continent of Europe, which kingdoms corresponded to the ten toes of the image, and represent the existing kingdoms of modern Europe, that the prophet speaks, when he declares that "in the days of these kings the God of heaven shall set up his kingdom;" and as its mission is to "break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms," it must first subdue and suppress these and all other opposing establishments, and plant itself on their ruins. This theocracy will then become the succeeding universal monarchy, having sway over the whole world, and then will be fulfilled the prophecy in the Bible, that "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." The student of English history will remember the prominence given to the Fifth Monarchy men, in the times of Charles I. and Cromwell. Many of the wisest of England's statesmen (John Milton among them) believed that Daniel's prophecy of the setting up of the fifth monarchy or God's kingdom was about to be fulfilled at that time. The conditions of the prophecy, however, require that before "that great and terrible day of the Lord" comes, the power representing the universal empire, symbolized by the great metal image, should appear, that the image empire in the latter days should appear; for the stone of the 34th verse of Daniel II. must strike the image upon its feet, as a consequence of which, the "iron, the brass, the silver and the gold are broken to pieces together, and become as the dust of the summer threshing floor"—and the stone then becomes a great mountain, and fills the whole earth. Now the question arises, Where in the latter days are we to find a dominion ruling over all the countries mainly comprehended in the fruits of the successive empires of Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome? Such a dominion must appear in order to its destruction by the stone power, or kingdom of God, as already declared by the prophecy. The power destined to play this conspicuous part on the theatre of human affairs is Russia. It will overrun Turkey, subdue Persia, and convert the present independent kingdoms of modern continental Europe into tributary or vassal kingdoms, just as Napoleon swiftly subdued Spain, Portugal, Italy, Holland, etc. But when it shall have attained this mighty conquest, it will itself be smitten by the stone power of the prophecy, be precipitated into the abyss, and give place to a divine government, under Christ as Abraham's seed, in whom all the nations of the earth will be blessed.

The power which is to play this conspicuous part in the world's history is described in Scripture under various names. By Daniel he is called "the king of the north,"—chap. xi. 40. By Isaiah, the "Assyrian"—xxx. 31; xxxi. 8; and by Ezekiel xxxviii. xxxix., "Gog of the land of Magog." If we can identify the power symbolized under these names as the Russian, we shall be prepared to read, in the prophecies themselves, the extraordinary events which are to mark his history, and to see that his wonderful career is immediately to precede the ingathering of the Jews into their land, emancipated from Moslem rule, the coming of Christ, the resurrection of the righteous dead, and the establishment of God's kingdom over all the earth.

Now, let us inquire what power "at the time of the end" (see Daniel xi. 40) so well answers the description of "the king of the north" as the great northern autocrat, who, like a mighty Colossus, at this moment is holding the civilized worldin wondering suspense if not apprehension, as to his movements? What other "king of the north" does the world expect to undertake a campaign against "the king of the south," (or Turkey,) and come against him like a whirlwind, with many chariots (or cars) and with horsemen, and with many ships, who shall enter (or invade) his countries, (or provinces,) and shall overflow and pass over." If any power at present exists on earth answering this description, every candid man must admit that it is only Russia.

As "the Assyrian" of Isaiah, he will be recognized when he has conquered Turkey and thereby become the master of Assyria, at present a captured province of Turkey in Asia, and so will stand forth as the successor of Nebuchadnezzar and the representative of the "head of gold" in the vision—q. v. Ezekiel's description of him as Gog is very significant and striking. He styles him, (xxxviii.) "Gog, of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal." King James translators give us the above translation from the Latin Vulgate, but the Greek Septuagint version renders the original Hebrew, "Gogue, of the land of Magogue, Prince of Rosse, Meshech and Tubal."

The Czar is the Autocrat of all the Russias, i. e., of original Russia, of the Grand Duchy of Russia, and the separate provinces or kingdoms of Meshech, modern Moscow, or Muscovy, and of Tubal, or modern Tobolsk or Tobolski. It is known that the Russian empire is an aggregate of three grand divisions

Russia proper, Muscovy, and Siberia or Tobolski; of these the respective capitals are St. Petersburg, Moscow, and Tobolsk. So that the description in the prophecy answers with almost literal accuracy to the present modern titles and empire of the Autocrat, Gog The power here described is represented, as in the latter days, invading the land of Israel with a great army, and for certain objects set forth in the prophecy. Among the nations or people from whom this host is recruited are mentioned, "Gomer and all his bands, the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands," etc. By turning to Genesis, ch. x., we find that these were European nations; for the sons of Japheth, to whom Europe was given, are mentioned as "Gomer, and Magog, and Madai, and Javan (or Ivan, the name of the reigning house of Russia), and Tibal and Meshech, and Tiras;" and among the sons of Gomer we read the name of "Togarmah." This testimony proves these invaders of the land of Israel "in the latter years" to be of European origin; and no other kingdom or country in Europe presents the necessary points of identity with the prophecy but Russia.

If the question be asked, Why should Russia invade Palestine? the answer is, It is a necessary step to her acquisition or retention of an empire in the East, by which alone she can hope successfully to antagonize England, and found that universal domain to which she aspires. The capture of Constantinople by Russia, however it may be postponed by temporizing diplomacy or a hollow truce on the part of the "Allied Powers"—will inaugurate the splendid career of Russian conquest and dominion. Napoleon truly said of the sovereigns of Europe, "he who holds Constantinople is the real master of the world." for a time. On that account, in his conferences with Alexander at Tilsit and Erfurth, he invariably resisted with all his power the intense anxiety of the Russian monarch to obtain Constantinople, who said it was the key to the door of his house.

In the coming struggle among the nations, the lecturer contended that while Britain would retain her supremacy on the ocean, Russia would be the ruler of the European continent, and having successfully subdued Turkey and Persia, would attempt to strike a decisive blow at the only exposed and vulnerable point of the British dominion, her empire in the East Indies. To effect this end, the Autocrat, crossing the Bosphorus into Asia would lead an immense army through Southern Asia, Syria and Palestine, via Jerusalem, en route to Hindoostan and British India. That by way of interposing a barrier against the progress of the Russian arms in the East, England will invite the Jews to return to their land, to colonize, cultivate and possess it under her protectorate. That this will bring on the mightiest struggle between the most powerful nations of modern times, the culmination of which will be the valley of Jehosaphat, near Jerusalem, the grand finale of which will be the reign of Jesus Christ, as the Lord of Hosts, on the Mount of Olives whence he ascended, and whither, it is predicted, he will return. Acts i. 11, 12. Zech. xiv. 4.) That he—Christ—as Lord of Hosts, mighty in battle, will take part in the pending struggle; and the great battle, called in Scripture the battle of the great day of Almighty God, will then be fought, which is to decide the destiny of the world for the millennial period of one thousand years. The series of events introductory of and consequent on this mighty conflict, is set forth in Zechariah xiv.; Rev. xix.; Micah iv.; Zech viii., ix., xii.; Ps. lxxii.; Joel ii., iii.; Daniel xii.; Isa. ii., ix., xi., xxiv., ii., iii., iv., lix., lx., to end of Isaiah; Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.

In confirmation of these conclusions, besides much Scripture testimony not here adduced for want of room, the lecturer cited the historical evidence of the ancient and Orthodox belief among the first Christians, that Christ, with his saints as kings under him, should reign personally on the earth over all its inhabitants. On this point he quoted the testimony of Bishop Newton; of Gibbon in his "Decline and Fall," &c.; of Lord Macaulay, and of eminent clergymen in the Scottish and English church. He cited such familiar passages as the Lord's prayer—"Thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth." The song of the redeemed, in Rev. v., "Thou hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." "To him that overcometh, will I give power over the nations:" and many kindred passages, such as Dan. vii. 9, 13, 14, 18, 21, 22, 27; Rev. iv., xx.; Matt. xix. 28; Luke xix. 11, 15; xxii. 16, 18, 29, 30, &c.

In support of the views advanced in relation to the present attitude and future destiny of Russia, the lecturer read and commented on the opinions of Napoleon, his conferences and correspondence with Alexander of Russia, his prediction at St. Helena as to Europe's being either Republican or Cossack about this time. He read also in full a very remarkable document which has lately been published in the papers, and which he held to be supported by sufficient marks of authenticity to be received as genuine—the political will of Peter the Great—a paper originally published in the French Courrier, in New York, purporting to be "the secret plan of European supremacy left by Peter the Great to his successors on the Russian throne," recommending a policy his successors have uniformly pursued, with a view to the ultimate conquest of Europe, and the founding of a universal empire, the fruits of which, devised in profound sagacity and pursued with untiring energy, are now visible in the wonderful aggrandizement of Russia, and her conceded superiority over her contemporaries in Europe. In all the elements of strength, diplomacy and power which, in human estimation, go to make up a nation's grandeur.

As auxiliary to the same line of argument, the lecturer adverted to the conviction on the mind of the Russian sovereign and people, that they had a "sacred mission" to fill in saving Europe from the whirlpool of democratic anarchy and confusion, by the conquest of Turkey, and the capacity thence derived, to govern the world in harmony with Russian ideas of liberty. He cited the fact, also, that the Turks, who are all fatalists, looked upon themselves as doomed to be driven by the Russians out of Europe, where they are foreigners and intruders. They show the gate by which their old enemies, the Greeks, are to enter their city as conquerors in the guise and in the name of the Russians. It is under the same conviction of their coming banishment from Europe, that for years past they have been burying their dead on the eastern shores of the Hellespont in Asia. They tell an ancient prophecy, too, which says that their capital is to be taken by a prince bearing the same name; and it is not the least source of their uneasiness at present that the commander of that column of the Russian army destined for the conquest of the ancient Byzantium is the Grand Duke Constantine. Whether true or false, the influence of such ideas is paralyzing on an ignorant and superstitious people, and prepares them for the very destiny they dread.

The Czar, as the head of the Greek church, is impelled, too, by certain motives of superstition and of real or supposed state necessity, to fix his capital in the city of the Czars or Cæsars. He deems himself entitled by hereditary right to succeed to the Sceptre of the Cæsars, and a war with Turkey at this day would be regarded by his subjects and by the ten millions of Greeks out of the fourteen millions which form the entire population of Turkey in Europe, as a holy war—a crusade of Christians against infidels, for the recovery of the holy sepulchre and of the ancient rites and institutions of the primitive church. The influence of such feelings on a bigoted, superstitious, and fanatical people, can be readily appreciated. The Turkish empire is become effete and driveling—has been wasting away rapidly for years, and possesses no vitality for reaction. Its present condition is significantly expressed by the Scripture symbolography as "the drying up of the great river Euphrates"—the country watered by the Euphrates being the original seat of the Turkish people. This drying up or extinction of the Turkish empire is declared expressly to be "that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared." Rev. xvi. 12. For centuries past, "westward the star of empire takes its way." But the scene is to be reversed. The original seats of civilization, science, and true religion are to be restored. As the "wise men from the east" came to herald the birth of the Messiah at his first advent, so, at his second appearing, it is "the kings of the east,"—"the kings from the rising of the sun," as it is better translated—the saints—who are to greet the coming of the King of kings and Lord of lords; and with loud hosannas proclaim their adoration, saying: "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee: for thy judgments are made manifest."—Rev. xv. 3, 4.

The lecturer concluded by saying that the signs of the times seem to indicate the rapid approach of that great crisis in human affairs long foretold in Scripture, when "three great champions had entered the lists and were aspiring to the government and dominion of the world. These are despotism, democracy and Omnipotence. The struggle between the two first, as illustrated in the history of Greece and Rome, in ancient times, and in modern Europe, particularly in France. England and America in more recent periods, would be fearful but brief—that democracy, though apparently successful and even triumphant for a time in the United States and republican France, would be forced to succumb to the power of standing armies and the force of organization which would be hurled against it—and despotism, proud of its conquests and enthroned in absolute power in Constantinople, Vienna, Berlin, or St. Petersburg, would fondly indulge its dream of universal sovereignty. The delusion will be brief, and its catastrophe overwhelming, for it is not for mortal man to grasp the sceptre of universal dominion. That is an inheritance reserved by the Highest for his Son and King at his right hand in the heavens. This truth is taught most impressively and undeniably in the Holy Scriptures. In the second Psalm we read: "Why do the heathen (nations) rage and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against his Anointed (Christ), saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall hold them in derision. Then shall he speak to them in his wrath and vex them in his sore displeasure. Yet have I set my King on my holy hill of Zion. I will declare the decree: The Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day (of his resurrection) have I begotten thee. Ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen (nations) for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron. Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel," &c.

Psalm seventy-second saith to the same purport: "Yea, all kings shall fall down before him—all nations shall serve him." "His name shall endure forever, and men shall be blessed in him. All nations shall call him blessed"—for he is King of kings, and Lord of lords—the Prince of peace—the Desire of all nations—Governor of the nations upon earth—Prince of the kings of the earth—Abraham's Seed—Israel's King—David's Son and Lord—God's Anointed Ruler—under whose powerful yet benign sway there shall be, for the first time in human history, that promised peace on earth and good will among men, which all so ardently desire. Amen.

And every harp attuned to sing Messiah's reign.

The entire number of Jews in the world is variously estimated from six to fifteen millions. The approximation nearest the truth, in all probability, gives about eight or nine millions. Of this number European Russia alone has 2,277,000; Austria, 1,250,000; Turkey, 500,000; Germany, 550,000; Africa, 320,000; Eastern Asia, 310,000; the Netherlands, 65,000; France, Italy, Spain, Portugal and Switzerland, 200,000; India, China, and Persia, 500,000; Arabia, 200,000; United States, 500,000. Total in the countries named, 7,972,000.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the dual "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Letter to a Friend.

Friend John, Millwood, Ind.:

It is a long time since I wrote to you last, so I have concluded to write you a short letter, and have chosen for my subject the "Evolution" or "Development" theory of the creation of the world.

1. What are we to understand by the "evolution or development theory?"

If I got a correct understanding of the matter from the conversation I had with you on the subject a year ago, it is this: The evolution theory presumes that there is or was no Creator, to form or create the different species of animals which now exist, but that a bit of jelly was created, or rather created itself, endowed with the power of developing itself into a being a little higher than itself, and that this second class of beings had the ability to develop itself into a third class of still higher development, and so continued on and on, still developing itself higher and higher, until finally man came out of the development.

This theory of the evolution of life presumes that this process of growing from a bit of jelly to a perfect man extended through millions on millions of years, so that when Adam and Eve were in the beautiful garden of Eden they had been developing themselves through myriads of years—first as a point of of jelly, or monad, (a being of one cell), and then in the course of time this monad became a being of two cells; and then, after an unknown period of time, it became a being of four cells; and thus it went on and on in developing and increasing itself in the number of cells, until it became a much higher species of being than it had ever before been. Ultimately it became an insect, then successively a frog, a fish, a bat, a bird, and then passing through innumerable grades of creatures, it became a mole, then a rat, and next a cat, ultimately it became a monkey, then a gorilla, and finally a man—man, most curiously and wonderfully made!

Thus were myriads of years consumed in bringing man from a monad to his present permanent position.

This is simply a theory gotten up by some very wise (or unwise, which do you think?) men, doubtless gotten up for the purpose of screening themselves from the responsibility they are under to an all-wise Creator. But this theory is as baseless as novel; for they have no facts on which to base their pet theory; and in reality they do not pretend to have any, but content themselves in mere presumption. It is readily admitted that changes in color and size, and also in point of symmetry, have occurred in the same species; but no proof whatever can be found showing it at all probable that any of the lower species are ever developed into a higher species. No proof can be produced that, after an unknown period of time, a mole becomes a rat or a cat, or that an ape ever becomes a man, or a horse an elephant. Although a change in the mode of life in some animals occurs, yet they are not changed to other species. As for instance, the caterpillar changes to a butterfly, the tadpole to a frog, and the little diminutive creature in the measly hog to a tapeworm in man; but these changes, with many others that might be named, are only different stages of the same animal's existence. The butterfly lays the egg from which the caterpillar comes, which, in turn, changes again to a butterfly; the tadpole is only the first stage of the frog after being hatched from the egg; the tapeworm thirty or forty feet long is but the second stage of existence of that minute creature found in the measly hog. No change of species whatever occurs in these different modes of existence.

True, the natural order of things at the creation seems to have been that of succession; the lowest and simplest being having been first brought into existence, then successively those that were more complicated in their nature—from the insects and creeping things to the birds of the air and the beasts of the forest, and finally man, to cap the climax of the whole creation on the earth, only a little lower than the angels of heaven, was made of the dust of the earth. Gen. ii. 7.

Now, whether this evolution or development theory of life manifestation be true, or whether the Bible account be the true theory, I can see no difference so far as the manifestation of power is concerned on the part of the Creator. For it seems to me that the same power that would enable a simple cell, or monad being, to develop itself into a man, could just as easily create a man out of the earth at once, and cause him to live, move and manifest intelligence, as upon the former theory. So that, so far as reason is concerned, there is nothing gained by adopting your theory of life manifestation; for there must have been a first cause somewhere or somehow. Unless we say that the first link of this long series of changing or developing of a simple cell point of jelly into a man was spontaneous, and began its life by certain organic forces over which it had no control. But spontaneous generation also implies laws. Who created those laws? Who gave to a bit of jelly the power of changing its nature, and of becoming more and more complicated in its character? Evolutionists themselves do not pretend to know anything about the way, or order of evolution; so they try to pry into the secrets of the infinite, and start up a theory with regard to his ways, "which are (really) past finding out." So they express conjectures, and try to tell how the world was made.

But the query is, Have we any evidence that moles change to rats, and rats to cats, and apes to men? Have any species ever been known to change into any others? Or is it simply all atheistic assumption? Undoubtedly that is all. I do not doubt the changes constituting the retrogression or improvement of the same species. This is altogether reasonable, according to a violation of, or a strict compliance with, the laws of nature as appointed by the God of nature. The splendid horses, cattle, and sheep of to-day are descendants of the miserable stock that existed hundreds of years ago. These changes are truly very great, but does this prove that one species will ever change into another, more perfect than its own? By no means; it simply proves a retrogression of the same species, and afterward, by a strict compliance with the laws of their being, they have been improved and developed into the beautiful animals which we now have. Yet they are still the same species. Horses are still horses—and so with all the other species of animals.

Now, dear friend, in the absence of any evidence whatever, why is it that men of good, sound minds will cling to such a baseless theory, with such a death grasp? Is it not simply for the purpose of arguing themselves out of the belief in a Great First Cause, or Creator of the universe, that they may have a seeming retreat from the responsibility they are under to their Creator and Benefactor?

Dear friend, let me entreat you to reconsider the step you have taken. Perhaps you may yet see the great risk you are running. Now, admitting that your theory might even be true, what comfort or consolation can it possibly yield you in a coming day? All the consolation any one can possibly find in such a theory as the above, it seems to me, would be in the prospect of annihilation or non-existence. This is the only hope an infidel can possibly have of the future.

I will give you a sketch of an obituary notice that appeared in the Boston Investigator some time ago, of a man eighty-eight years old. It was stated that he retained his reasoning faculties to the very last. Shortly before his death, when asked by a friend whether he had changed his opinion with regard to his future destiny, in view of the near approach of death, he produced a slip of paper on which was written the fourth verse of the 146th Psalm, and said that it expressed his views, and that he had copied it himself: "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish."

This, then, was his only hope after sixty-five years of hard service in the cause of infidelity. He was bowed down by the weight of many long years, spent in unbelief and sneering at God's word. His race was nearly run; death stared him in the face. No hope lights up the portals of the tomb for him! Poor, forlorn man! In this dark hour of terrible need he remembers the good old book, at which he had so often sneered. His philosophy now fails! His friends can not help him now! No consolation, no hope now for the poor soul to lean upon, and console him in this, the last of his troubles! And in the agony of his soul he now reaches forth his trembling hand, at last, toward the Bible. He there finds the declaration that the dead are unconscious, and he clings to it with the greatest tenacity his last hours can command, as his last, his only hope. He copies it slowly and laboriously, for the hand is feeble and the eye is dim. But it is his last and only hope, and he copies it patiently for comfort in his dying hour. And surely there is a gleam of comfort even in this dark sentiment; for his thoughts doubtless tortured him in many a gloomy hour, and he looks forward to the sleep of death as a time when conscience may at last be still. Yet he hopes only for a relief from the thoughts that perish and the conscience that will then cease to goad him. But the next verse of the same Psalm does not suit him, and he passes it by. He does not lay any claims to it, as it can give him no comfort or consolation. It is the exultant exclamation, "Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help; whose hope is in the Lord, his God." But the poor dying infidel has no anchor here—no hope in the Lord, his God. The fondest dream he dares to cherish is that he may never awake from the sleep of death to meet the eye of the judge. His brightest hope is eternal death. And is this the best substitute infidelity has to offer for the Christian religion? It offers us despair instead of hope. It offers only death instead of life. But "Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help; whose hope is in the Lord, his God." These words point triumphantly to a life beyond the grave—to a rescue from the bonds of death. Yes, it lights up with glory even the portals of the tomb, for the God of Jacob is a tower of strength; and he that hath him for his help is safe, not only in the quiet sleep of death, but he is safe when the sound of the trump of God shall ring through the valleys of earth, and wake the sleeping dead. Yes, safe when the reign of death is forever past, and the river of life gusheth forth from beneath the throne of God. Safe when the pearly gates of the city—the New Jerusalem—shall be opened, and the soldiers of the king pass through, with crowns of everlasting joy upon their heads.

Oh, dear friend, would to God that you, with me, might be so happy as to gain an entrance there. Amen.

JOSEPH MESSIMORE.

Index of Character.

It is in the minute circumstances of a man's conduct that we are to inquire of his real character. In these he is under the influence of his natural disposition, and acts for himself; while in his more open and important actions he may be drawn by public opinion, and many other external motives, from that bias which his disposition would have taken.

The things which an active mind most needs, is a purpose and direction worthy of its activity.—Bover.

Baptism.

I. Baptism Essential to Salvation? II. Is it a Saving Ordinance? and is Baptism by Immersion the only Mode Taught in the Scriptures?

To the above questions we unhesitatingly say yes. It is a positive command of the Lord Jesus Christ, taught both by precept and example, and most positively enjoined upon the apostles. "Go ye therefore and teach all nations (or make disciples of them), baptizing them in (or into) the name of Father, Son and Spirit, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world (age or dispensation)." Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth even now save us, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him." 1 Pet. iii. 21, 22. All Bible teaching is in perfect harmony with the two passages quoted; and is inseparably joined with repentance and faith, and without them our christian super-structure or character is built upon the sand. To disregard or refuse to do what the great head of the Church has ordained and commanded, places us with the unbelieving and disobedient who cannot inherit the kingdom of God. To substitute something else, or even be immersed in water without an intelligent faith in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, is alike invalid, and will not insure a high position in the kingdom of God. If the foundation is an important, yea, and an essential, part of our building; if the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do? Psa. xi. 3; Matt. vii. 24-27. Please read, as they are important. How and the thought that thousands are hoping [illegible] be the first step according the Master's plain and positive command—"Go ye into all the world for habitation; and preach the gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." These are the conditions: Repentance, faith and baptism, one Lord, one faith, one baptism. Eph. iv. 5. God made men upright, but he has sought out many inventions; the wonder is that infidelity has not captured the entire race, looking at it from a Gentile stand point or protestantism of the 19th century. The church has gone away from her Lord—has been divided and sub-divided. Each have their faith; one at variance with the other, it is a complete jargon. It would be a herculean task to write out the inventions of men, touching the faiths and doctrines of Gentilism. How fearfully do they contrast with the inspired word of God; how plain; how simple, and how easy of comprehension, and how glorious in the results; what a privilege, yea, what an honor, to be planted together in the likeness of his death, giving a positive assurance, we shall be in the likeness of his resurrection. Buried with Christ by baptism into death, like as Christ was raised by the glory of the Father, so shall we walk in the newness of life before him. Our repentance being after a godly sort, our faith intelligent, our baptism valid, we have the foundation of our hope, of a future life laid upon the Rock, Christ Jesus, solid and immovable as the throne of the Eternal One. Having thus obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine so positively taught and enjoined in the Scriptures, we are in a saved condition, and from this point we can claim all the promises of God, yea, even the precious blood of Jesus our great atoning sacrifice, which cleanseth from all sin. From this point we are to add to our faith all the Christian graces, and nothing can separate us from Christ (for we are in him to all intents and purposes) but apostasy from the truth. Moses says "A prophet shall the Lord raise up unto Israel like unto me, him shall ye hear in all things; whosoever will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people." How important then, that we hear, believe and obey the teachings of Christ, the Son of God; he spake the words of God, and his word is to judge men in the last days.

In our affirmation at the head of this article we do not include the baptism of the Holy Spirit which was poured out on Pentecost, and upon the household of Cornelius. That prerogative belongs to God alone, which he has never delegated to mortal man in flesh. There is yet another baptism, Matt. iii. 11, last clause of the verse; also 12 verse. This is in the future. We are not sure but this fearful work has already begun. Our conviction is that it dates from the year 1871, at the great fire at Chicago, and that it will increase with great rapidity until the floor is thoroughly purged, the wheat gathered into the granary, and the chaff burnt up with unquenchable fire. And now, dear halting, hesitating ones, we would not leave you without a word of counsel and warning; this night thy soul may be required of thee. O flee to the Savior. He stands with open arms to receive you; escape for thy life, and look not behind thee. Remember Lot's wife.

We are laboring to the full extent of the ability God has given us to get men and women in the way of salvation. God does bless his own precious truth, praise his holy name! Three intelligent believers have put on Christ and are rejoicing in the truth; two are (or have been) Baptist ministers. Bro. Anderson has more than ordinary preaching ability and has entered into the work in good earnest. We hope for good results. Elder Patterson is 71 years old, has poor health, has been a Baptist preacher over fifty years, is of good ability and well informed. His address before going into the water to his children and grand children and the people, was very impressive and affecting. His reasons for re-immersion were valid and satisfactory. He said he had not understood the teachings of the Scriptures in order to a valid baptism; he had not understood them to teach that the son of God was to come again to the earth in power and glory, to establish his kingdom and to rule the world in righteousness [illegible] points I need not name.

These things call for deep humility and self abasement before God. A word now to those of like precious faith: Our time for labor in the Lord's vineyard is indeed short. Let us quit ourselves manfully and be found at our post with the harness on.

Theory Against Practice.

In a certain college, in which the Rev. Dr.——, a presbyterian minister, was the Professor of Greek, there was a quizzical genius of a student whose name we will call Newlet.

Now, it it so happened that the Rev. Doctor was seriously exercised in his mind by the thought that most of the people in the community entirely misunderstood the meaning and use of that much persecuted Greek verb, baptizo; and accordingly undertook to enlighten the natives, by preaching a series of sermons on baptism.

Newlet attended regularly upon the ministrations of his learned Professor, and in the course of two or three Sabbaths was pretty well dosed with the statement that baptizo meant to sprinkle or to pour—not to plunge.

But in the course of the regular lessons, in the class-room of the college, Newlet was one day called upon to translate a passage from one of the Greek authors. The passage gave an account of a man who became so enraged with another, that he seized a red-hot poker and chaptize eis ophthalmon. Newlet, with a mischievous twinkle of the eye, but with a grave manner, translated it thus: "He seized a red-hot poker and sprinkled it into his eye."

"How is that!" said the Rev. Professor, "He sprinkled into his eye," repeated Newlet.

"But," said the doctor, "the word chaptizo does not mean to sprinkle."

"Well, sir, it did mean to sprinkle on last Sunday night," replied the mischievous fellow amid suppressed laughter from the class, who keenly relished the joke.

The Rev. doctor looked grave; was silent a moment, and then remarked, "You may translate it plunge, here sir."

We are inclined to think that this is quite a good practical refutation of learned work of Dr. Dale on "Classic Baptism."—Baptist Visitor.

Riches got by fraud are dug out of one's own heart, and destroy the mind.

Sententious Paragraphs.

There is not a string attached to faith but has its chord of melancholy.

The essence of the divine unity is love, and God is only known by loving him.

Towers are measured by their shadow, and great men by those who are envious of them.

Necessity of action takes away the fear of the net, and makes bold resolution the favorite of fortune.

Friendship is never completed till men are bound to each other by the common experience of sorrow.

DOUBT.

The mountain's image trembles in the lake;
Look up. Perhaps the mountain does not quake.

A great many men—some comparatively small men now—when put into positions, would be Luthers and Columbuses.—Chapin.

When the heart is pure, there is hardly anything which can mislead the understanding in matters of immediate personal concernment.

There is many a rest on the road of life
If we would only stop to take it;
And many a tone from the better land,
If the supercilious heart would wake it.
To the weary soul that is full of hope,
And whose beautiful trust never faileth,
The grass is green and the flowers are bright,
Though the wintry storm prevaileth.

He who freely praises what he means to purchase, and he who commemorates the faults of what he means to sell, may set up a partnership with honesty.

There is one single fact which one may oppose to all the wit and argument of infidelity, viz:—That no man ever on his death bed repented of being a Christian.

One glance of God, a touch of his love, will free and enlarge the heart, so that it can deny all, and part with all, and make an entire renouncing of all to follow him.—Leighton.

"To all to walk with cheerful heart
In God's own fortune cast,
With a friendly glance and an open hand,
And a gentle word for all;
Since life is a stormy and difficult path,
Where foul the portion of many,
We all should endeavor, while passing along,
To make it as smooth as we can."

Many lose the opportunity of saying a kind thing, by waiting to weigh the matter too long. Our best impulses are too delicate to endure much handling. If you fail to give them expression the moment they rise, they effervesce, evaporate, and are gone. If they do not turn sour, they become flat, losing all life and sparkle by keeping. Speak promptly when you feel kindly.

The Insatiableness of Man.—Give a man the necessaries of life and he wants the conveniences. Give him the conveniences, and he craves for the luxuries. Grant him the luxuries, and he sighs for the elegancies. Let him have the elegancies, and he yearns for the follies. Give him all together and he complains that he has been cheated both in the price and quality of the article.

Do Everything Well.

If you have something to attend to, go about it coolly and thoughtfully, and do it just as well as you can. Do it as though it were the only thing you had ever to do in your life, and as if everything depended upon it. Then your work will be well done, and it will afford you genuine satisfaction. Often much more does depend upon the manner in which things, seemingly trivial, are performed than one would suppose, or that it is possible to foresee. Do everything well, and you will find it conducive to your happiness, and that of those with whom you come in contact.

Always Look on the Cheerful Side.

It is a great misfortune to have a fretful disposition. It takes the fragrance out of one's life, and leaves only weeds where a cheerful disposition would cause flowers to bloom. The habit of fretting is one that grows rapidly unless it be sternly repressed; and the best way to overcome it is to try always to look on the cheerful side of things.

It is the most beautiful truth in morals, that we have no such thing as a distinct or divided interest for our race. In their welfare, is ours, and by choosing the broadest paths to effect their happiness, we choose the surest and the shortest to our own.—Bulwer Lytton.

The Restitution.

E. L. CHAPLIN, Editor.

Our Best. This neat monthly is still published by Brother Thomas Wilson, at Chicago, Ill. The last few numbers contain some pieces of a very interesting character.

The Advent Christian Times. This paper is now coming out in a new form, in new type, and with a new and attractive head. It has changed its form from four pages to one of sixteen.

In our Letter Drawer will be found some kind expressions, appreciative of the RESTITUTION, from brethren who also have given substantial aid. We are only receiving enough to meet publication expenses.

BROTHER CYRUS TABER and wife left on Monday for Magnolia, Miss. His object is to try the effect of a southern climate as a means of restoring his health, which has been quite poor for some time. Brother Halstead resides at Magnolia.

WE have had our time so completely occupied with the business of the paper, and with copying several articles in the present number, that we have no time for writing anything at length. Correspondents and queriers must be patient. Will do all we can.

IF our brethren and friends will be prompt in renewing, and if those who can, will do something extra, we hope to give the paper every week during the last half of the year. All that we receive shall be strictly appropriated to the expenses of publication. We hope that an abundant harvest will bring the means to our brethren so that they can aid the paper.

WE duly received the report of the third quarterly conference of the Southeastern Iowa A. C. conference which convened at Brooklyn, Iowa, on the 9th of June, 1877, from the secretary, Brother J. Harvey Mills. We intended to give the report in full, but an accumulation of manuscripts caused us to delay, and as we are still very much crowded for room, and as this number of our paper contains a report of a still later meeting, we have concluded to give only a synopsis of Brother Mills' report. The subject of the union of the different conferences in the state was up for discussion, but without any very decided results, as there was no very general representation. It was argued that the discrepancies of views should be subordinated to the important work of endeavoring to save the perishing everywhere; and to this end co-operation in sustaining a state Evangelist appeared very necessary. The conference was attended by Brother Myers and other delegates from the West Irving church. In the order of proceedings, the president, Elder C. W. Pitner, made a good and spiritual report. Reports from other ministers contained matters of interest from the different fields of labor, comprising West Irving, Belle Plaine, Ledora and Brooklyn, as well as the country more generally. The character of all the ministers in attendance was found irreproachable, and, in instructing them, they were earnestly counseled to preach short, effective sermons. Delegates were appointed to attend the New Hartford camp meeting and conference. The conference adjourned after deciding to hold the next session in connection with the Union camp meeting.

In the Field.

Brother Chaplin:—I spent last Sunday with the congregation at Goodland, spoke in the morning upon the subject of the Lake of fire, showing when, where, and what that symbol represents. In the evening I spoke upon the hidden pound in the napkin. The attendance was good, and the interest all that could be desired.

In the afternoon I went about five miles to Brother Willcox's grove meeting. From eight to ten hundred people were in attendance to hear the Word. In the morning Brother W. spoke upon the subject of Christ our Life-giver, and in the afternoon the writer discoursed upon the subject of the Kingdom of God. The best of attention was given to the Word of life, and a deep conviction rested upon many minds. A Wesleyan minister in this community, has embraced the Bible view of man and his destiny, and is now being hauled over the coals for heresy. He has called upon Brother W. to give him help in the battle which he has promised to do. There is a growing interest everywhere, to hear upon the great questions of our faith and hope. Men of talent and influence are coming into the work. May God speed the right. Your brother,

H. V. REED.

Exegetical.

Son of man, set thy face against Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him, and say, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I am against thee, O Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal.—Ezek. xxxviii. 2, 3.

ROSH (Ezek. xxxviii. 2, 3.) in the clause literally, "Magog the prince of Rosh," in our version, erroneously, "chief prince," regarding the word as meaning "head." Rosh is a Scythian tribe on the Volga; and in the name we recognize Russ. Russian.—John Kells, D. D., L. L. D., Professor of Biblical Literature to the United Presbyterian Church.

Union in Christ.

What is the essence of the Christian life? I reply that it is personal union with Christ. The oneness of the regenerate soul with Christ—the life of Jesus becoming (mysteriously, we admit, but really and vitally) the life of the Christian. See how full Scripture is of this great truth:

"I know a man in Christ," is St. Paul's designation of a Christian.

"If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature."

"There is now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus."

In Christ! Here is personal union—heart with heart, spirit with spirit—life mingling with life; not only our life passing, as it were, into his, but his coming into ours. For says St. Paul—"I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." "And Christ is in you the hope of glory."

Look again at the figures of Scripture: "He is the head, we the body of Christ—his members. He is the Corner Stone; we are the living stones built into him, a glorious temple unto the Lord." "He is the vine, we are the branches;" and, says he, "Abide in me." Listen to his last prayer on earth—his intercessory prayer as the High Priest of his people. What is the burden of it? That his people may be one with him as he is one with the Father: "As thou, Father, art in me and I in thee, that they may be one in us." Oh! here is union, personal, vital. Language could go no farther to express it. It is this great truth which the apostle strives to grasp in one text—"Your life is hid with Christ in God."

Religion is a life—not a system of truth for the intellect alone—not a succession of good deeds, a mosaic work of moralities. No! it is a life, an organic thing. It is something which grows, and is fed, and assimilates other substances into itself. It is a living root, developing from within into branch and leaf, and flower and fruit. It is a well-spring, a fountain. Oh! how much is there in that one word—life! Our religion is a life. It is fresh and natural and beautiful as the budding rose, the graceful vine or waving tree.

Again, it is a life a divine life in God—the life of God in the soul of man. Not the outgrowth of human nature, but heavenly seed implanted from above—a divine heaven working in the depths of the soul and leavening the whole with the life of God.

Not only so but it is a life "hid with Christ." Here is the full consummation of our statement that religion is a personal union with Christ. A life hid with Christ. In Christ is the hiding of his power. In Christ is its source and well-spring. From Christ flows all its sustenance, even as the sap flows from the main stem of the vine to each tiny branch. With Christ is the believer's life—with him by partaking of his life; with him by oneness of sympathy, of tastes, of enjoyments.—Bishop Cummins.

What Is Death?

BY H. V. REED.

It is hard to find an exact answer to this question. Seneca says: "After death there comes nothing." Virgil calls death "an iron sleep, an eternal night." One poet has stated that death is the "gate to endless joy," etc. The ancients called sleep and death twins. Old Gorgias, when dying, said: "Sleep is about to deliver me up to his brother." In our times, death is the all-important event in human destiny. It is claimed that Abel, the first martyr, was taken to realms of happiness by means of death. He was the first one to enter heaven from our earth. Abraham and all the patriarchs were transported to the home of the good, by means of death. Some modern writers state that it is the new birth and the resurrection. It is also stated that Christ makes his second coming and death synonyms. When men die, they are at once borne away from the scenes of evil to life and happiness. Indeed the whole drift of modern theories is to extol death as our best friend. The ancient Dacians were brave soldiers and desired to die upon the battle field, as in that event they would be ranked among the noblest heroes immediately after death. From the field [illegible] gods. It is now claimed that as soon as we die, we become like the angels. We gain the victory by becoming captives. By means of death heaven has been peopled from our earth, and hell has received multitudes from our shores. In view of all these facts, if facts they are, is it any wonder that men have ceased to take any interest in the Bible idea of Messiah's coming and the resurrection of the dead? Death can meet all of our demands. By means of this event men leave the evils of life, are at once placed beyond all pain, are made recipients of the crown of glory, enter at once upon our reward and behold our Savior, and all the good in heaven. Could we ask for more? Every promise, really, affecting our eternal happiness, can be obtained by means of death. This view of the case practically does away with all other events as of any importance. True, there may be auxiliary events which may add something to the saint's joys, but death must be considered the central and all-important event in our destiny.

The above view is in accordance with much that is now being preached as the gospel of God. Now let us turn to the Bible and learn, if we can, what view the writers of that Sacred Book took of that most appalling of all events, death!

PROP. 1. Death came into the world as a penalty.

The evidences upon this point are uniform and abundant. The apostle in writing to the Romans, says: "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v. 12: see also verses 14 and 21; Gen. ii. 17; chap. iii. 1–4, 17–24; Ezek. xviii. 4; Rom. vi. 23.

Now, if death came into the world as a punishment for sin, how can we change it into our best friend and make it the gate to endless joy? Had it not been for death, Abel would have remained upon earth until this day, but by means of this event, he has had thousands of years of pure happiness which he would have lost had it not been for this. Death came by sin as a penalty, and yet it is the only means of eternal happiness. Strange logic, this.

PROP. 2. Christ is represented as having abolished death.

"But now is made manifest by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. i. 10; see also Rev. i. 18.

If death has been the means of filling heaven with immortal spirits from the earth, why should our Lord abolish it, if, therefore, death is the gate to endless joy, Jesus must have brought a calamity instead of a blessing when he abolished or shut the gate.

PROP. 3. The wicked are to get celebrated death at the resurrection.

"So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory. Oh death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory." 1 Cor. xv. 51–55.

It will be seen by the above that our victory is deferred until the resurrection. Then this mortal puts on immortality, then the grave loses its power and the dead come forth to an endless life. The resurrection is "the gate to endless joy." Not death.

PROP. 4. The Scriptures represent death as our last enemy and as such it is to be finally destroyed.

"For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed, is death." 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26. If death has done so much for humanity and given heaven so many dear saints, why must it be vanquished by our risen Lord? Among the ineffable triumphs of the redeemed, we have it stated that they have reached that world where death comes not. There shall be no more pain, no more tears, no more death. We must conclude then for us that the Bible idea is against the dogma, that death is our friend. It has been made to take the place of the resurrection and the coming of our dear Lord. It belongs to the curse, and as such it shall be removed. Let us return to the apostolic and Christian hope of the resurrection from the dead, as the time of victory and blessedness. Indeed, if there be no resurrection, our hope is vain. Even as Paul says: "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then THEY ALSO WHICH ARE FALLEN ASLEEP IN CHRIST ARE PERISHED." 1 Cor. xv. 17, 18.

Eastern Items.

CONSTANTINOPLE, July 13.—Many Mussulmans, with their wives and children fleeing before the Russians, have been killed by the Bulgarians in the Khan Bogaz defile, between Tirnova and Kezanlik.

VIENNA, July 13.—Advices from St. Petersburg state that a reserve of Cossacks, consisting of twenty regiments and ten batteries, in all 20,000 men, are preparing to follow the 12,000 men who have already marched from Saratova for Armenia. When ready, the army will take the direct route to Erzeroum.

BERLIN, July 14.—The German settlers in the Dobrudscha are seriously suffering from the war. The German government has complained to Russia and Turkey of their ill treatment by the soldiers of both countries.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg, July 13, states that the Russian Telegraphic agency says: "Prince Bismarck declares it to be his opinion that any mediation is at present impossible."

KARS, July 13.—Mukhtar Pasha and the commandant of Kars are preparing a combined attack on the Russian center, consisting of forty-five battalions of infantry, two regiments of dragoons, six regiments of Cossacks, and thirteen field batteries. More than thirty siege batteries are in position four thousand metres north-east of Kars.

LONDON, July 13.—The Inter Ocean's correspondent cables the following: "The English naval movement—that of sending a powerful fleet to Besika Bay, means a menace of intervention if Russia shall attempt to occupy Constantinople in violation of her pledges. In short, British opinion does not trust those pledges, and is suspicious of the faith with which Germany accepts them. The situation is one of interest both to this country and yours. Few doubt that if Russia wins against the Turks at all, she will accept no terms short of the freedom of the Dardanelles, but as that gives Russia almost illimitable power to menace British commerce in the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, it furnishes England a strong motive for war unless her fears can be disarmed by diplomacy. Turkey defeated, has it in her exclusive power to concede the point which Russia demands, and the porte, when his own cause is lost, will have no pro-English motive for withholding it. This reasonable fear of Turkish alienation is perhaps the true key to British war preparations such as may avert the war itself by showing Britain's readiness and power to back diplomacy by [illegible] force of arms. Only in this way can she maintain her Indian interests without being involved in a serious war, with crippled Turkey as her only ally."

LONDON, July 16.—The Russians have established a military tribunal at Telvi, to try Mussulmans accused of complicity in the Bulgarian massacres, and are executing men convicted on Bulgarian testimony.

NEW YORK, July 16.—Despatches from London say the British Consuls in Bulgaria confirm the reported atrocities committed upon the Mussulman population in the Khanbogaz defile. Old and young men were massacred without remorse, while women and girls were terribly mutilated. The Porte charges the Kossacks with sacking villages near Rustchuk, murdering the males and violating the females.

A St. Petersburg dispatch says the Russians from Sistova made an assault in heavy forces upon and captured Nikopolis this morning.

Eighteen thousand bombs have been fired at Kars. The expense is 1,500,000 rubles.

Foreshadowings of Coming Events.

Great convulsions in the natural world are usually preceded by signs which indicate their approach. A solemn portentous stillness settles down on the face of nature. The winds are hushed. Vegetation droops. A dusky lurid light overspreads the sky. The atmosphere becomes oppressive and stifling. The busy life of the insect world ceases. The sheep betake themselves to their folds, or are collected in trembling groups. The birds retreat to the groves and flutter restlessly among the branches. No noise is heard save some solitary cry, which, as it breaks the general silence, increases the general alarm. Expectancy and eager anticipation prevail.

Moral and political convulsions are, in like manner, preceded by indications which announce their coming. In purely political convulsions, the expectation, which is the invariable consequent of the indications going before, and the immediate forerunner of the catastrophe itself, need be traced to no higher source than to the minds of which it has taken possession. Without the lamp of divine truth, a man may be able to explain the natural movements which are transpiring in his own bosom, or about to emerge in the society of which he is a component part, and to which he is inwardly linked by countless mysterious ties.

It is altogether different when the deep-seated causes which awaken the slumbering volcano are of a moral or religious nature. Here the secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. The light of the word of God is the only safe guide, whether of our hopes or our fears. Only those whose minds are daily bathed in the living fountain of truth, who are imbued with its spirit, who have drunk in its prophetic teachings, whose aspirations, by constant contact with its moral lessons, have been brought into harmony with the principles upon which the divine government is conducted,—such only can duly understand either the sources or the ultimate issues of those events which we expect to be accomplished when the "Lord maketh bare his holy arm in the eye of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God." There exists at the present moment a prevalent impression among God's people, that important events are at hand,—that a crisis greater than any which has appeared since the beginning of time, is fast approaching, and that however short or long its continuance, it will result in the discomfiture of the enemies of God, and the delivering and enlargement of his people. We hear of this expectation from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south. It is a conviction which has forced itself upon their consideration—which has sprung up spontaneously in their minds. We find a definite expectation of events, great and terrible, coupled with most undefined conceptions respecting the particular forms they may assume,—a clear apprehension of their general character, bearing, and results, united with obscurity of vision in regard to their special attributes and accompaniments; a remarkable unity of sentiment as to characteristic features, with some diversity as to subordinate details. This state of mind which prevades the Christian world is precisely that which we ought to expect on the eve of an era so momentous. It is sufficient to stimulate prayer and intelligent observation, whilst it neither interferes with freedom of action, nor with the due performance of public duty.

Whence comes a unanimity so marvellous—a consent almost universal? Doubtless the same reasons essentially have, at one time or other, entered the hearts of all, and determined their judgment. It is few comparatively may have given themselves the trouble to frame their conviction to its sources, to distinguish its several grounds and sum them up in order.—Selected.

Ever keep these precepts ten."

Carefully culled statistics are adduced to show that the chances of life are longer in France than elsewhere in Europe. Of a million inhabitants who reach their sixtieth year Italy has 71,602; England, 76,910; Holland, 76,934; Sweden, 78,187; Denmark, 86,057; Belgium, 88,432; France, 101,495. Great Britain has the best show of centenarians.

Mohammed's birthday was celebrated as usual in Cairo this year. The imaum rode for a quarter of an hour on horseback over the prostrate faithful. The number of these was limited to three hundred, and to a very low class. Many broken legs, arms, and ribs, and some fractured skulls were the result. Fifteen of the wounded have since died.

A reception by the Sultan is spoken of as having group: of officers in the national costume dotted about the splendid hall, in attitudes of the deepest humility, their eyes cast down, their arms crossed, and taking care always to face the Sultan, wherever he might be. The highest officials carry themselves before him in the most abject manner, like crouching slaves.

The railroad car of the Emperor Alexander can be run on any tracks in Europe, whatever the gauge may be, owing to a peculiar arrangement of the wheels. It contains a parlor, a bedroom, and a dining room, all magnificently furnished. The Emperor sends ahead a pilot locomotive. Half an hour after the Imperial train starts a wrecking train follows, to be on hand in case of accident. Twenty minutes behind this is a train with the imperial suite, and lastly an escort of 300 soldiers.

The late head of the Greek Church at St. Petersburg is thus described. "That fine carriage, with six horses, the two first bearing postillions in long frock coats and prodigious cocked hats, with two footmen back of the carriage, in the same costume, and the coachman holding the reins in Russian style, with outstretched arms and the palms upward, contains the Metropolitan of St. Petersburg. He is a venerable looking old man, with a long, snowy beard, and straight head-dress like a brimless hat, covered with white cashmere, which falls behind. His forehead is surmounted by a diamond cross, his long, loose robe hangs in folds, and his breast is covered with crosses and stars. The people salute him and uncover their heads with much reverence, and he raises his hand, as if he were bestowing a benediction upon them."

If we be not the death of our lusts, they will be the death and ruin of us.

It tends much to encourage our faith to reflect on the great things God has done for us.

The First-Fruits.

Deut. xxvi. 2-10; 1 Cor. xv. 23.

Just as the Hebrew priest received
The first sheaf from the reaper's hand,
And to the Lord, whom they believed,
Offered the harvest of the land,
So Jesus, risen from the tomb,
Where love had laid him gently down,
Came to the altar, in the bloom
Of that new life which won the crown.

"Christ the first-fruit"—the next ripe sheaf
Of the wide world's great harvest-field,
The perfect pattern, type, and chief,
Of all the it seamless death shall yield.
So let the promise seed be sown
In every form of the earth,
Beneath the rain, in genial shine,
Till Christ, shall come the reapers forth.

Lord of the living and the dead,
Who art alive for evermore,
Thy sceptre sends await their Head
Like Mary at the open door.
The s shall come with them in that hour
When, without sin, thou empt'st to save:
Thou shalt be like them, by thy power
T raiser to th and spi the ave.

Break, break, O morning, fair and early;
Wake up the sleepers of the tombs;
O sun of glory! with thy light
Flood the dark vales, that yet lie gloom.
Wave thy reposeful, O Tree of life,
In the great house not made with hands,
And at thine Altar call the tribe
With shouts and songs from all lands.

"Christ the first-fruit"—and others shall
They that are Christ's when he shall come;
The first shall filled be evermore,
Then the full harvest-home.
Then shall our harvest-song arise,
When all thy sheaves are safe at home,
Singing the hymn of jubilee,
"Thy will is done!" "The kingdom come!"

Correspondence.

Editor Restitution:—We have been cheered by a visit from Brother Lawver, and it being our first meeting with any of the One Faith we made diligent use of his brief stay with us, both in hearing and asking him questions; only stopping when sleep put an end to his answering them.

Brother Lawver preached to us on the 5th instant, in Concert Hall, with a fair audience. After the preaching was over, we proceeded to the river, where my wife and myself, guided by our own convictions, were buried in the baptismal waters, in the One Faith. Brother Lawver preached to us in the evening again, on the Rich Man and Lazarus, the hearers giving good attention, with the exception of one or two sectarian preachers, who could not sit still and listen to our brother reasoning to them out of the Scriptures.

We were all comforted by our brother's exhortations to walk in the narrow way; thus showing our faith by our works, so that we may be found ready when the Lord comes as a thief to take out a people for his name, to bless all the nations of the earth.

Brethren, imagine the position of a ruler over the nations, as kings and priests! But such a position is not to be bought with corruptible things, but by patient continuance in well doing. If we suffer with him we shall also reign with him: "Not every one that saith Lord, Lord, but he that doeth the will of my father which is in Heaven."

Brethren, let us take unto ourselves the whole armor of God, that we may be able to stand in the day, having on the breastplate of righteousness, and our feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith we shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked, and take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, praying always with all prayer and supplication in the spirit; and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints, and for all brethren that utterance may be given them to open their mouths boldly to preach the gospel of the kingdom, lest when we have preached to others, we ourselves should be a castaway.

My love to with all the brethren in Christ Jesus.

Editor Restitution:—As I have not written for our paper for a while, I now pen a few words, if you think them worthy of a place, as I thought a few of the readers of the RESTITUTION would be glad for a few lines from me. I have been sick for more than a year, and, by the advice of our family physician, I left my home and friends in Missouri some weeks ago to travel for my health. Our journey has been a very long and weary one over the rough roads of Kansas, yet I think it has been very beneficial to me—even more so than I expected. Although Kansas composes a part of this beautiful earth, still we could see that the curse pronounced by our kind Creator was resting heavily on it. Although encountering difficulties, as every one does, still we saw objects worth looking at. We stopped three days with friends and saw some from Indiana whom I had not seen for more than twelve years, with whom we had an interesting time in talking about times and friends in Indiana. Saw more wheat fields than I had seen for years. Peaches, too, are abundant. We used to read of the good meetings in Kansas, but do we hear of them now? but very seldom. Why is it so, friends? Has the Bride fallen asleep? Or is as the sleepy virgins,—out no oil? If ever there was a time when we need oil, that time is now. The war in the East is a signal of his coming, yet some say we have heard of wars ever since we were made; children, as now we hear of wars and rumors of wars. The earth produce heaves, and the storms sweep it to and fro, and counter, leveling down what man has labored for years to build up to make the earth look beautiful. Church all the pains and labor taken to make it as beautiful and sound as when it came from the Creator's hands. With all their labor they can not remove the curse; neither can they build buildings that will stand forever. There is one building that will eternally stand; the house and throne of David, although overturned till he shall come whose right it is to reign. He will cause his laws to be obeyed whether willingly or not; for he will rule with a rod of iron. He will cause peace to prevail from sea to sea. Why were the throne and kingdom overturned? Because God's laws were not obeyed. Wickedness and disobedience, that still rule the world, have caused all the trouble. When he shall come whose right it is to rule the world every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess that he is Lord, for all shall worship before his holy throne. Then will the earth be as beautiful as at its creation. But who shall stand? He that hath a pure heart and clean hands. Let us watch and pray that we enter not into temptation. Let us keep ourselves from all the allurements of a gain-saying world, and let us watch and be ready for the call of the Bridegroom to enter the marriage feast. Let all who read our paper be ready at any moment.

From your sister,

MRS. LINDA HARROLD.

The New Birth.

Jesus told Nicodemus that "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." This astonished him. But he was not to go away without hearing language that would still amaze his inquiring mind beyond this. "Except a man be born of water, and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." That is, he cannot enter into the possession of the kingdom of God as one of the heirs and rulers of it. Nicodemus could not believe that he should have to pass through in his old age what he had passed through when an infant. No, this could not be it. But what was the question unanswered to his mind? "That which is born of the flesh, is flesh; and that which is born of the spirit, is spirit." This, he understood so far as flesh was concerned, but how could he be born again and then be spirit? he could not see. This was a great mystery to him, and is to the carnal minded to this day. "The wind bloweth where it listeth and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the spirit." Here he could no longer contain. Said he: "How can these things be?" The wind, he thought he understood, but how one born of the spirit could be like it, he knew not. "Are you a master in Israel and know not these things?" Do you not know that spirit is as free as the wind, and that if a man was born of flesh he would be flesh? Why then, can you not see that if one is born of spirit that he would be spirit? Is not this logical, Nicodemus? He could not see that when a man was born of spirit that he would be spirit, not flesh and blood; for when he was born of flesh, he was flesh; not spirit. He knew that in order to a birth of flesh, there must be first a begettal, but how was one to be begotten so as to be born of the spirit, and be spirit when born? This he could not understand. Nor can the flesh yet answer the question. John iii.

Now, if a flesh seed, deposited in the flesh, would produce a flesh man, what would spirit produce if deposited in the mind of man? That is, if a man should receive the Word of God into his understanding the word would be sure, if it produced anything, to produce its like, although for the time being that word might be clothed with flesh. Then, if it could throw off the flesh, it would be spirit certainly, and thus passing out of the flesh into the ocean of spirit, it would still be spirit; and, if in this process it should assume the likeness of that in which it had dwelt, or change flesh into spirit, then it would be a man born of spirit, and itself spirit and not flesh, though in flesh's likeness or image.

Now, in order to make a spirit man, we must sow spirit seed in good soil. James tells us, that of his own will begat he us with the Word of truth, that we should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures. James i. 18. And 1 Peter i. 2, 3, says: "Being born (begotten) again, not of corruptible seed (flesh seed), but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth forever," which is preached by the gospel. This gives his understanding of the begettal. Hence it is by the reception of the Word of Jesus Christ, the new man that by faith he forms in God and Adam until the old Adam is brought in subjection to the man dwelling in us by faith. Paul says that it was accomplished "through the gospel. For it is now as it was in the fathers, by faith, so it is to-day. Heb. xi. 39. We are to be raised with him into his death, and buried with him by baptism, and baptism into the name of Jesus Christ: therefore we are dead, buried, and risen with Christ in new life; let us seek those things which are above.

Yours fraternally,

E. C. MACKEY, M. D.

Christian Growth.

Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.—2 Pet. iii. 18.

Finite beings cannot arrive at physical or intellectual perfection, without growth. Growth is not an instantaneous, but, a progressive principle, occupying, in some instances, long ages for the accomplishment of its work. Look at the sturdy oak—the king of the forest—as its branches wave in the air, far above those of its lesser companions. How came it thus? Did it arrive at its present state of perfection in a single day? Or did long years elapse ere it reached its present lofty height? Undoubtedly many years have passed by, since the oak tree's tiny branches that waved in the gentle breeze, and its roots became interwoven in the rifted rock. Growth before perfection, is a universal law of the vegetable world. "For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." Mark iv. 28. This lesson is taught everywhere in the great volume of nature, as well as by the pen of inspiration. If a man ever arrives at perfection, either of knowledge or grace, it will be through this well known principle of growth. If he would not be a religious dwarf, or a petrified christian, he must grow, or advance. He must not lie. He is to exchange error for truth, no matter from what source it may come. Let no set of men cherish the delusive idea that "they are the people and wisdom will die with them;" that they have reached the ultima thule of religious truth. There is an inexhaustable fountain of truth, at which all may quaff without diminishing the supply. Ne plus ultra is no more appropriate, as a motto for Christians, than it was for Spain when she owned both sides of the Mediterranean at the Strait of Gibraltar. In the language of another: "So highly did she prize this possession, that she stamped on her coin the two pillars of Hercules, and in a scroll over these the motto ne plus ultra,—'the utmost extent,' or 'no more beyond.' But, one day, a noble, truth-loving, self-sacrificing spirit, sailed far beyond these pillars, and found a new world of beauty. Spain, convinced of her ignorance, resolved to make an important change in her foolish motto. She struck the word ne from the coin, but wisely left the words plus ultra—'more beyond.'" Would it not be wise for us to "adopt the motto of the Genoese navigator—'more beyond'—and sail boldly past the twin pillars of ignorance and superstition into the unexplored ocean of the future in quest of truth, the true dorir vita, more precious than the gold of Ophir or the diamonds of Golconda?" Shall we not advance in the noblest of human studies? Shall we not advance in the favor and knowledge of Him who is our life? (Col. iii. 3, 4; 1 Jno. v. 2, 12.) Shall we not advance from milk to strong meat? (Heb. v. 12-14; 1. Cor. xiii. 11; xiv. 20.) Shall we not change our former notions of theology, if they are demonstrated to be incorrect, or subversive of the truth? Growth or advancement is what is required of us. Growth is an indispensable prerequisite to future perfection. If we would share the sinless and deathless perfection of Christ, in the Age to Come, we must grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Him now. (Rom. vi. 9; Rev. i. 18; Mark x. 28-30; Isa. lx. 21; Jno. xvii. 3; 1 Jno. iii. 2.) Christians must "grow up into Him in all things, which is the head, even Christ," if they would "come into the unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God, into a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature (or age) of the fullness of Christ." Eph. iv. 13-15. The present age is an age of sorrow and imperfection. The age to come is the one with which is associated perfection and glory, crowns and thrones, eternal life and fulness of joy. "For now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face; now I know in part, but then shall I know even as I am known."

1 Cor. xi. 0-12; Phil. iii. 12; Heb. xi. 39, 40. The knowledge that is most needful for us to advance in is the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. This knowledge of Him is precious to believers. 1 Pet. ii. 7. Our fondest hopings, our cherished hopes of the boundless future, all rest in Him. He is the resurrection and the life. Jno. xi. 25; Acts xxvii. 31, 32. In the language of sister Lydia, we "let us remember it was the [illegible] knowledge of past ages, and the unprecedented learning and experience of the present generation [illegible] not acquired in a single day, nor in the lifetime of one man, but, near the [illegible] circle of one century, or duration, but little by little, as the coral reefs are piled up from the vast depths of the ocean, and great islands are formed in the sea, by little insects laboring on, through countless years and ages; so let us toil on, seeking after truth, receiving all that comes, from any and every source and person, adding our own quota to the great temple of truth, until we, with the great host of perfect ones, who have been sanctified through the truth, arrive at the final terminus of all our hopes and aspirations—the Kingdom of God—where we shall see eye to eye, and where the knowledge of the glory of God, shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

Editor Restitution:—For the enclosed you will please send the RESTITUTION to me, for I never intend to do without it so long as I can raise the money to get it. I thank you for having continued the paper to me. I belong to the newly established church of the One Faith. We are not a year old here yet, but number twenty-two. I hope we shall see the day when many of the crooked and knotty shall be made straight and smooth by the truth of the gospel, and thus united into the true church of God. May Christ soon come and his kingdom set up. I am a new settler here in Texas, with a large family, and though hard pressed to live, will try to keep up with my subscription hereafter.

Respectfully, D. A. CARRIKER.

Pilot Point.

Editor Restitution:—Dear brother in Christ, if I may be [illegible] address you; I suppose [illegible] sent you is not at present paying you for your paper, and as my friends do not like for me to read it, I suppose I shall have to give it up. I shall feel greatly lost without it, as it is the best paper I have ever seen. It is more comforting, employs sounder reasoning, and has better and purer ideas of the religion of Jesus than any paper I ever read. Heartily do I endorse you. I think the time not far distant when all will see that you are faithfully laboring to wake up the slumbering world. If you had a church here I would certainly attach myself to it. Be like Noah of old, and warn while they of the world mock. Excuse this long letter from a stranger. Yours, hoping to soon see this sin-cursed earth purified and changed. I will close. Have been a member of the Presbyterian church for fifteen years.

MRS. K. G.

Editor Restitution:—I send a half-dime for the benefit of the RESTITUTION. I should be very much at a loss without it as it is all the preaching I have on the coming of our dear Savior to end our conflicts here. I am more than three-score years old and there are many things in the paper to cheer and comfort me. May God bless you, and keep you in his love, is the prayer of your unworthy sister.

REBECCA MCLAIN.

Nevada, Iowa.

Editor Restitution:—I feel thankful to my Heavenly Father that I am able, through his blessing, to contribute a little for the support of the paper. I would like to have its circulation increased, so that it might be self-sustaining. We miss it very much when it does not come every week. My prayer is that the brethren may wake up to the responsibility of the position they occupy, knowing that the night is far spent, and that the day is at hand. Let us, therefore be up and doing, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. I wish some one of the preaching brethren could make it convenient to come here this summer, and see how we are getting along.

Yours, in the hope of the gospel.

PETER S. DECKER.

Millerton, Mich.

If convictions conquer us not, destruction certainly will.

In contracting marriage, the sinners are dangerous counsellors.

The Pauline Epistles ever seem the pure edifice of intense Christ-permeated individuality; in their deep, urgent, and often irresistible thought and feeling, we feel that we are brought into contact with a man of profoundly earnest convictions, of great mental capacity, and extraordinary energy of will. So manifest is this that no one sparks of two Pauls, one is struck by the personage, the other a genuine enchantment we at once recognize as removed from reproduction. The individuality, therefore, so grand and yet so tender, so profoundly wise and yet so simple, so full of mysterious energy and yet so richly endowed with childlike simplicity, stands out like an unassailable fortress, against all the efforts of the Tubingen, or any other school, to resolve Christianity into a myth.—The Apostle.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. G. Brailsford, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever, and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 56c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 35c; postage 5c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A. late Prebendary of Cork, Ireland. 20 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly fine in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price 3d; postage 10c.

"We hail the book with hearty satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty of power and reverence, has laid hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance.... We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessarily early sale will speedily be more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this painfully misunderstood department of Christian theology.—The Rainbow.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 24 edition. Price 21.3d; postage 1½c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of the dead between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his many exhaustive labors on special points. His argument is supported by no little learning, keen logic, and a clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual clear of thought and clearness of expression. To all classes lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I., May to December, edited by W. Kelloway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient gospel. Bound volume, 12 numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the news concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price 12s3d.

Bible Echo. Vol. II., January to June, 1876. This is a continuation of the above for the period elapsed. Price 9d.

Bible Echo. Vol. III., July to September, 1876. This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price 12.6d.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1876. The yearly subscription for the magazine, including the 3 months of last year, is 4s 6d.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Enquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the gentleman, the artist, the builder, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the gardener, and the housekeeper. 318 pp. Price 50c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Sacred Words for Home Scholars. Nearly 200 pp. Well printed on tinted paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 60c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of none which we can more heartily recommend. We would be more than content, we would be proud, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her 'Bible Triumphant' was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so useful, so reliable, so convincing, it would be hard to guess where its success will end. Every body should possess a copy."—The Bible Echo.

Bible Triumphant. A new supply to expected. Price, paper covers, 30c; cloth [illegible]

Jerusalem—Past, Present, Future.

BY A CONVERTED JEW.

Ancient of cities! admired of the nations!
Rest of Jehovah! his chosen delight;
With may we mourn thee with sad lamentations;
Fallen thy greatness and faded thy light!—
And the rainbow of promise that gleamed on thy brow
Is hid by the cloud that hangs over thee now!

Land of the prophet! whose words in readings
Diviners enlighten all tribe—all time own!
Thine are the records of wonderful dealings,
Lo!—to stonecracked by thy children alone;
And strangers and aliens,—whilst they are forlorn,—
Rejoice in the birthright to which they were born!

Land of the inheritor! so sadly foreboding
Were cast woe on thy children and thee—
Blasted with the joy and its sweetness corroding,
Just as the blight on a bud is linked to the dew—
And the sort e'en now, when he looks on his fate,
Must wake at thine altar the spark of his fire.

Land of the martyr! whose soil sown in weakness,
Is whitening the earth with a harvest of graves!
Thine was the worship all gorgeous with splendor,— Trumpets, and cymbals, and anthems of praise!
'Twas in thy wide cradle Messiah was lain,
And in thee for the sins of the people was slain.

Where is the satrast thy shared in thy glory?
Where's the feet pe on or stood at pore?
Driven from thy temple, its stones lie unpainted,
Banished thy vine yards,—they blossom no more!
And the soil that enamelled with verdure thy lawns,
Now hails an exile, bears briars and thorns!

Vainly the husbandman plants on thy border
Cries for his garner of grapes for his cup;
Dew from the Lord is withheld from moisture,
Blights are around thee that wither them up;
And the land in her sabbath is waiting the day
When the slew shall return, and the desert look gay.

'Twas not for him thou wast placed in the sunlight,
Gilding thy temples and painting thy flowers;
Lebanon's cedars, have languished before him,
Carmel and Sharon look weep in their bowers;
And power and reason and pride in vain,
And wealth may not purchase that splendor again.

Sadly the wanderer mourns thee, in absence;
Waking or sleeping, his home is in thee;
Feeds on the water and bread of affliction.
A proverb, reproach, and by-word is he!
Poor child!—and the stranger that looks on thee now
Reads the curse of his sin in the braid on thy brow.

Weary of wandering and worn with oppression,
Owned of no country, and favored by few!
Who knows thee a kindness to lighten thine exile?
Or yields to thy sorrow the sympathy due?
In the hour of affliction mankind is thy foe,
And no brother but thou but the brother in woe.

Who could not weep to behold thee degraded?
Heiress for station,—the joy of the earth!
If I forget thee in my exaltation,—
Yea if I hold thee not chief in my mirth,—
Then may my right hand her cunning forget,
And my tongue in the silence of sorrow be set!

Lift up thine eyes to this burthened horizon,
Child of the promise, what dost thou see?
Light golden streaks growing wider and brighter,
Break through the darkness and gleam upon thee;
And the shaking of nations, in nature's last groans,
Is paving the way of the King to his throne!

He comes! O Jerusalem! wake from thy slumbers,
And shake off the dust that encumbers thy strength;
The dust of defilement long years have rolled on thee;
The day of redemption dawns on thee at length.
Thy temple shall rise from its ruins more bright,
And the nations around thee shall walk in thy light.

He comes! O thou daughter of mourning and sadness;
Awake, and put on thy thy bridal array!
He comes to bedeck thee to glory and gladness;
Rejoice in the message he brings thee to-day.
"In a moment of wrath thou was hidden from me,
But with love everlasting have I loved thee!"

"Questions Awakened by the Bible."

The "Rev." John Miller, of Princeton, N. J., has recently published a book called "Questions Awakened by the Bible," in which he discusses these three questions:

1. Are souls immortal?
2. Was Christ in Adam?
3. Is God a trinity?

For the doctrines advocated in this book, he was tried by the Presbytery of New Brunswick (N. J.) and suspended from the ministry. He has appealed, however, to the higher body,—the synod—and we hope, will be able to fully ventilate the doctrines he teaches. Of course he was tried before a packed jury and condemned for teaching doctrines contrary to the "confession of faith," without regard to what the Bible teaches, thus placing the "traditions of men" above the Word of God.

In the first chapter of this "confession of faith," section ix. and x., the doctrine that God's Word is the supreme and final arbiter in all controversies, is plainly declared, but when any one is tried for heresy, it is only by the "confession of faith."

The book contains much that is well worthy of thought. He seems like one groping in the dark, reaching out of the murk,' atmosphere of a "theological education" to try to open a window to let in the heavenly light of God's Word. He seems to have missed "the blessed gospel of the kingdom of God," but to have grasped the great truth of the nature of man. Let me quote from the first chapter of part third.

"I wish to set forward the statement, that I am moved to this book by Scripture. In order to do this, I hold the ground that the Trinity is not to be judged by reason. In order to do this, I follow that statement, and show that it is very peculiar. Everything is to be judged by reason. Until it be true that the eye is no judge of color it will never be true that reason is no judge of anything; for in fact, there is no judge of anything but reason; and of all that our race can conceive, reason is the sole and universal arbiter. What is meant, therefore, by reason being no judge of Trinity? Let me explain by the instance of gravitation. Reaching far back to absolute sight, and to those most obstinate of all demonstrations of truth, mathematical figures, the mind has been forced into the faith that there is a gravitation. It is no judge of the phenomena, afterward. The man who is prolific of difficulties, and tells us that gravitation is impossible, and who backs up his thought by saying that the sun is ninety-four millions of miles away, and that its grappling the earth over that distance is a sheer conceit, we laugh at. Let the sun get over his own difficulties. We have forever demonstrated the truth, that he does attract; and all intercalcinated puzzles we neglect. Reason is a judge of everything; but having made her judgment back at the original truth, we know what we mean by saying that she is no judge of the doctrine afterward.

"Use of the Trinity. In a way that is universal and confessed, reason has made her judgment of the Word of God. This is a broad field; and she has examined it thoroughly. * * * she has come to the strongest faith (and no disciple of the Redeemer will lightly cavil at it) that the Bible is the voice of the Almighty: and this not by mystic partialities, but by reasonable tests, which lift her ever afterward above the fear of what is contained in the recognized canon. * * *

"I wish to draw a distinction between understanding a doctrine and having a conception of it. I understand no doctrine under the sun. I have a conception of every doctrine. That is to say, no doctrine can possibly be embraced, that remains wrapt up in an expression, so that positively no thought comes out from what is spoken. I wish to insist upon this, upon the very outset of our teaching. What is the Trinity? It may be said it is the doctrine of the three in one. Of course our first landing-place is upon the resemblance [illegible] a different sense [illegible] But when we come to remember, this is a mere speech; this is a mere exploded shell; this is no form of thought till we say what the sense is, and there now is precisely our position. Reason is no judge of that sense after it is once announced. But the Trinity is no doctrine at all, and therefore, in the court of intellect must be held by hypocrites, or else some conception must be given. In what sense God can be three, and yet the most simple of all possible existence. Think of excommunicating a man from the church for failing to believe that of which you can give him no idea!"

I have not space to give the whole argument, but the same mode of reasoning will inevitably lead any candid man who "searches the Scriptures for eternal life" to understand "the things concerning the name of Jesus, and the kingdom of God." My letter is long, but I must make it longer to quote from his exposition of 1 Pet. iii. 18-20.

"Being put to death in the flesh." This sentence does not refer to the crucifixion or to the rising again, but a word is employed which has been singularly lost sight of in its beautiful determinations as to the passage, Thanatho. That word means "made a dead man."

Paul says: "For thy sake are we killed all the day long," (Rom. viii. 36,) meaning "as good as dead men." Christ also uses the word, "and the children shall rise up against their parents and cause them to be put to death," meaning, "give them over to death." Matt. x. 21. It never means killing literally, and though it occurs eleven times in the Bible (Matt. x. 2:; xxvi. 59; xxvii. 1; Mark xiii. 12; xiv. 55; Luke xxi. 16; Rom. vii. 4; viii. 13, 36; 2 Cor. vi. 9; 1 Pet. iii. 18,) it always means delivered over to death, and never in any actual sense killed at the time.

Now, we believe that this whole passage means that Jesus Christ was as good as dead as to the flesh; that he would have succumbed to temptation like any other man (Heb. v. 7); but that he was made the living Savior that he was, by the spirit, and that, in the spirit, long before he was made flesh at all, he set out and preached to the spirits (men) in prison; that is, as the "Great Prophet," God preached to poor sinners, (as in Neh. ix 30. I think he means.—WRITER). And how general this was, appears by the next expression, "who at any time were disobedient," (that is the meaning of the particle in numerous passages. 1 Cor. ix. 7; Eph. v. 20,). And yet, though he has preached in this way in spirit even before and after his incarnation, yet the chance for each mortal man was but "once." Notice how he brings in the case of Noah "when once the long suffering of God waited." This means to characterize all the impenitent that ever lived. They are waited for but once. In the rush of speaking, Peter brings in a favorite case; syntactically he trespasses a little, for it is the way with these apostles. (Rom. i. 7; Eph. iii. 1,) but trespasses with method. He does not say "in the days of Noah," but "in days of Noah," flinging, in his excitement, before their minds a certain case before the flood. "They did eat; they drunk," etc., (Matt. xxiv. 38,) and thus, like Christ himself, making the instance of Noah a warning to impenitents.

Let us recapitulate. Even Christ is quickened in the Spirit. In the Spirit, before and since his incarnation, he has preached to imprisoned sinners. They are the men, who, at any time, have been disobedient. God waited for them "once," to-wit: in their single lifetime, in days of Noah. And having thrown that picture before the eye, he notes the likeness. They were like to Noah, as to an ark and as to the number saved, and saved by the emblem "water."

Let us go over it on these points, hiding a little the eruptive rhetoric of the apostle. "Long suffering"—great and patient, and yet critical, viz.: "in days of Noah," and yet in Noachic days in other respects, that an ark was preparing—sadly alike, also. In another respect, that so few were saved; in Noah's case, only "eight," and sadly alike also in this, that the very waters that wrecked the earth, saved the ark, and that the very death that destroys the people, saves us, when inflicted upon Christ, and raises us again through his blessed quickening.

Yours waiting of the glorious appearing of the Lord. Z. SWIFT.

Report of Quarterly Assembly.

The Church of God met according to announcement, at Brother Speid's, Hampshire county, Virginia, Friday night preceding the fourth First day in May. By mutual consent of the brethren, Brother B. F. Boyer read a good portion of the first epistle of Paul to the Church of God at Corinth; and as the Church of God in this dispensation, we accepted it as if addressed directly to us, which we in conclusion endeavored to show was (by regular transmission), by quoting the same apostle's own words, who in considering the dispensations of the grace of God, said by revelation, he, God, made known unto us, (personally, himself,) the mystery, as I wrote afore in few words, whereby when ye read ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ, evidently pointing to the grand scheme of the Gentiles becoming fellow heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel; and also of another faithful and true witness, who said of the Most High that he established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel which he commanded our fathers that they should make them known to their children, that the generation to come might know them, even the children which should be born, who should arise and declare them to their children, that they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments. On considering the letter in this light, we were all as a little band of brethren made to rejoice for the grace of God given us, that we could assemble together as one body, calling no man master on earth, for one is our Master, even Christ; and we all brethren, and be the happy recipients of such a lesson of instruction from a loving Father to his children, in this day of small things.

In our deliberations we decided in favor of the reading of some one or other of the Epistles to the churches at all our assemblies as an introductory, that by so doing we give precedence at once, on our assembling together, to God alone, to whom all honor and glory should be given.

On Saturday afternoon we assembled in the grove where the brethren had given evidence that they are not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, by giving plenty of seats, and everything necessary to accommodate the assembly and congregation, to hear words whereby they may be saved; whereupon our prayers, and doubtless the prayers of the whole Church of God, were, to a certain extent, answered, which are, the harvest being great and the laborers few, that the Lord of the harvest would send forth more laborers into the harvest.

Brother John D. Boyer, a brother of Brother B. F. Boyer, took the sword of the Spirit, in that child-like yet dignified manner which should ever characterize a child of God; and for the first time on such an occasion contended earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and made some very appropriate remarks in reference to the object of our assembling together, much to the edification of the church, and all the more from the consoling thought of having another soldier in the field to do battle for the King of glory, the Lord of hosts, who, when he comes to this earth again, will be mighty in battle to the glory of the Father. Brother Boyer seemed to be overpaired with joy unspeakable, using his own words, at the thought of meeting strange brethren and sisters, and of spending a few days together, and talking of the exceeding great and precious promise made of God to the fathers, as a foretaste of that glorious meeting, now daily looked for by the waiting bride, not only for a day or two, but when we will be ever with the Lord. May he stand firm to his post, and never lay down the sword until the victory is won, and the great Captain of our salvation says, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; as thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joys of thy Lord."

Brother B. F. Boyer then followed his brother, (truly a delightful scene;) and made one of the most beautiful and convincing proclamations of the truth I ever heard.

On the next day, being the first day of the week, we met again in the Father's house, where we could look out and up through nature to nature's God, and assisted by divine revelation, consider his handiwork, and fresh from the beautiful surrounding mountains, breathe the pure breath of life (or of God, for he is the fountain of life,) and that we more fully contemplate his goodness, and feast upon the bread which cometh down from heaven, which, if we eat thereof we may never die.

We spent the day alternately (the brethren having made provisions to stay on the ground) in reasoning out of the Scriptures to attentive and respectable congregations, which, it is to be hoped, will ere long result in the glory of God, and their good, by them believing the gospel and having the all-saving name, Jesus Christ, named upon them in baptism for the remission of sins, and become united with the few faithful witnesses in that part of the habitable, that they, with all the blood-washed, having a part in the first resurrection, may receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

On Monday night, after a condensement, by the writer, of the code of reasoning, which had been presented during the meetings, that all come to understand that form of doctrine delivered us, which we must obey from the heart, that we be made free from sin, and have our fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life, the meeting closed by commending all for whom it is our duty to pray to God and the word of his grace, which is able to build us up, and give us an inheritance among them that are sanctified.

The little body seemed to be much cheered and encouraged by the visit of the brethren, to hold fast the beginning of their confidence of rejoicing firm unto the end. May the God of all grace help them so to do, and bless them, even in this life, in all they put their hand unto, for their kind hospitality to all during the meeting. May they, with all of the faithful, realize fully the promise of our blessed Lord, that no man, having left all for his his sake and the kingdom of God, or gospel's, but he shall receive a hundred fold in this age, and in the age to come eternal life.

From New Hartford, Iowa.

The camp meeting has just closed, with good results; and for the benefit of those interested, I will give a short report of it.

The early part of the week being rainy, kept many away. Nevertheless a goodly number of tents were pitched, and during the week they constantly increased, representing the towns of New Hartford, Parkersburg, Clarksville, Floyd, Cherokee, Shellrock, Alden, etc., numbering thirteen, and one covered wagon from Jessup. The large tent served as a lodging place for men. There were one hundred lodged upon the ground, and all accommodations in houses adjacent were occupied, besides many went to the village half a mile away.

There were fourteen ministers present—H. V. Reed, J. M. Stephenson, Geo. M. Myers, N. T. Eggleston, A. Eggleston, W. J. Orem, Wm. Brayton, R. J. Hill, H. Olmstead, J. W. Haughawout, M. A. Newcomb, C. C. Ramsey, H. H. Jaynes, M. J. James. Preaching by ten of these, consisting of doctrinal and practical discourses, stirring appeals and exhortations. Peace and harmony prevailed throughout the entire meeting. No collections were taken, but the brethren and the public responded to the wants of the meeting, as follows: $100 was paid to the preachers; $2 for rent of large tent; $21 for lumber and ground rent, and $6 for children's tent. Total expense, $133. Donated for expenses, $40; net proceeds of grocery, $108; subscribed for a new tent to be used for gospel purposes, $194. Thus the expectations of the brethren were more than realized financially.

Sunday, June 24, was a beautiful day, and New Hartford has seldom witnessed such a crowd. Some estimated the number at three thousand, but I think twenty-five hundred would be a fair count. This we consider a grand turnout, as there are no large towns adjacent.

During the meeting four confessed Christ and two were baptized.

The rain on Monday morning prevented us from leaving camp; but as all things work together for good, we were blessed by the rain, for we gathered under the large tent and listened to remarks by Brethren Reed and Stephenson, on the Holy City, New Jerusalem, interspersed with questions and answers to the edification of all. When the rain ceased we were obliged to break camp, and many a good-bye, farewell, and God bless you, were uttered. And thus we parted, hoping to meet in the age of glory, peace, and righteousness, when one eternal round of praise shall rise to him who hath redeemed us.

The Holy Banners of Russia and Turkey.

It was stated as an important fact some weeks ago that the Russian regiments after their arrival on the Danube exchanged the Imperial standard for the holy banner of the Greek Church. Another statement was to the effect that every regiment was given, in addition to the national standard, the church banner representing the religion and the traditions of the old Greek Empire. This indicated, it was held, the purpose on the part of the Czar to wage war in the name of the church and in behalf of the persecuted Christians of Turkey.

The Russian imperial standard is yellow charged with the double-headed eagle of Constantine the Great, symbolical of the Eastern and Western Empires, which were united under his rule. This emblem was adopted by Ivan I, on his marriage with a princess of the Greek imperial house. On the breast of the eagle, which is black, are emblazoned the ancient arms of Russia, St. George and dragon, on a red field.

This imperial flag is used only on great occasions. The common naval flag of Russia is a Greek cross in blue on a white field.

The holy banner of Russia, or of the Greek Church, represented in the illustration at the head of our telegraph column, is in imitation of the military standard adopted by Constantine the Great in commemoration of the appearance of the cross in the sky when he was on the march against Maxentius, the claimant to the throne of the Western Empire. On the eve of the decisive battle that ended in the defeat of Maxentius, and the union of the whole Roman empire under Constantine (A. D. 312), the Emperor, it is stated, saw, as in a vision, the cross in the sky, with the words, "By this conquer." He was the first Christian Emperor, and his great deeds and great conquests are associated with the standard of the Greek Cross.

On Constantine was bestowed the title "Cæsar," and many writers have claimed that the title Czar had its origin in the title bestowed on Constantine the Great. The Russians represent the religion and the spirit of the old Greek Empire, and under the holy banner of Constantine and the church make war against the enemies of the old Eastern or Greek Empire.

Turkey, like Russia, has two flags, one the imperial standard, representing the power of the Ottoman Empire, and the other the flag of the Prophet, symbolizing the Mohammedan religion. The national or imperial flag is red, with a white crescent and star. This flag was the device of Diana Byzantina, the patroness of Byzantium, (Constantinople), and was hoisted first by Mohammed II., after the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453.

The Mohammedan flag, or the flag of the Prophet, is dead black. There are two stories as to the origin of this flag. Tradition has it that the original flag of Mohammed was made from the white silk of the turban belonging to the chief of the Koreish, the tribe to which his parents belonged and the first tribe he vanquished. He soon substituted the black flag, however, making it from the curtain which hung in front of the door of his favorite wife; and this is the sacred relic, which, passing from Mohammedan to Omar, the second caliph of the Moslems, after many changes of hands came into possession of the Sultans of Turkey. It was brought into Europe by Sultan Amurath III, about the close of the sixteenth century, and has been religiously guarded by his successors ever since.

When it is unfurled a religious war is proclaimed, and the Mohammedans throughout the world are called upon to defend the faith. The black flag has been associated with the most relentless and cruel wars of history: with the wholesale slaughters and piratical acts of the Turks, when animated by a spirit of fanatical hate, and has become the symbol of war to the death, of a war in which no quarter is granted, no prisoners taken.

But the flag of the Prophet is not responsible for the bad reputation of the "black flag" of murderous warfare. The character of the early wars waged in the name of the Prophet suggested the black flag as the emblem of war to the death. The unfurling of the flag of the Prophet means now that the Sultan of Turkey calls on Mohammedans of all nations to assist him with men and money.—Inter Ocean.

The Strategy of slow Pressure.

There are a number of people who look upon the Turco-Russian war as a "failure," because the fighting doesn't begin on the Danube. They seem to think that Russia has assumed the offensive with a great flourish of trumpets, and that she is bound to go ahead with the performance, like any other spectacular exhibition. But the Russians do not look on it in this light; they want to so carry on this war that its work will endure. This work is no less than the obliteration of Turkish power in Europe. Servia and Roumania are already free from Turkish rule; Herzegovina and Bosnia will soon follow; Bulgaria will be set free when the Russians cross the Danube. All these events seem in the immediate future. These provinces will be encouraged to declare their independence, and will look to the Russians for protection therein, and if Russia has any intention of annexing territory it will be carried out only by the seemingly independent action of the provinces. Already the relations of Roumania to Russia are so close as to make the former almost a part of the Russian empire. The Danube is now practically the northern boundary of Turkey. Wallachia and Moldavia are already lost, and Russia's slow campaign has conquered these and secured them probably forever, almost without striking a blow. The march from Kischeneff to the Danube was a feat of swiftness. Russians can be fast enough when it is necessary. They are halting now because more is to be gained by waiting than by victories which might startle all Europe. Every day of delay strengthens the Russians and weakens the Turks. A vast armament is massed on the northern side of the Danube, which by its presence is silently winning the greatest of the victories. This is the encouragement of the christian peoples and the laying bare the weakness and rottenness of the Turkish rule. The desperate measures which the Porte is resorting to in his death agony show his pitiable weakness. He has ordered a levy in mass for men and forced loans for money, and still gets very little of either. At Constantinople there is impotence, sloth, divided counsels, revolutionary intrigue, tyrannic temper, monstrous pride, omnipresent corruption, jealousy, suspicion, irresolution and imbecility. Every day of delay makes the government of the Porte weaker at home, more despised and hated abroad. The armies are badly clothed, and equipped, wretchedly fed and poorly officered. The discipline, never good, is now worse than ever. The hospital accommodations are insufficient and the troops are swept off by a deadly typhus and the plague; the heats of summer and bad food will bring dysentery also. Conceding to the Turks individual valor and fanatical devotion to the Sultan and to the Crescent, they will hardly be able to withstand the disciplined onset of the Russians. The problem in Bulgaria will not be like that in Armenia. There the armies are small, and the fortresses of Varna, Rustchuk and Schumla. Armies of siege will be left to isolate these, and the great army will push beyond the Balkans and dictate the peace near Constantinople. The slow campaign will win.—Baltimore Gazette.

An aged woman in Canton, Mass., died instantly after reading the following verse of Scripture: "Seeing his days are determined, the number of his months are with thee; thou hast appointed his bounds, that he cannot pass." The words made so deep an impression on her mind that the result was fatal.

Expectancy—The Church's True Position.—A short sermon.

[illegible] nation to be known from which we are [illegible] look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, i. e., his immortal, incorruptible body, which was made so at his resurrection. We pass to notice,

2nd. The true position of the church. A church that is in the wilderness feels no resting place here in this world of sin and woe more than the Israelites did on their long sojourn. They did not think of sitting down in any part or place of their journey, though it looked ever so green, and though Jacob's well was there; they must move on with the cloud and pillar of fire, come what might. So the church to-day must move forward and keep moving, for to go backward is ruin and death, to stand still, stagnation and its fearful results; so that there is no safety but to move onward, forward and upward. The apostle aptly represented the whole course when he said in this same epistle "Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Phil. iii. 13, 14. The church is under a careful surveillance both by God and his angels, that she may not deviate from the path marked out for her, and having no one promise of a resting place or toothold here, (Acts vii. 5) and showing the least disposition to pursue her journey onward no longer, and take a vacation—assume of the cares of life; now do—she violates her plighted vows and excites the divine displeasure. Her position is one of hope, of blessed hope, of expectation, and of blessed expectation. She waits for her Lord as they who watch for mornings. While here, she lives; while resting to look, to wait, to watch with, she may sicken and die. And now we notice briefly and

3rd. The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ is no common day occurrence, as some would have it, and explain it in their sophisticated and figurative manner. Were here, she lives; while resting to look, to wait, to watch with, she may sicken and die. And now we notice briefly and

3rd. The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ is no common day occurrence, as some would have it, and explain it in their sophisticated and figurative manner. The coming of Christ at death would render it an every day occurrence and multiply his comings into millions of times, while the Scriptures limit them to but two—the first and second time. But the fallacy of such a theory as orthodoxy teaches is clearly seen when, as we know, and as God's word informs, that instead of Christ's coming to kill, as popular preachers say he does when he comes at death, he comes to make alive, to resurrect, instead of sending to the grave, to bring them out of the grave; instead of his coming being surrounded with any degree of secrecy, as in the "secret chamber," Matt. xxiv. 26,) it will be with an open and visible manifestation. "As the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." Rather than that event shall be in any surreptitious manner, it will be attended with great shouts and with the voice of the archangel and with the tramp of God. (1 Thess. iv. 16.) Indeed, the surrounding and circumstances attending the sublime epiphany of the Son of God as the Scriptures in many places describe, leave no room, whatever, for any mythical or spiritual interpretation of that coming; it leaves it stand just as the angels declared it would and should be,—"Ye men of Galilee why stand ye gazing up into heaven; this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven," etc. Acts i. 11. So it will not be a spirit, another, or by providence, or proxy, but the Lord himself. He that testifieth these things, saith "Surely I come quickly,"—the personal pronoun I, here designates the individual Jesus, the identical one which was alive, the very one which was dead, and the very personage which saith "I am alive for ever more," Amen, "and have the keys of death and hell," again Amen; and being invested with power over death and hell, having the keys to the dominions of death, it follows he comes to open the doors of these cold regions, sending the genial rays of light and life therein, giving life and immortality to his saints. Amen. But lastly, we listen to notice the object of his coming here, as pointed out in the text. There are various things to be accomplished in the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ; things which are of a mighty import. But there is only one here spoken of and that we may count one of the wonders of the last days—the changing our mortal bodies, the remodeling or fashioning them like unto Christ's glorious body. This will be a great physical change in the bodies or physical structures of all the saints. It will be both simultaneous and instantaneous, as there is no intervening space between life and death. It will be as quick as the flash of lightning darting through the sky, as the apostle aptly describes it in his discourse on the resurrection: "Behold I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52. O, what a sublime and glorious change awaits the saints of God! Our mortal bodies shall be awakened by that spirit which now dwelleth in us: (Rom. viii. 11.) that spirit co-operating with the power of Christ, which we might call the resurrection power, which shall be brought into requisition at his coming will transform these weak, feeble bodies of humiliation, and fashion them so as to conform with the model body and form of our ever blessed Lord.

We remark that Jesus does not come to perform any moral or religious change upon our natures; no, that change has already taken place in us as Christians. The moral and spiritual renovation has been accomplished as a matter indispensable to our future welfare, and as a pre-requisite to our bodies now undergoing the change. Jesus does not come to change our habits, our dispositions, and our passions, which are common to the unconverted—these constitute all actions, mental habits, and lusts of the flesh, must all be crucified and put to death here, now, to-day, prior to his coming to change our mortal bodies. Hence, do not let us make a mistake in this matter, for it will be a sad one, and one which cannot be rectified if we should make the mistake, living on in sin and clinging to bad habits and ungodly practices until Christ comes, vainly hoping that he will in some mysterious way, then morally renovate us, changing our moral natures as well as our physical. We shall be mistaken if we do. The only change which will then take place will be in reference to our bodies. The entire work of our personal redemption must all be accomplished this side of the hour of the resurrection, and the coming of the Son of Man. Saving the one act of divine power upon us, which will stamp the work complete in every way, and that is the changing of our mortal bodies and fashioning them like unto Christ's glorified body, and that to be wrought by the mighty power wherewith he is able to subdue and subject all things unto himself. And now, as good and loyal citizens of that incoming and divine administration, let us walk and conduct ourselves compatible with our profession; in naming the name of Christ, let us depart from our iniquity, living holy and righteous and godly in the present age, and looking for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ, who shall come to change our mortal bodies, that when he shall come, we shall not be found wanting in the least pre-requisite to that end. Amen.

The Red Sea.

The Red Sea is said to be the hottest place in the world. The atmosphere for about sixty miles in that sea is steamy and sticky. Every thing in the shape of iron or steel about the ship takes a coat of rust. During the summer months no one travels on the Red Sea unless compelled by business or military orders to do so. In the winter and spring the passage is delightful. Yet the navigation in that body of water is always attended with many dangers. The Red Sea is long and narrow, with sunken rocks and projecting reefs, and counter winds prevail, which produce dangerous currents. There are three lighthouses in the sea, which must be kept by salamander-like men, since the thermometer runs up to 120 degrees in July and approaches 90 in early spring.

Nebuchadnezzar's Image—Its Coming Destruction.

I hail with welcome the papers contributed by Brethren Cook and Wechter, in the RESTITUTION of July 25th, with their reasons for dissenting from some of the positions and conclusions argued in my essay and lecture on the subject which heads this article, which appeared in the RESTITUTION of July 4th and 11th.

"Let there be light" on this and on every part of divine revelation. It is still our duty to "prove all things," that we may "hold fast that which is good." Let us consider their objections:

I. Both object to the reconstruction of the empire, saying that "the Scriptures no where use that term.

This is granted, and if it will better conform to their ideas to speak of its reappearance or its development in the fourth or Roman form, let it be so. Daniel does, however, say that it will be smitten and destroyed, which certainly implies its existence "in the latter days." Perhaps, therefore, the criticism is hypercritical.

Do we not speak correctly when we say the Roman empire has passed away? The prophecy says expressly, in Daniel ii. 41-45, that the empire shall pass away, or be "divided" into and succeeded by "ten kingdoms," and Brother Weethee has even enumerated these by name. Ed Gibbon chronicle the decline and fall of an empire that was still in existence? True, our brother says it (as an empire) has lost its dominion, but still retains its life; but this does not seem to gratify the exigencies of the simile. Is not the true explanation that it no longer exists in the imperial (empire) state but has been merged and continued in the ten kingdoms into which it has been divided? When these are successively subdued and conquered by one monarch or emperor, the empire resumes its original form, and thus becomes reconstructed, or if you please, reappears in its fresh development; not another and a fifth empire as supposed, but the same that was, before it passed into the separate kingdom state. The reconstruction of a house—of the same material—makes it not another house, but the same house. I submit, therefore, that there is no necessity, in the supposed accession of Russia to the throne of the Roman empire, for an additional—a fifth universal empire. When the Prince of Wales succeeds Queen Victoria, will Britain be another and a new kingdom, or the same under a new ruler? So when Russia rules over all the territory of the Roman empire (which Turkey has never done,) will not the Autocrat stand forth as the head of the fourth dominion—i. e., the ancient Roman world? This is submitted in deference to the supposed necessity that Christ's empire must be the fifth, of which there is no trace or mention in the Record, as far as I have seen.

II. Again our critical brethren properly pause to the idea of succession in the several empires. Does not the figure demand the completion of all these respective successions in order to round off and finish it as a whole? We can not doubt it. We have had the golden, silver, brazen and iron ordines, but not yet, I submit, the iron and the clay constituents together,—"part of iron and part of miry and potter's clay." They have not yet appeared. The clay element was to appear in the end, in the feet and toes—the last extremity of the image, and apparently just before it is smitten by the stone. It is Russia's mission to supply this clay complement to the image, for she is the latest and therefore the newest and most plebeian of the royal family of the Roman clock.

Brother Weethee seems to recognize this necessity, for he describes the last phase of the Roman part of the image as "the iron-clay-Romano-Germanic, where it still remains." He does not, however, give the data, either geographical, historical or ethnological, on which he relies to support this conclusion; and we do not see as yet anything in the present relations of the German state, or of the German empire, (of the Kaiser of Russia), to the Roman empire, past or present, which conducts us to this new classification and arrangement.

III. There are at least two very prominent reasons for concluding that the present war between Russia and Turkey is the divinely appointed means of leading up and preparing that great crisis in Eastern affairs which are to affect materially the fortunes and destiny of the land and people of Israel.

Look at the facts. Turkey holds both in grievous bondage. So long as they are under the Moslem yoke, the ancient heritage of the Jews can never be restored, and the glowing promises of restoration and restitution to the house of Jacob cannot be fulfilled.

No nations among whom the Jews have been dispersed have treated them with such pitiless persecution—such savage ferocity, as Turkey and Russia.

How Jehovah declares through his prophets (as in the case of Egypt,) that he will eternally judge and severely punish those nations who treat his ancient people with injustice and cruelty. Read Psa. cv. 11-16.

This pending war, so desolating in its human life, on both sides—is but the beginning of the beginning of the fearful retribution they will receive for their centuries of persecution of the helpless, unoffending Jews. We know who has said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay."

Now the triumph of Russia means the emancipation of the Jews and their country from this long and dreary desolation. Indeed, no other powers in Europe but these have the adjustment of this old quarrel over Palestine, and the custody of the holy places in their hands. Russia, yielded to the light and progress of modern civilization, and has greatly ameliorated the condition of her Jewish population, and now regards them as equals before the law with her own people, and treats them with kindness. But Turkey is yet a gloomy, ferocious, baleful, stationary despotism, which treats the Jews yet, as we might expect Ishmaelites and enemies of the human race to treat all people but themselves, as perfidiously and cruelly as they can.

Another reason to interpret these diseases immediately associated with the great events described in Daniel's prophecy, and as identifying Russia as one of the chief actors in the grand final scene, arises from what is written in Ezekiel and other prophecies concerning Gog.

Do not our critics agree in the application of this prophecy to the great northern Autocrat? Or do they advance another and different construction? If the former, will they not admit that this is the crisis in which he must naturally and appropriately come to the front? Or must we look for another?

So much I submit in reply to what has far been urged by our intelligent brethren.

Awaiting Brother Weethee's promised resumption of the subject, in another number, and with him only solicitous that the truth may be discovered and established in this fraternal contention, I remain,

Faithfully and hopefully,

A. B. MAGRUDER.

The Kinsman's Part—See Ruth iv.

"And he came and took [the book] from the right hand of him that sitteth upon the throne."

This is the sublimest individual act recorded in the Apocalypse. It is the act which includes all that suffering creation, and the disinherited saints of God have been sighing and crying, and waiting for, for all these long ages—for six thousand years of grief and sorrow. It is the act which carries with it all else that is written in the succeeding part of this glorious revelation. It is the act by virtue of which the world is sublimed, Babylon judged, antichrist destroyed, the dragon vanquished, death overthrown, the curse expunged, the earth made new, and the reign of everlasting blessedness and peace made to cover its hills and illuminate its valleys, and transform it into an unfading paradise of God. It was the lifting of the title-deeds of the alienated inheritance—the legal act of repossession of all that was lost in Adam, and paid for by the blood and tears of the Son of God. Heaven looks on in solemn silence, as that act is being performed. The universe is stricken with awe, and grows breathless as it views it. And the living ones, and elders, and all the hosts of angels, are filled with adoring wonder and joy, as if another fiat had gone forth from God for a new creation.

"And when he took the book," there went a thrill through the universal heart of living things. "The four living ones and the twenty-four elders fell down before the Lamb." A song which was never sung before, broke from their lips. John hears the lofty anthem rolling sublimely through heaven? "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals of it; for thou wert slain, and hast redeemed us by thy blood, out of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." Nor they alone were moved to new and intenser adoration; "that around the throne, and the living ones, and the elders," and afar in the depths of space, he "heard the voice of many angels, and the number of them was myriads of myriads, and thousands, saying with a loud voice: Worthy is the Lamb which hath been slain to receive the honor, and blessing." And wider and still wider spread the sympathetic response of adoring rapture. There was not a holy heart unmoved, nor a holy tongue that did not lift up its song. "Every creature which is in the heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and upon the sea, and all things in them," John "heard saying, To him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, [be] the blessing, and the honor, and the glory and the dominion for the ages of the ages. And the four living ones said, Amen; and the elders fell down and worshipped."—Lectures on the Apocalypse—Seiss.

P. S.—Our whole hearts respond to these words of Dr. Seiss. "Brethren, there is but one sun in our system, and there is but one Christ in the universe."

The Tabernacle of David.

The tabernacle of David to be set up, the apostle James tells us, Acts xv. 16, is that which had previously fallen down and was in ruins. The original words, in Hebrew translated tabernacle, are defined by Prof. Pick, as follows: 1. Sikkhon, the tabernacle God commanded Moses to make as a pattern for the temple. Exod. xxv. 8, 9. 2. Ohel, a tent, tabernacle of the congregation. It is also a tent attached to the tabernacle, where Moses and the elders transacted all public matters. It is the tent which was covered with the pillar of the cloud. Num. xii. 5, 10. 3. Sikkoth, the name of an idol; literally, a protector. 4. Sukkoth, an awning, a shelter from the heat.—Bible Students' Concordance.

The most natural construction to put upon the phrase, "The tabernacle of David," is, "The house of David;" and David in his expression of gratitude to God for his promises to him, said: "Thou hast spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come." 1 Chron. xvii. 16-17. That is, of David's royal house, including his throne and kingdom. This throne was originally in Jerusalem, on Mount Zion, and embraced the kingdom of Israel east of the Mediterranean Sea. That kingdom was overturned, Ezek. xxi. 25-27, and its throne cast down to the ground. Compare Ezek. xxi. 27, with Psa. lxxxix. 44, where, speaking of David's throne prophetically, it is said, "Thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground."

Thus the throne was to fall down and be in ruins, and the kingdom to be overturned, and so remain "till he come whose right it is," then God said he would give it to him; of course, to "build again the ruins thereof and set it up," as James says; and to this agree the words of the prophet Isaiah; speaking of Messiah he says: "Of the increase of his government and peace ....no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order (Heb. koon, to set firm, to establish; Prof. Pick: "to re-establish it"—Septuagint) and to establish (Sep., "support,") it with judgment and justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Isa. ix. 7.

Here, then, is a building again and a setting up of the tabernacle of David that is fallen down; such a setting up and building as has never yet taken place, and is, evidently the thing that the apostle James speaks of, Acts, xv., which was future when he spake, though the time was unknown to the apostles; as Jesus told them, Acts i. 7: "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power" for restoring "the kingdom again to Israel;" which restoration includes the setting up again the royal house—throne and kingdom of David. Such there seems to be no reason to doubt is the true meaning of the language of James, Acts xv. 16. Bible Student.

The Restitution.

N. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUG. 15, 1877.

WE were too unwell last week again to attend to everything promptly. Will send out tracts and books immediately.

WE hope all the friends of the paper will make strenuous efforts for its uninterrupted issue for the remainder of the year. We have words of cheer from various ones in different parts.

BROTHER STEPHENSON writes to the effect that the conference referred to in his journal was at Antioch, instead of Austin, Ill., and his stated appointment and the Abrahamic Church are at Lanark, Illinois.

WE have thus far been favored by our Heavenly Father in getting out the paper week by week. When the way has seemed hedged up he has kindly removed the obstacles. We trust him still, and will do what we can.

WE have failed to answer a number of questions, proposed by different friends on Bible themes, from want of time to give them the critical care and attention demanded. Our labors in the ministry, and in connection with the paper, occupy almost our entire time. If we had the time devoted to the business routine of the RESTITUTION at our disposal, we could furnish more original matter for the paper, and answer, if able, some of these questions.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for September is already at hand. It is, as usual, a very creditable and readable number. To the American lover of his country's history, the account of the Battle of Bennington, Aug. 16, 1777, will prove unusually interesting at this time when it is about to have a centennial celebration. Mount Shasta, and Prince Edward's Island, are topics in other articles and handsomely illustrated. The Phrenological Journal and Littell's Living Age, are also welcome visitors. Though tardy in doing so, we can heartily commend Wide Awake to our youthful friends.

SINCE its check in the battle of Plevna, the Russian army has been awaiting reinforcements before again assuming the offensive. The probabilities now are that the war, for the remaining part of the year, will be confined to Bulgaria, north of the Balkan mountains. By the middle of autumn snows will render it impossible to penetrate the passes of these formidable barriers into Roumelia. It is said that an accession of 100,000 new men will shortly join the army of the Grand Duke, Nicholas. It will likely be the policy of Russia to hold the advantages already attained, and abandon the project of pressing on in the career of further conquest till next spring. It will be better for the Czar to winter his armies on Turkish territory than to withdraw any portion of them into his own dominions. The war will require time to consummate the designs of the Muscovite, as well as to accomplish the higher designs of him who "ruleth in the kingdom of men." The overthrow of Islam, the liberation of Palestine, and its re-colonization with its rightful owners, is not the work of a day or even of a year.

WE by no means anticipate the complete fulfillment of Ezekiel's prophecies as an immediate result of the present conflict in the East. It is, however, our opinion that it will prepare the way for that glorious restoration of both the land and its chosen people that form the glowing subject of his prophecies in the thirty-sixth and thirty-seventh chapters of his wonderful predictions when the "desolate land shall become like the garden of Eden, and the waste and desolate and ruined cities shall become fenced and inhabited." We apprehend the first invasion of the Gog power will result in the liberation of Palestine, either directly, or by a compromise with other interested powers, a restoration of Israel, and their prosperous re-settlement in the land of their fathers. This will be the first stage of their restoration. The ambition of Russia will lead her to another invasion, and Palestine will then be the coveted prize. This invasion will result most disastrously on account of a direct divine intervention. Israel will then prosper under the reign of Messiah whom they will be led to acknowledge as their King, and under whose beneficent reign will be realized the second and everlasting stage of their restoration. The present war will not bring the end, but we may rather regard it as the beginning of the end. It will probably remodel the map of Eastern Europe, complete the great Image, and prepare the way for the restitution of all things. The translation of the church is a comparatively near event in the future. The present war is not the war of Armageddon. That war synchronizes with the destruction of the image, the downfall of mystical Babylon, and the final destruction of the beast and all his appendages. This overthrow is the result of an invasion by the "armies of heaven" marshalled under a divine leader. In this invasion the rightful ruler of the world will claim his rights and win them by conquest.

Coming Events.

When these things begin to come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh. Luke xxi. 28

The impression is almost universal that the world nears some eventful crisis. Men's hearts are failing for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth. Distress is coming upon the nations, the sea and waves are roaring, earthquakes rock the earth, famines and pestilences waste, and war covers the fields of strife with myriads of slain. But it is at the appearing of fearful exhibitions like these, that the longing, waiting bride of Christ is called upon to look up in expectancy of immediate redemption. The day, so dreaded by the wicked world, is the day of her espousals of the Lord of glory. It is the day of that resurrection-adoption that brings together the long-severed members of the mystical body of Christ, to whom they are to be united, and with whom they are to be eternally glorified. Through the blue veil that curtains the pavilions of the heavenly chambers, the church, redeemed by precious blood, will pass ere long to meet the the Kingly Bridegroom. Soon martyr ashes, and mouldering dust will be reorganized, under the vitalizing influences of the Spirit itself, into forms of glorified incorruptibility, energized with deathless life. The roseate hues of the coming day of God already cover the long darkened east, and foretell the rising of that Sun of Righteousness that brings healings in its wings, and that will fill the world with glory. Earth's sin-blighted deserts will shortly bloom in all the loveliness of long-lost Eden, and the feet of the ransomed walk those glad paradises of God. Soon gem-set crowns will grace the heads of a redeemed royalty who, through the resurrection, become the angels' peers, and who have exchanged the cross for the fadeless diadems. Sighs, and groans, and tears, will give place to the hymnals and heart thrilling ecstasies of a glorified existence. The moments fall fast from time's hour-glass. We near the Millennial blessedness. The gospel day is at the sunset. The last calls of mercy echo through a sinful world. The Spirit and the bride say, come! Eternal destinies are suspended on a moment. Soon a voice from the throne will say, It is done!

Exegetical.

For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself. Phil. iii. 20, 21.

The Greek word πολίτευμα politeuma, translated conversation, occurs but this once in the original of the New Testament. It is derived from πόλις, polis, which occurs 163 times and which is translated "city" in every instance. The word, undoubtedly, means citizenship, instead of conversation, or behavior, in this place.

Bloomfield says: "πολίτευμα may denote either conduct, manner of living, as it is commonly interpreted; or citizenship as many modern commentators explain; or community, political society, as Parkhurst and Wahl. The two last mentioned senses are most suitable to the context and the doctrine of the New Testament, and, indeed, they merge into each other."

Macknight, in his notes, says: "Le Clere affirms, that πολίτευμα and πόλις being words of the same signification, the clause ought to be rendered, Our City, namely, the New Jerusalem, is in heaven. Beza, however, and others translate it, 'Our citizenship is in heaven;' so that we do not, like the person mentioned in verse 9, 'mind earthly things.'"

Schleusner paraphrases the sense: "Nos aliquando cives erimus coelestes" —"we shall be hereafter heavenly citizens." The term citizenship is the best English equivalent of the Greek term, and most nearly conveys the Apostle's meaning.

The Greek word is μετασχηματίσει, metaschematisei, translated "change," means to re-fashion, remold, or transform; and the word ταπεινώσεως tapeinoseos translated "vile," means humiliation, depression, abject state. Macknight translates literally, "Who will re-fashion the body of our humiliation, in order that it may become of a like form with the body of his glory." In explanation he says: "The body of our humiliation, is our body humbled into a state of mortality by the sin of the first man; and it is contrasted with the body of Christ's glory, or the glorious incorruptible body in which he now lives as Savior and universal Lord."

Since it is in reserve for God's children yet to "come unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem," how consistent that our political relation should be termed a "heavenly citizenship," and that we, who now wear the "image of the earthly, should ultimately wear the "image of the heavenly." Sin has come into the world through Adam, and we are humiliated to the corruption and dust of death, but righteousness has also come by the Lord from heaven, and in our resurrection re-fashioning, we shall become the holy angels' peers. On the mount of transfiguration, our Divine Lord was transfigured into his heavenly resemblance, and into such transcendently glorious forms shall all his dear saints be transfigured, substantially and forever, through that resurrection that invests its participants with the attributes of immortality and incorruptibility. When earth emerged from chaos, decorated with her living green, and flowery censers exhale new-born nature's incense to the Creator, well might morning stars sing, and sons of God shout for joy. But when from the "dust and decay" of the grave, the once humiliated forms of "God's sons and daughters" shall emerge in the Divine likeness of the glorified One, in whose splendors angelic brightness is eclipsed, the songs of a new creation will be as "the voice of many waters and as the voice of great thunder," when, as well expressed by Milton:

"All the Host
Sing alleluias as the sound of seas."

Our citizenship is in heaven; our enrollment is also there; and from thence we are awaiting our Savior. O soon, very soon, a heavenly vitalization will quicken all the redeemed into an endless existence, and a heavenly magnetism attract them into the etherial to meet the Author of life and incorruptibility. Well may we be content to be strangers and pilgrims here if denizens of the new heavens and the new earth in which dwelleth righteousness. Let us rejoice that our citizenship is in heaven.—EDITOR.

Battle, Murder and Sudden Death.

The past decade has been a period of strange and awful calamities, but no single year has witnessed so many as the one through which we are now passing. One night last fall the sea rose like a wall of water, and rolled one vast wave over the low island at the mouth of the Brahmaputra river. The whole population, to the number of about three hundred thousand, perished in a few minutes. A few weeks ago a great earthquake shudder convulsed the vertebræ of South America—the Andes; whole cities were tumbled into ruins; the sea receded, laying bare its depths, and then returned in a mountainous wave that swept away seaport cities like grains of sand. In Illinois a few weeks ago a cyclone came whirling down upon Mount Carmel and sportively tossed around the public buildings and churches as though they were dead leaves, and leaving many people dead among their shattered dwellings. These disasters, the sport of nature, could not have been foreseen nor provided against, but man has contributed by his negligence, his ignorance and his folly. Several American cities have been laid in ashes during the past few years. First Portland, then Chicago, then Boston, Baltimore, Oshkosh, Galveston, and now Marblehead is destroyed by fire while the embers of St. John are still smouldering. The fearful calamity of the Brooklyn theatre fire, the St. Louis hotel fire, the breaking down of the Ashtabula bridge, and a hundred lesser disasters, have followed each other with awful swiftness. Famine has ravaged vast and populous districts of India. English rule, English manufactures and economies have increased the native population of certain parts of India so that they are now peopled to the utmost supporting capacity of the land. A single scant harvest makes a scarcity; a total failure makes a famine. A long drought or superabundant rains may thus destroy more human lives than earthquake or tidal-wave. The people starve by hundreds of thousands. Pestilence has laid its heavy hand upon us. The yellow-fever at Savannah and Brunswick last year was of unprecedented fury. Battles are now strewing the earth with human corpses in the East, and none can tell whether or not other great nations may be drawn into the fray. In this country we have had a sort of epidemic of murder and suicide. During the past few years they have exceeded in number, in brutality and horor those of former years. There even exist associations of banded murderers and organizations for the protection of men whose hands are red with the blood of their fellows. All the evils against which in the Litany unhappy humanity prays to be delivered, seem now in malignant activity—lightning and tempest, plague, pestilence and famine, battle and murder and sudden death.—Baltimore Gazette June 28.

The Customs of Ancient People.

This may be made a very interesting study, for the better we become acquainted with the customs of the people who lived in the country where the scriptures were written, the better qualified will we be to understand the allusions to them in the Bible.

In Deut. xi. 10, we find these words: "For the land, which thou goest into to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence you came out, where thou sowest thy seed, and waterest it with thy foot as a garden of herbs." Egypt being a very dry country, the land, in many parts, become parched like a wilderness, as it would everywhere were it not for the River Nile. At a certain time of the year this river overflows and covers nearly the whole country, which inundation lasts for several months, when it again recedes into its narrow channels. This having taken place, the inhabitants are obliged to resort to some artificial means of watering the land. In order to accomplish this end, the gardener separates the beds of his garden with ridges of soil, it being soft and free from stone or gravel; then, having let the water from the river into a path of the garden, he passes along, and with his foot makes an opening in the ridge of soil. When a sufficient amount has run in, he again closes it, in the same manner by which it was opened.

David said, in Psalms cxix. 83, "that he had become like a bottle in the smoke." Among the Jews, bottles were not made of glass as at the present day, for it was not until a very recent date that the discovery of glass was made, but of the skins of animals. In killing a lamb or kid, as it might chance to be, the skin was removed very carefully, after which it was dried in smoke and used as a bottle. Without the least shadow of a doubt, this is what the Psalmist alluded to in comparing his condition to a bottle in the smoke. However, notwithstanding the persecution which he received and the effects of it upon his condition, "yet," in his own language, he says, "do I not forget thy statutes." "Their spot is not the spot of his children." This is supposed, and not without good foundation, to allude to some of the customs of ancient heathen nations, and is even found to exist among some nations of modern date. The Hindoos, of the present time, make marks upon their bodies, usually the forehead, of various colors, to designate the particular god they worship. The more wealthy classes keep servants for the express purpose of conferring these marks which are of a variety of shapes—square, oblong, round, and sometimes resembling a star or fish. It is considered a sacred performance, and is attended with great solemnity. Truly might Moses say: "These spots were not the spots of God's children."

The Apostle James says: "Pure and undefiled religion before God the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Brother and sister, let us keep unspotted from the world. God forbid that our bodies should express any other mark than that of the high calling which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded, in confidence of God." MRS. L. D. CAREY.

Great efforts are being made to complete as rapidly as possible the works of the second as well as of the first line of German fortresses. The new forts on the left bank of the Rhine at Cologne, which as originally intended were not to be finished before the end of next year, are already approaching completion, and will be ready to be occupied by their garrisons during the course of the present summer. The girdle of detached works round the fortress is to be completed by forts on the right bank at the river. Plans and designs for these have been drawn up, and contracts for their execution entered into; but the work is to extend over four years. When completed, Cologne will be one of the strongest of German fortresses.

Dr. James Bryce, of Edinburgh, the geologist, has fallen a martyr to the pursuit of his favorite science. While making his annual geological tour in the Highlands, he set off alone, hammer in hand, to examine the rocks in the Bass of Inverlurigaig, and was not again seen alive. About three hours after his departure his body was found by two gamekeepers at the foot of a precipice, dreadfully crushed. It is supposed that while he was climbing the rocks a mass gave way under his feet, and that other fragments had fallen above him.

Eastern Items.

BERLIN, August 11.—In Russian Poland, all males from 18 to 45 years of age are being registered, preparatory to calling out the remaining classes of the general levy.

A St. Petersburg letter states that 48,000 fresh troops are already on the way by railroad to the seat of war, the guards will follow in ten days. These include 8,000 cavalry, and 36,000 infantry. Two hundred and fifty cannon will also be sent. Of the Landwehr, only picked regiments will go to Bulgaria.

LONDON, August 10.—A correspondent with the Dobrudscha army telegraphs that malarial fever is doing its work. Hundreds of sick arrive at Tchernavoda daily, the majority from the neighborhood of Mejidjie, where steaming swamps poison the water and air alike. Dysentry also counts many victims. In proportion as the season advances the sickness increases.

BUCHAREST, August 12.—A prominent personage here had an interview with the Grand Duke Nicholas, Thursday. He admitted that his troops were somewhat demoralized, and said there was no probability of a resumption of operations for three weeks, when he would have a reinforcement of 100,000 men.

It is rumored that the cholera has appeared in the Russian camps.

LONDON, August 12.—Eight thousand starving Bulgarian refugees are in Selvi.

A Constantinople correspondent telegraphs via Syra: "A civil war of extermination is being carried on at Eski-Saghra. All the male Christian native population has been sentenced to death by the Turkish General. The news has been brought by two American missionaries protected by Turkish friends. Every male Bulgarian is accused of being either a spy or an open enemy. Kara-Bunar is crowded with fugitives. There is only one well in the place, and there are 16,000 troops there. Wounded, sick and fugitives are perishing from thirst."

A correspondent at Athens telegraphs that King George of Greece has expressed his determination to call out the second reserve, and they will probably be mobilized by the end of the present month. There are already 8,000 Greek soldiers in position along the Turkish frontier. War between Turkey and Greece becomes daily more and more probable, unless Turkey withdraws the Circassian cut-throats from her provinces having Greek populations.

PARIS, August 13.—A dispatch from Gabrova says: "According to reports received here, the Turks have burned the hospital at Eski-Saghra, which contained 800 sick."

The Pathos of the Bible.

Palestine, to-day, is a land of ruins. Fields, once fertile, are desert; hillsides, once clothed with vineyards, are barren and unsightly; cities dismantled, harbors choked with rubbish and the refuse of the sea. All is worse than solitude, accursed, "trodden down of the Gentiles;" yet the hills are musical with words that shall outlast them an eternity. Traverse the valley of Hebron,—there lie the bones of the patriarchs; visit the borders of the Dead Sea,—its sluggish waters roll over the cities of the plain, and trace the fire-storm from heaven. And there, beautiful for situation, the Holy City stands,—Jerusalem,—whither the tribes went up; the guilty city, where Christ warned, and healed and pleaded, over which he wept; the fated city, desecrated by man's darkest crime, consecrated by the marvelous manifestations of redeeming love. As the verification of prophetic truth; as the centre of memories tenderest, most sacred, these ruins are Nature's tribute to the pathos of the Bible. They recall the touching narration of Holy Writ, whose sympathetic influence is felt wherever the Word has gone forth. Divested of its pathos, the Bible were but a compilation of social ethics.

An ancient legend has it, that a tyrant of the East went forth to battle with the Greeks. Gazing upon the mass of living millions enlisted in his cause, the monarch's heart was melted. He wept, he knew now why. The tears came not, as he supposed, from any inference of reflection. They rose spontaneously, as they will at times amid the bustle of a crowded thoroughfare. Our own emotions are reflected back from other hearts. We feel the thrill of spiritual contact, the mighty presence of life. Such is the pathos of the Bible, the underlying tenderness which makes the Book of books the book of human nature; sounding the depths of human sympathy, universal, indelinable, profound.

Poetry and pathos in the Bible are subordinate. It never controverts its sacred office nor makes effect a purpose. The tender and poetical are humble instruments to seal the truth upon the consciences of men. The child who cannot comprehend the love divine, is melted as he hears from mother lips the sweet story of Him who was himself a babe in Bethlehem, who loved and blessed the little children. The man who, scarcely better than the child, can know the wonders of the same inexplicable love, is impressed by the simplicity and tenderness which mark that strange, eventful life.—Howard P. Ellis.

She Knew His Whistle.

That was a touching incident, last week, at the death-bed of Mrs. Gaylor. Her husband is an engineer on the Cincinnati road, and upon reaching Richmond found a dispatch announcing the failing strength of his wife. The difficulty among the railroads made it impossible for him to get off. A second dispatch arrived, saying she was sinking fast. It was then he decided to run his locomotive to Dayton. The dying wife, whose ears were fast closing to all earthly sounds, listened for the familiar whistle which she knew he always gave as the signal of approach. The hours flew fast, and the sands of life were running very swiftly; still she could not go without saying farewell to him. At nightfall, when the sun had set over her last day on earth, when the chill of death was creeping over her, and the pulses were failing, her ear caught the sound of his coming. She alone heard it, and she said: "Will is coming; that is his whistle." And he reached her bedside in time to receive her dying message of farewell.—Richmond (Ind.) Independent.

Sententious Paragraphs.

Inability to meet coming events makes cowards of us all.

All visible greatness of mind grows by looking at an invisible greater.

A good deed is never lost; he who sows courtesy reaps friendship, and he who plants kindness gathers love.

A word of kindness is seldom spoken in vain. It is a seed which even when dropped by chance, springs up a flower.

There cannot be a pleasant smile upon the lips of the hopeless. The blow which crushes the life will shatter the smile.

The Christian who has put aside religion because he is in worldly company, is like a man who has put off his shoes because he is walking among thorns.

If you would find a great many faults, be on the lookout; but if you want to find them in unlimited quantities, be on the lookin.

A little girl of this town was asked: "What is faith?" She replied: "Doing God's will and asking no questions."—Lake Superior Mining Gazette.

William Penn's famous saying should be written upon every church's banner: "No pain, no balm; no thorn no throne; no gall no glory; no cross no crown."

Soul freedom, or the right to worship God as we please, is an inherent disposition in every heart; but we are not always willing to concede this right to others.

Every kindly word and feeling, every good deed and thought, every noble action and impulse is like the arksent dove, and returns to the troubled antern of life bearing a green olive branch to the soul.

Do not be troubled because you have no great virtues. God made a million spires of grass where he made one tree. The earth is fringed and carpeted, not with forests, but grass. Only have enough of little virtues and common fidelities, and you need not mourn because you are neither a saint nor a hero.

Real, practical doers are what the world most needs in these days of so much office seeking, so much ruling, leading and governing. We cannot all be guides, rulers and speakers, but we can and should be earnest, consistent, practical lovers of the faith we propose to hold. Every one who loves a cause should show in daily deeds the little unimportant minutiæ of that cause.

Anybody can soil the reputation of an individual however pure and chaste, by uttering a suspicion that his enemies will believe and his friends never hear of. A puff of the idle winds can take a million of the seeds of a thistle and do a work of mischief which the husbandman must labor long to undo, the floating particles being too fine to be seen and too light to be stopped. Such are the seeds of slander, so easily sown, so difficult to be gathered up, and yet so pernicious in their fruit. The slanderer knows that many a mind will catch up the plague and become poisoned by his insinuations, without ever seeking the antidote, and the mischief is done.—Banner of Holiness.

The Kingdom.

Peace! earth's last battle has been won.
Earth's days of conflict now are o'er:
The Prince of peace ascends the throne,
And war has ceased from shore to shore.

Rest! the world's night of toil is past,
Each storm is hushed above, below;
Creation's joy has come at last,
After its groans and years of woe.

Messiah reigns! earth's king has come,
His children are on his brow;
His exiled kingdoms have become
His everlasting kingdom now.

O! long-expected, silent long,
Of creation's troubled gloom;
Let Heaven and earth break forth in song,
Messiah! Savior! art thou come?

For thou hast bought us with thy blood,
And thou wert slain to set us free;
Thou mad'st us kings and priests to God,
And we shall reign on earth with thee.
—Horatius Bonar.

Correspondence.

Editor Restitution:—Perhaps some account of my visit to Fruitport, Muskegon county, Michigan, may interest some of your readers. I was requested by Brother Skeels to come to that place and spend Saturday and Sunday, July 1st, to preach and baptize some young believers of the gospel. I arrived there during their quarterly church meeting, preparatory to the communion the next day.

Allow me to say that Brother Skeels and family and a few others, are peculiarly situated. They are organized into a church with professed Christians of different sects. Brother S. proposed to the few Methodists, Baptists, Christians and Congregationalists, of that new place, that they should organize by taking the Bible simply as their rule of faith and practice. They agreed to it, and continue to have no other creed or law but the inspired Word. In their Bible-class studies, the question always arises in regard to any doctrine or duty, not What does this or that commentator say? or What does the preacher say? but what does the Bible say?

Their preaching has been mostly of the orthodox stamp, but from time to time our ministers have spoken to them, and have been listened to with more candor than would have been the case if established upon a strictly sectarian basis. Brother Skeels thinks he has exerted more influence for the truth than he could have done in any other way.

After preaching Sunday forenoon, to show what men must do to be saved, we repaired to that beautiful sheet of water, Spring Lake. A young brother—son of Brother Skeels, and a young sister, a grand daughter of Sister Thompson—were buried with Christ by baptism into his death, she sing to the world their faith in his resurrection and their own, by submitting to the symbol of a near and glorious resurrection of the just. A daughter of Brother Skeels intended to be baptized but was prevented by sickness.

Editor Restitution:—Permit me to say to the brethren of Northern Illinois and others acquainted with Brother Simon Phelps, formerly of Pecatonica, that in company with Brethren Elmer Clarke, John Bope, and John Steffe, we visited him at Dresden the first Sunday in this month, and found him and family well and much interested in the truth. We were tendered the use of the Methodist church house in the place and made three discourses to large and attentive audiences—the first discourses ever made in the place by any of our people. There are seven brethren in and near Dresden, a nucleus which will, we think, do much good. We are to return for the purpose of holding meetings there again September 29th and 30th.

G. M. MYERS.

Editor Restitution:—I am still reading your paper, and cannot express my satisfaction regarding some of the articles published in it. I was exceedingly interested in Brother Magruder's articles upon The Sultan and Czar, also upon the Reconstruction of the Metallic Image. I have long believed there would be such a reconstruction before the end of this dispensation, for the gold, silver, brass, iron, and clay, are to be broken to pieces together, by the stone, and become like the chaff of the summer threshing floor, and the wind is to carry them away, that no place is to be found for them; and the stone that smites the image is to become a great mountain (government) and fill the whole earth. Neither do I believe the papacy fills the picture of the man of sin—the willful king of Dan. vii. 23; xi. 36.

We are living in perilous times. The war in the East is destined to bring about wonderful things. I am watching every movement of Russia with the deepest interest. May the Lord keep us watchful and prayerful to the end, though we may not live to see all we are expecting to. I am satisfied that the "set time to favor Zion" has come, and her exiled sons are turning their steps toward the land of their fathers. May God hasten the day when their long looked for Messiah, whom they once rejected, shall return to reign over them. I have been striving to the best of my ability, and the light God has given me, to proclaim those great truths to the world. Many have become interested in these truths. "The harvest is great, but the laborers are few;" pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest to send forth more (faithful) laborers.

ABBY A. PERRY.

Editor Restitution:—Inclosed is postal order for two dollars, the remittance for the RESTITUTION for 1878. I spare it now because I feel that you need it, and because I fear I could not spare it bye and bye. I wish I could help you; I am troubled because I cannot, but we are scarcely earning a living with the present scarcity of work and low wages. Very early this spring I set out a strawberry bed for the RESTITUTION. I was almost too weak to do it, but by getting up early, I got it done in three mornings. The plants grew finely, and blossomed very full, but the dronth came before the fruit matured, and what should have brought five or ten dollars for the paper, did not bring twenty cents; and now the plants are dying, it is so very dry. Our garden looks as if it were late in the fall because of the dronth. But should anything surprise the watching and waiting ones? No, no; we are looking for all these things. The strike all over the country did not seem anything more than looked for; the flood, earthquakes, tornadoes, hail, and terrible thunderings in different parts of our country, are only heralding forth the nearer approach of the time of peace. My native village at the east, has been visited with two terrible storms this season; the hail ruining the crops, and the wind tearing down buildings, the water carried away and undermined many others, and, thus, nearer and nearer home they come, until we shall all feel the avenging hand of the Almighty; but do we not deserve it? Aye, much more; but they which endure to the end, the same shall be saved. Are we doing what we can? I can only answer for myself. I fear not; my field of labor, this season, has scarcely extended beyond the walls of my dwelling. Early in the season I watched at the bedside of a dear mother night and day; for three weeks I had no rest or sleep, and since that time I have been too weary to take up my pen. I am now just recovering from a slow fever, and I make bad work of writing, so I have been an idler in the Master's vineyard save what little I could benefit my household. I hope to have more strength and energy before long. I should send an article for the RESTITUTION to-day, but I am not able to copy it. I have some roughly penciled, which work I did while ill, but must wait for more strength. Brother, please insert the following:

Dear Lucy Horner, please write me; I am starving for one of your cheering letters. My silence is occasioned by illness.

Your sister,

MRS. O. F. H.

Our Letter Drawer.

Editor Restitution:—I feel as though I want to do all I can for the cause of truth, but these are hard times, and money comes in slowly to one who has to depend on daily labor for support. I intend, however, to use a certain portion for the Lord's cause, and put my trust in him to bring me out all right, and I think he will. The one great object of my life is to be "accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from among the dead," or rather I hope to obtain that change that takes place at that resurrection. The Lord grant it may be near, and I believe it is. When the Lord comes to gather his jewels, I trust we shall meet with the redeemed of all ages, and escape those things which are coming upon the earth. I pray that all the waiting ones may be very watchful and also very careful to live in an acceptable manner before the Lord. I feel the necessity of our being very patient even under evil, and to patiently suffer for well doing. If we are sons, we must receive chastisement. May the Lord bless you is my prayer.

Your brother in hope,

S. H. REEVE.

South Elliot, Me.

Editor Restitution:—Apply half the enclosed on my subscription, and the rest to the help of the paper, or as seems best in your judgment for the interest of the noble cause of the gospel of the kingdom of God. It seems strange in these eventful times that there are so many able brethren who are not taking the RESTITUTION, as it keeps us posted on the signs of the times, and encourages the weary pilgrim on his thorny road to the kingdom. Every number is looked for by us with great anxiet and interest.

May the God of Abraham bless you in the glorious cause, is our prayer.

I. P. CLARK.

Editor Restitution, and the Dear Ones Scattered Abroad of the One Faith, Members of the Church of God:

I am young in the cause; was baptized into the One Faith about three months ago, by Brother Z. Gower. I have been made to rejoice in learning and obeying the truth, at first so strange to me. The truth is taking well in Texas. It has set everything in commotion in this part of the country. We number here about twenty-five. I witnessed the solemn act of the burial of five souls into Christ by baptism, to rise and walk in newness of life, on the 27th of July. Brother Gower met a Campbellite, in discussion, a few weeks since, on the time and location of the kingdom, which is producing a good effect.

I have been reading some copies of the RESTITUTION, and am well pleased with it, and expect, with several others, to send for it as soon as we can get the means. Times are hard here now, and will be until cotton comes into market, and then I think you will have a better support from our country.

YOURS, THOMAS GOOD.

Monkstyer, Tex.

Editor Restitution:—Enclosed find for my subscription, and part of the aid I promised to the paper. I will remit the remainder as soon as I can get it. I think your patience must be tried when persons fail to remit, as you need every penny to carry on the paper. Some brethren here who are very poor have been obliged to let their paper stop on account of my being unable to help them as heretofore. There is much wealth squandered here, as well as elsewhere, and so there is but little left for God's servants to work with. We are trying to aid each other all we can by words of encouragement to hold out faithful to the end, believing that it will not be long ere the mystery of God shall be finished.

F. R. STEES.

Cheyenne Falls, Wis.

Editor Restitution:—Enclosed please find remittance for books, subscription and a balance as a donation to the paper. I do most earnestly hope that it may be sustained. Be assured that its weekly visits are welcome to me, as myself and one more are all to this city of about thirty thousand inhabitants, that, to my knowledge, believe the glorious gospel. It seems impossible to arouse people to a sense of the importance of having "the faith which was once delivered to the saints." This world, and grasping after its fleeting joys, and uncertain riches, seem to absorb every energy even of the teachers. I often think what a great responsibility rests upon us who are trying to follow our Divine Leader, and to grow in knowledge as well as in grace. But the thought cheers us day by day that the conflict will not be much longer. Surely the fig-tree is budding, and the tender leaves begin to appear in characters that cannot be misunderstood by the waiting few. Although the world is lulled in carnal security, every paper we read, whether secular or religious, speaks to us that the Bridal and longed for day "hasteth greatly." In view of these things, it surely behooves us to have "our conversation in heaven," and see that while we are in the world, we are not of the world. It is more than twenty years since I had the pleasure of meeting with those of like precious faith to worship. I sometimes go to sectarian churches, but how hungry I come away. The preachers say many good things, and give very good advice, still it seems to me that while they acknowledge the Lord Jesus, they reject the Christ as he is revealed in the gospel. I often long to meet with those of like faith; it seems to me as though it would strengthen me, and help build me up. But though I can not do this, I can read my Bible, and realize that "the Lord knoweth them that are his," even if alone, or almost so. Yours in hope of the gospel.

MRS. M. H.

St. Joseph, Mo.

[This was not designed for publication. But as we thought the sentiments would be cheering to others we withhold the name and give it a place. —ED.]

Editor Restitution:—I did not know but I should have to stop my paper, but have been waiting hoping to get the money, as I should be sorry to do without it, as I so much prize the truths it advocates. I wish I were able to contribute something to send it to others. I lend my papers to all who will read them, and try to have them do all the good they can. In hope of the soon coming of our Savior.

MRS. MARY ROLF.

Macon, Mo.

Editor Restitution:—Inclosed find remittance for my subscription. Am sorry I can send no more at present, but am thankful to you for continuing it after my subscription ran out, and hope to be able to send more shortly. I am not a member of any church, but a firm believer in the near approach of our Savior, and the restitution of all things. Hoping that you may be able to continue your paper, is the wish of one who hopes to attain eternal life by a resurrection from the dead.

YOURS, WM. H. TAYLOR.

Mount Vernon, Pa.

Concerning Nebuchadnezzar's Dream.

Our brother, Levi Skeels, is referred to a subsequent article for a fuller reply to his enquiry and diffidently as to Russia being the reconstructor of the image-empire of the latter days. He fears lest that would consist to a fifth kingdom before the kingdom of God should come—in other words, his and other objections to the Autocrat's regulation to this imperial position hinge on the supposed necessity of Messiah's kingdom being the fifth in order. Now, where, I ask, do we find it declared in the Divine Record that Christ's kingdom should be the fifth in order? Is it not taken for granted, without being affirmed in Scripture or proved otherwise?

Suppose we admit, (if only for the sake of argument,) that the Czar of Russia, when conqueror of the Turkish empire, etc., will become emperor of the fifth universal empire, will that position contravene any statement or feature of Daniel's interpretation of this prophecy? It would seem not. There are five constituent elements in the image, viz.: Gold, silver, brass, iron and clay. Is not the last ingredient, clay, as much a part of the image (though only appearing in its feet and toes) as any of the metals? There are those, whose interpretations of this wonderful prophecy are entitled to great respect, who think Russia is to represent and supply the clay part of the image when it "stands" on its feet in order to be smitten by the stone that this final development of that part of the figure is to be at the time of the end, and, as it were, just before the catastrophe that await it, as declared in Dan. ii. 44. This seems to harmonize with what we read of Russia, under the title of "Gog of the land of Magog," in Ezekiel, and in Isaiah in Zechariah and in Revelation, and it may be, with the prophecy in Habakkuk, chap. ii. 4–9, particularly the 5th and 6th verses, which may be found to apply yet to this same Northern Autocrat, when "he ladeth himself with thick clay." See the exhortation to every reader and interpreter, in the third verse. Let us then "wait for it," and its meaning may be declared to us in due time, for "it will not tarry."

If we await the development of events, which are daily becoming our interpreters of prophecy, and watch and witness the unrolling of the scroll, (Isa. xxvi.), the light may break in upon us. If, like Daniel, we observe them narrowly and without prejudice, and, like him, too, we apply ourselves "to understand by books," even as he did by reading "the Word of the Lord by Jeremiah, the prophet," (Dan. ix. 2) shall we not, too, by such means, and by prayer and supplication and fasting, obtain, by God's help, through Christ strengthening us, a true knowledge and understanding of "the things which shall come to pass hereafter."

It seems to me we need not give ourselves any concern as to the order or the exact time when our Master's kingdom shall come. We know that it will come in, or at the "times before appointed," and we have every reason to believe it to be near. If we adopt mere human conjecture and speculation that his kingdom must be "the fifth," as our brother seems to contend, and it turns out not to be so, there will be disappointment and sorrow. Whether fifth or sixth, or any later in the time of it coming, we know that he will come and will not tarry unnecessarily. We cannot suppose him, though in his Father's exalted throne and at the right hand of the Most High, to be indifferent or without care for our anxious desire for his coming. He knows we pant for redemption from this perilous and perishing state, and he is not without an elder brother's yearning love and affection for those who look for and love his appearing.

Even if another universal empire must intervene before his kingdom be established,—which I do not argue—how brief will be the period required for the stone, hurled by the Almighty hand, to sweep away all traces of that image—however colossal, which stands on such a perishable base as brittle, crumbling clay.

ALLAN B. MAGRUDER.

A hidden light soon becomes dim, and if it be entirely covered up, will expire for want of air. So it is with hidden religion. It must go out. There cannot be a Christian whose light in some aspect does not shine.

St. George Mivart, an eminent naturalist, says that for a while he accepted Darwin's theory, but he has been compelled to give it up for scientific reasons. It is plausible, but not true. And so it goes. In what is called natural science nothing is fixed so accurately that it may not be superseded by new discoveries to-morrow. Only the word of the Lord endureth forever.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

TENT MEETING AT GOSHEN, IND.

A protracted meeting will be held in the tent, in the town of Goshen, Clinton county, Indiana, commencing August 15th, and continuing two weeks. Arrangements have been made with H. V. Reed, as chief speaker. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

E. C. ADAMS,
W. F. POWERS,
In charge.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF IOWA.

To the brethren scattered throughout Iowa, and others interested, we will say that our annual conference convenes here at Irving, Tama county, Iowa, on the 19th. We therefore trust you all will be there, as we may make our meeting one of profit and interest. We would be glad to have a representative from Northern Illinois, Northern Missouri, and other localities interested in the rebuilding and spread of the gospel of the kingdom.

We have arranged with Brother H. V. Reed, of Plymouth, Ind., to return and be with us two weeks commencing on Saturday evening, October 5th. We also expect Brethren R. J. Hill, C. C. Hanson, and others here.

Brethren, if you don't come prepared to vote and be voted for, come prepared to pray at the meeting, to speak and receive encouragement, to cultivate friendship and brotherly love, and to be strengthened in faith, hope and charity.

G. M. MYERS.

The union camp meeting will commence at Ladora, Iowa, the same as advertised two weeks ago.

CONFERENCE IN MISSOURI.

The annual conference of Church of God, assembled at Harveys, Lawrence county, Mo., May 26, 1877, after examination and deliberation, declare that all the members of the body in Southwest Missouri, Southeastern Kansas, and Northwestern Arkansas, and all others who possibly can, meet with next annual conference at Ackley school house, one mile east of Chesterville, in the southwest corner of Dade county, Missouri, commencing on Friday before the third Sunday in August, 1878.

By order of the church.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Brailsford, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel. Both of England. The proposition discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious. ... non-Bible, and unable to ... may act whatever and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 25c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 10c; postage 5c.

Immortality and Misery not Future Punishment. By R. R. H. Constable, M. A., late Proctor-Deputy of Cork, Ireland, 320 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly fine in its philological chapters respecting the meanings of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 10c.

We have a book with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has laid hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a full-bodied volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance. ... We must also compliment the publishers on the external and interior dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will speedily be worth more than we owed to the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this painfully misunderstood department of Christian theology.—The Rainbow.

Bishop: or, The Intermediate State of Man. Cross 12mo, 56 million. Price $1.25; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scriptures and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his investigations on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, a keen logic, and a clear and scholarly style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual clear of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I, May to December, edited by W. Kelloway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the news concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $3.25.

Bible Echo. Vol. II, January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period named. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III, July to September, 1875. This completes the Bible Echo—a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 3 months of last year, is $3 50.

New Facts From all Subjects. By the author of "Enquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the gardener, and the housekeeper. Price 50c; postage 6c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Earnest Words for Heart Seekers. Nearly 200 pp. Well printed on heavy toned paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 75c; postage 10c.

"The best lessons of the most satisfactory of the kind that could be written; indeed we know of none other in every way replacing to those who see the necessity of maintaining the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be more than rejoiced, we would be proud, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, cordially appreciated by many; but this work, we think, is decidedly its superior, for it would be hard to point out a single ... was well said, 'Everybody should possess a copy.'—The Bible Echo.

Bible Triumphant. A few copies to spare. Fine paper, cloth, 75c.

PUBLICATIONS FOR SALE AT THE "RESTITUTION OFFICE."

"The Lord is Coming!"

"The Lord is coming!" Let this be
The herald note of jubilee;
Both when we meet and when we part—
The salutation from the heart.

"The Lord is coming!" Watchmen, wake!
The warning give the lo ng take;
With burning lights expectant stand,
This is the King of kings' command.

"The Lord is coming!" Saints, rejoice!
Lift up your heads! His glorious voice
Will soon be heard, and call from dust
The waiting millions of the just!

"The Lord is coming!" Patient wait;
Although he seem to tarry late,
He will not tarry; live by faith;
"I will come quickly!" Jesus saith.

"The Lord is coming!" Who shall stand?
Who shall be found at his right hand?
Those bright arrayed, in morning fair,
In righteous robes that Christ doth wear.

"The Lord is coming!" Watch and pray;
O watch and "haste unto the day!"
So safely kept escape the snare,
And in the kingdom's glory share.

"The Lord is coming!" Sound it forth
From east to west, from south to north!
Spread over earth the tidings glad,
That none who love him may be sad.

Selections.

Ten Signs of the Lord's Speedy Advent.

BY REV. WM. BROOK, M. A.

1. Infidelity or unbelief is a sign. I begin with this because there are so many who profess and call themselves Christians, who do not believe in these signs. How should they if they do not believe in their Master's words? The decline of faith is a sign which he has himself given. "When the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" The Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith. I am speaking now of a professed unbelief which prevails on all sides. Practical unbelief has always been common, and has prevailed in Christian communities in all ages; but professed infidelity is comparatively a new thing. At the end of the last century it burst forth in France, and partially extended itself elsewhere. But of late years it has been openly avowed in the highest places of the church, and, as a natural consequence it has spread with marvelous and fearful rapidity amongst the masses.

A refined and subtle infidelity has poisoned our literature and our education. It lurks too often under the attractive guise of pleasant tales and novels; or it is published under the form of so-called learned "Essays and Reviews." It hides itself with duplicity under the prophet's mantle, and it is given forth, instead of the oracles of God, from the professor's chair, and from too many of our pulpits. Our universities and our public schools are infected with it: and the men who have sworn at their ordination to "banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrine contrary to God's Word," are now the corrupters of our youth, their guides in the path of irreligion, and the teachers of unbelief.

Hence the hollow condition of things all over Christendom; social and political, and moral ties are all broken together. Infidelity and unbelief are the parents of disintegration, of dislocation, of disorganization, and of disorder; they corrode the cement which binds society together. Where there is no religion there is no bond of union. Nations and communities which are leavened with infidelity are like timber that is worm-eaten, or like walls and battlements without mortar—ready to fall to pieces at any moment.

2. For will popery or ritualism mend the matter. As a false religion produced scepticism and infidelity in France a century ago, so a false religion has bred infidelity again. "Puseyism" is a spurious Christianity; it is a caricature of the gospel, and it has corrupted and weakened England, and left her a prey to numerous sure and certain causes of national dilapidation and decay. For the last forty years the Jesuits have had increased sway in Great Britain and Ireland, and in our colonies; and they have done their work thoroughly. They have crippled Christianity all over the world by crippling it in England. They have damaged, discredited, and counteracted Christian missions in all parts of the earth. They have concentrated all their lines of attack upon England and her colonies, as hitherto, the great fortress of Christianity, or, as Dr. Manning tells us, "the great stronghold of heresy" amongst the nations of Christendom.

And they have had marked success. The British parliament subservient to the Romish party; a divided and distracted national church; a perverted and debauched nobility; Bishops who have repudiated the protest of the Reformers, and are secretly permitting the reintroduction of the Romish mass; and a people who, for the most part, are lovers of pleasures, of wealth and of ease, more than lovers of God—these are the sad and humiliating trophies of their triumph.

Therefore a second sign of the times which may be adduced is the maturity and success of the papal antichrist. Her maturity and power in this once great Empire will tell, and is telling everywhere else. Never was the Papacy more thoroughly despised and deserted by the kings of the earth, yet never was she more thoroughly in earnest and successful. Her sins have reached unto heaven. They have culminated in her last crime, in the promulgation of the blasphemous dogma of "Papal infallibility;" and without doubt the Papacy is even now tottering to her fall. Her final doom is surely at hand. And yet so great, so stupendous is "the mystery of iniquity," and so deep also is the "the mystery of God, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets" that in her fall she appears to be dragging down with her one after another the nations of Christendom. They have been partakers of her sins, and they shall receive also of her plagues.

How strikingly has this been exemplified of late years in the history of Europe. The Papacy has debased and degraded every nation she has entered. One of the results of the school board elections in the provinces has been the return of Romish priests and laymen in many large towns at the head of the polls. At Manchester, at Leeds, at Sheffield, at Birmingham, and in many other places Popery has triumphed; and now she has got her hand upon our national education in England, as she has long had it, though more indisputably in Ireland, and will she not poison it for our poor people if she can, as she has already poisoned it, by means of Ritualism, for our public schools and universities? England has made a rod for herself to be scourged with. And as it was severely and sarcastically predicted, in the fatal year of 1829, that thirty or forty foxes were more than a match for six hundred geese in the House of Commons, so it has come to pass and so it will go on unto the end.

3. Notice another sign, the increase of immorality. Vices that our fathers knew not of are common among the nations now. Profligacy and corruption, the fruits of exuberant wealth and luxury, have debased human nature in these latter days; and in our haunts of fashion, as well as in the lowest places of our great cities, vile iniquities prevail. Even the worldly journalists of the day are shocked with the soft luxury and unmanliness of the age. Our men have become women; and the fashionable women of the day have too often become repulsive and indelicate. Immodesty and silliness of dress are on the increase. A gross and exaggerated imitation of Parisian vice has been growing amongst us of late. Extravagance and debt belong to every class of society.

London abounds now with a clamorous crew of as idle, cynical, and worthless young gentlemen as can be found in Paris or New York. People spend grudgingly on what elevates the mind, and ministers to the cause of practical virtue and goodness; but they spend profusely on whatever panders to the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. These are the things which sap a nation's life, and intelligence, and strength. These are the signs of a want of manliness, a want of mind, and a want of religion and virtue; and they betoken the decline and fall of a country. Even the Pall Mall Gazette can see this and proclaims it. The laws of morality are as immutable as the laws of nature and of God. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." This is true of nations as well as of individuals, and if England follows France in her wickedness and vice, she may have to follow her in her doom.

Truly men are "lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trace-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of them that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure, more than lovers of God." All these are given in Scripture as tokens of the latter days, and they will increase, and wax worse and worse, as the great crisis of the world approaches. 2 Tim. iii. 1-5.

4. Notice still further the prevailing formalism in religion. There is a religious varnish over the immorality we have spoken of. "Having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof," this is the peculiar mark of the "perilous times," which are predicted by the apostle. "Form without power, a body without a soul, a religion without life," this is one of the signs of the last days. The show of piety is wide-spread; but a deep and genuine piety is rare. There is much profession; but while profession is on the surface, worldliness is underneath. Christianity nowadays is, for the most part, a subtle thing which lacks the power, and the life, and the beauty, and the self-denial of the earlier days of the church of Christ. We look in vain for that deep sense of sin, that simple trust in Jesus, that saintly and unearthly walk which marked the early Christians. It is a worldly, self-pleasing, ritual, sacramental Christianity which passes current now; and that will never stand the test either of persecution for righteousness' sake, or of the searching fire of the day of Christ.

5. Another sign of the latter days is the strange and incongruous mixture of opinion that prevails. The most absurd, the most blasphemous, the most impure, the most demoralizing, the most lawless, and the most Satanic ideas are afloat. An infernal propaganda of three evil spirits of anti-christian infidelity, revolutionary lawlessness, and Jesuitical superstition has long been at work. It is described in the sixteenth chapter of the book of the Revelation, and it is there stated to be the immediate precursor of the Lord's second advent. "I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. Behold I come as a thief, blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame. And he gathered them together in a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon." Rev. 13. 13—16.

6. Another sign is the wide spread selfishness of the age, and the consequent loosening of all the bonds of human society. Men have always been lovers of their own selves, but they become more intensely so when iniquity abounds and as the end draws nigh. Our social systems are breaking up. Look at the strikes, lock-outs, and increasing struggle between workmen and capitalists. We hear much about fraternity in these evil days, but the world's brotherhood is without reality. All that is fair, and goodly and large-hearted, and generous, and loving, is fast disappearing from among men. Suspicion of each other is one of the rules of life. Except among a very small remnant there is no such thing as unity. It is the iron and the clay of the prophet Daniel which we see before us amongst the nations now. You cannot get union and a universal brotherhood until Jesus comes. "They shall not cleave one to another even as iron is not mixed with clay." Dan. 2: 43.

At the same time is an attempt at a false and spurious unity. There is a society for the re-union of Christendom; a system "more catholic in extent, and seductive by its pretensions than any which has yet been seen," but which may be characterized as unity without the truth, and which looks more like a confederacy against it, and a specious apostasy than anything else.

7. Again observe the weakness of all human government. Man is every day proving more and more his incapacity to keep the world in order. The power that God committed to man for this purpose has been abused. It has been stripped of its one element of strength and of stability, namely, dependence on God's truth; and consequently human government is failing every where. "Therefore as the fire devoureth the stubble and the flame consumeth the chaff, so their root shall be as rottenness, and their blossom shall go up as dust; because they have cast away the law of the Lord of hosts, and despised the word of the Holy One of Israel." Isa. 5: 24.

8. And hence another sign: namely the world's restlessness and unsteadiness. There is amongst the nations of the earth a fearful spirit of lawlessness and anarchy, too furious and combined to be ultimately resisted. There is abroad in the world a passionate love of change, and there is a headlong rushing of the waters of popular commotion which cannot be long repressed. The pressure which has for ages been accumulating upon those barriers which ancient wisdom has erected for the stability of kingdoms will become irresistible at last, and wall and fortress, throne and temple will be overwhelmed.

Men who will go on their vain attempts to govern the world without the fear of God, will be overturned at last. There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars, and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity: the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then they shall see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." Luke 21: 25, 26, 27.

9. Then there are signs of "wars and rumors of wars, earthquakes, pestilences, and famines, in divers places." These have come to pass; and they are still going on and increasing. Over the whole earth is heard "the long, low, distant, murmur of dread sound." The armaments of the nations are attaining the most formidable and colossal dimensions.

10. Then there is that sad sign of the increase of religious deceivers, which our Lord gave us to understand would precede the end. "There shall arise false Christs: and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders, insomuch that if it were possible they should deceive the very elect. There are other signs: such as the spread of knowledge, and the increase of communication in the earth: the missionary evangelism of the last seventy years: the vain and fruitless efforts of the world to accomplish its own regeneration by education, science, philosophy, and the like, without God's Word.

The signals of our days all point in one direction. The crisis of the world's history is at hand. The Judge is at the door. The night cometh, or rather I should say the night is far spent, and the midnight of the world is at hand. "It is settling down upon our cities and on our solitudes; upon the towers of our strength, and the places of our pomp, nor can the noisy rush of eager multitudes, hurrying to and fro for gain or pleasure, wholly stifle the utterance of fear and awe. Men cannot help foreboding evil, for who can tell them what may be in the womb of darkness?"

But it is written also, "The day is at hand?" therefor it is high time to awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. Blessed thought! "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." Stirring, and arousing, and practical thought! "Let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light." Let that be our constant prayer, let it be our real and heartfelt desire. "Come Lord Jesus: come quickly," and it will be a sustaining and encouraging thought that the night though dark will be short, and that it will be followed by a bright, a glorious, and an endless day.—Signs of Our Times.

A Prop Withdrawn.

The dogma of eternal suffering for the lost can ill spare even one of its slender supports. Its advocates have, some of them at least, been in the habit of quoting Rev. 22: 11 in support of their terrible doctrine. This passage is thus disposed of by the advance:

There is reason to doubt the use often made of Rev. 22: 11. "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still, and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Preachers quote these words as though they were a part of the judicial sentence at the last day, or were, at least, a declaration of what would remain true after that event. Mr. Barnes so interprets them. But they do not occur in such a connection. They are a part of the concluding appeal of the book of Revelation, in the form of an impressive final appeal of the angel to John. They come after the words: "Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book; for the time is at hand," and immediately before the words, "And behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every man as his work shall be." It would thus appear that the idea is to tell John, and, through him, all the readers of the book, that after the message should be delivered, men would be allowed to act out their character, and choice, whether evil or good, without divine interference, till the predicted second coming of Christ, when each should be dealt with according to his works. So good old Matthew Henry understands it.

Prof. Stuart, in his commentary, translates, "Let him who acts unjustly, act unjustly still; and let him who is soiled, defile himself still; yet let the righteous still do righteously, and he that is holy, still be holy," adding: "the sentiment seems to be plainly this: Be it that persecutors and vile men shall continue without remission, for a while longer, their oppressive and debasing practices; yet let not the righteous be shaken or his constancy, nor the holy man cease in any measure from the pursuit of sanctification."

It is not proper, then, to quote this passage as teaching that there will be no change of character in eternity. The reference is to the free persistence of men in evil and in good, allowed in this world under the gospel, and to the judgment that will follow, awarding destiny according to character. —Ed.

Eternal Life.

Brother Adams:—Your reply of May 30th has been carefully noted. You say, "eternal life is secured this side of the resurrection." If you mean that it is made secure by faith and a good hope, I agree with you. If you mean that it is actually received this side of the resurrection, I think your position is not warranted by the harmonious teaching of the inspired Word. But you allow that "we obtain it by promise, hope, and a good title," and that the "question between us is settled." That "the difference seems to be in the good title." Then you proceed to say, "let us examine God's covenant to Israel." I cannot see that God's covenant to literal Israel to be fulfilled in the future when "all shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest," has anything to do with the question of gaining a good title to eternal life in this dispensation. Paul declares (Rom. xi.) that "blindness in part is happened to Israel until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in." And so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written (Isa. lix. 20.) "There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; for this is my covenant with them when I shall take away their sins." The predicted "taking away" of their sins, is the same as "forgiving their iniquity and remembering their sin no more." This is to take place when the Deliverer, having come to Zion, "shall come out of Zion" and deliver a remnant of Israel from their last great trouble by a miraculous overthrow of their enemies. I think, therefore, that the application of the prophecy you quote should be to the nation of Israel whose fathers are said, in the same connection, to have been led by the hand of God "out of Egypt," and refers to the near future when that nation shall be converted and forgiven through supernatural means. God will then "pour out the spirit of grace and supplications upon the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and they shall look upon me whom they pierced," then follows a bitter mourning and genuine repentance, and a fountain is opened to wash away their enormous guilt and sin of unbelief. See Zech. xii. 10.

Again, you quote, "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." You, then, seem to confound the future gift of eternal life with the past gift of the Spirit, making the two gifts identical. Again, you make regeneration by the Holy Spirit the necessary title or condition of eternal life. I allow that God must beget men by the Word of truth—which Word is inspired by the Holy Spirit, and sinners are "begotten through the gospel," (see 1 Cor. iv. 15.) by the Holy Spirit's power inducing them to believe the gospel. But how was the Spirit's power exerted? "And they went forth and preached everywhere (the gospel), the Lord working with them and confirming the Word with signs following." The Word or gospel was believed, 1st because it was preached, and 2d, because it was confirmed or demonstrated to be true by the miraculous power of the Holy Spirit in producing these supernatural signs. Thus, the gift of the Spirit becomes the pledge of eternal life to every believer. It is the top stone of the great pyramid of evidence proving the certainty of eternal life when Christ, "who is our life, shall appear." All who shall have been previously begotten shall be born again from the dead by the Spirit, as Christ was "the first born from the dead." Thus we honor the Spirit of God as the earnest of the future inheritance, and the mighty works of the Spirit in the near future shall surpass the miracles of the past. The results of the future outpouring will be the conversion of a remnant of Israel and the "left of the nations." Also, the dead saints will all be quickened into a new life by the same Spirit.

You close your article by quoting several texts, which, you say "establish everlasting life here." Nearly all of these texts I endeavored to reconcile with the many plain testimonies that promise eternal life at the resurrection of the just. God, we are told, "calls things that are not as though they were." In all writings, and in our common speech, we often use the present for the future. When Paul says "we are in hope of eternal life," he emphatically declares that that life is in the future; "for what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for"? He says, we are saved by faith—in the same sense we have eternal life. I understand the expression to "know the true God and Jesus Christ is eternal life," in the sense that this knowledge is the necessary means of gaining eternal life. Let us all lay hold of that blessed life by a living faith and by constant war with the evil that so easily besets us.

Yours, hoping we shall see eye to eye in the kingdom. E. Hewes.

The archæological treasures found in a tomb in the rock at Spata, in Attica, have arrived in Athens. They consist of ornaments in gold, silver, ivory, and a substance resembling glass. They are of the same epoch as those discovered at Mycenæ, but finer.

Italians are unusually excited about Mount Vesuvius; and strange stories are told of the sounds emitted from its interior which are likened to the roar of a disturbed sea, amid which is distinguished a crackling as of many burning logs of wood. These noises are heard, it is said, at a distance of two miles from the crater; and fears have been expressed lest a continuous discharge of lava should effect a passage which would place the observatory in danger. Some thirty persons, ladies included, make a nightly ascent of the mountain to witness the magnificent spectacle presented.

The Maharajah of Gwalior is now surrounding with a garden, which bids fair to become one of the wonders of the world, his palace erected at a cost of $1,250,000, of which the Prince of Wales was the first occupant. It will contain ten garden houses, each illustrating a variety of Hindoo architecture, and a winter palace of glass, imported from Vienna. Water will be brought from artificial lakes over channels so constructed as to give that murmur which was prescribed to afford rest to Maecenas to his villa near Rome. The garden will be kept perennially green by irrigation. The expense of all this will be nothing to the enormously wealthy Gwalior.

In the Russian Caucasus is the tower of Baksu, the point of pilgrimage of the fire worshippers from a period far beyond the era of Mohammedism. The pilgrims are now few in number. The residents of the tower are earnest advocates of the faith, together with sundry disciples of Zoroaster. Their worship, costumes and ceremonies are precisely as in ancient times. The tower has no windows. The interior is reached only by subterranean passages. It is an immense building, and is surrounded by a high wall. Within this wall and encircling the tower are high columns of flame, which spring from the earth and are made with the naphtha that is found in large quantities in the surrounding soil of the mountains. These fires are kept perpetually burning.

Reports on leprosy have been published by surgeons in British India. Dr. Planck, Sanitary Commissioner of the northwest provinces of Bengal, considers that probably no fewer than 10,000 persons in that vast area are leprous, and it results in reducing to beggary at least one-third of that number. Its attacks arise seldom from contagion. It is a hereditary disease. As a rule leprosy assumes outward and hurtful appearance between the ages of twenty and fifty. In China the great seats of leprosy are in the provinces of Canton and Fok'en. In Canton there are believed to be 10,000 lepers. Leprosy is unknown among the Australian aborigines. Of late years it has been more frequently observed in Europeans who have visited the East and West Indies.

Alpine tourists will this year have an opportunity for observing a new and unprecedented phenomenon. In the neighborhood of the small town of Bourg St. Maurice is a mountain called by the people of the country the "Roc Rouge." It is connected with the outlying spurs of the little St. Bernard, and is 7,500 feet above the sea level. This mountain is at the present moment tumbling to pieces. For three weeks past the blocks of solid stone of which it is, as it were, built up have been crumbling away, and the whole side of the mountain appears to be in course of pouring itself down into the plain. The scene is described by a member of the French Alpine Club as magnificent in the extreme. The boulders which detach themselves are often of immense size, and they leap down a steep slope at an extremely rapid pace, crushing literally to matchwood the trees and saplings which they encounter. The noise made by the descending masses resembles dull and distant peals of thunder.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates a return to this earth, by resurrection out of the Kingdom of Hell on the earth, with the Christian Church of kings, and the literal risen saints to join in with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked, eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a literal belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites for the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Notes and Travels.

As an offset to my statement in reference to the sacrifices I have made in order to keep constantly in the field, I would say, that in my recent visits in Iowa and Ohio, the brethren contributed of their means quite liberally for the times, to supply my financial needs, for which they have my thanks.

My meetings at Nashville, near West Milton, Miami, county Ohio, notwithstanding the busy season and hot weather, were well attended, and the best of interest prevailed from first to last. I delivered eight discourses to very attentive congregations. I delivered a temperance lecture to a large audience at Fredericktown, in the Disciple meeting house. I think, with persevering effort, much good might be done in that community. There are, I should think, twenty or thirty substantial members belonging to that Ecclesia. They were turned out of the professed Christian church near by, and a man who makes no profession of religion, gave them a deed to a house, to be theirs while they keep up their meetings. If such were the tenure of title wherever our brethren have houses of their own, the title to many of them would be forfeited. These brethren were enlightened through the efficient labors of Brother Wagoner.

I spent a solid week in the regions round about Glasgow, Ohio, where our good brother, Rennie, resides. Our meetings, during Sunday, were held in the hill country, about four miles south of Port Washington. A little company went over from Glasgow. The meetings were held in a pleasant little church, belonging to I know not whom, only I know it is free from sectarian proscription. A number of the leading men in the community belong to no church. These, together with about fifty others, gave attention to the Word spoken. The congregation in the afternoon was considerably larger than in the forenoon. A general desire was expressed to hear more. I spoke to a crowded hall at Burr Oak, about eight miles from there, in the evening. I delivered four lectures the subsequent evenings at Newcomerstown, the county seat, to a select congregation. The intelligence of the place was represented. The preachers of the place, and one from Port Washington, attended. Much more than ordinary interest was manifested. Interest and numbers increased from the beginning. An incident occurred last summer which brought our views prominently before the community. A Lutheran minister by the name of Knisley, proposed to discuss the issue between him and me. This statement of the question was accepted and the time set for the discussion to commence, but he declined meeting me himself, but proposed one Professor Dodds, a Disciple minister of some note, whom we would not accept as a substitute for Mr. Knisley. Poor health was alleged as the reason of his refusing, but this could not be urged as an excuse when I was there, Mr. Knisley stands high in his church, and that community as a gentleman of ability, and an able debater. A victory over such a man would tell for the truth. Many questions were asked and answered during these meetings, three of the preachers participating the last evening. All moved on smoothly, and the lectures on the origin, nature and destiny of man, evidently left a favorable impression upon the minds of those who heard. At the conclusion, Mr. Dodd arose, and said that he agreed with the leading positions that had been taken by the speaker, but there was some difference in reference to the condition of the spirit between death and the resurrection. He also announced that the Lutheran preacher would review my lectures the next Sunday evening. Arrangements were made for Brother Rennie to take notes, and I expect to return ere long to reply to the reply.

Before leaving on Friday morning, we repaired to the river and five willing souls were buried with Christ by baptism, and arose from the liquid grave to walk in newness of life. Having partaken of the emblems of the broken body and shed blood of our absent Savior, I went on my way rejoicing, hoping to be accounted worthy to partake with those dear brethren and sisters, and the sacramental host at the last supper in the Kingdom of our once suffering but then glorified Savior. Having waited two hours at Lyons, and six hours at Massillon, I reached Canton at half past ten in the night, and found Brethren A. D. James, and Sister Annie Eshelman, waiting at the depot, to escort me to their quiet, pleasant home. The afternoon of the next day in company with these two beloved brethren, I passed on to Salem en route to my appointment at Amity the same evening. Brother Baker conveyed us to his house, and on to the Town House, where we found a large congregation waiting. Discoursed on the subject of the Christian's armor, through which alone the soldiers of Christ may expect to come off victorious. Not this armor, the feeblest warm a triumph over us, but with it in the great moral conflict between truth and error, light and darkness, sin and sin a thousand and two pitted on thousand, to fight, in the sublime language of the poet,—

"What! shall a thousand worlds engage
A thousand times as wicked as I?
I have a shield shall quell their rage,
And drive their allies back."

The next morning I discoursed on the example of Christ, which, if followed, will lead us through the golden gate into the everlasting kingdom. In the afternoon I lectured in a beautiful grove near Amherst, to about one hundred and fifty persons, comfortably seated beneath the leafy roof of a temple built without hands, whose curtains were rolled up that the pure winds of heaven might circulate freely. Carriages forming a semi-circle, contained anxious listeners to the Word spoken. Being thus pleasantly situated, I talked to them an hour on the great theme of the relative position, the place, time of its establishment, and glorious mission of the kingdom of God. Never have I witnessed better attention and apparently more thrilling interest. I closed with a lecture in the evening at the Town House, on the Eastern question. The house was filled to its utmost capacity, yet still and quiet as though they realized the magnitude of the issue involved in the solution of the Eastern question. I agree with Brother Magruder in the main.

I closed my engagement at Lanark, Illinois, last Sunday evening, having visited them monthly for eighteen months, except once, when Brother Myers visited them. On the following Monday and Tuesday evenings, I delivered two discourses at Mount Carroll, the county seat of Carroll county, Illinois, to large and attentive congregations. All the churches in that place were closed against us. A Mr. Cole who makes no profession of Christianity, gave us the use of the old M. E. church, which he had purchased, and assisted Brother Stevens in getting it up. He offers it to us free if we will seat it. Will not our brethren at Lanark and East Plain River, furnish means to purchase seven or eight hundred feet of lumber to seat it? I know of no place where there is better prospect of doing good. The people are willing and anxious to hear.

The Perils of the Last Days.

[For Views of others on the same subject, see Sermon—2 Tim. iv. 3.

The letter will naturally associate itself with the whole chapter, of which it forms a part, and the 1 Tim. [illegible] numerous to be cited. Even the most superficial reader can hardly fail to see that in all his letters to individuals or churches, the grand central or focal point is the coming of Christ; the establishment of the everlasting kingdom; the end of the present or Gentile dynasty, which will be deposed or superseded by the rightful heir to David's throne and kingdom; see Ezekiel xxi. 25-27. And in view of this grand epoch he exhorts Timothy, and charges him to preach the word; to be instant in season and out of season; to reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long suffering and doctrine. See 2 Tim. iv.

In view of so much testimony, not only from this apostle, but from many other writers in both the Old and New Testaments, relative to this subject, I would respectfully ask, in all candor, what is the cause of so much darkness and the consequent apathy and indifference in regard to this doctrine or subject? Surely there is no other doctrine so plainly taught in the Bible, and none that is less ambiguous than this doctrine.

Many seem to be waiting for an outpouring of the Spirit, as on the day of Pentecost, or for some agency outside of the Word, some vision or direct revelation from heaven. I once heard Ellen G. White, of vision notoriety, say that many doctrines now believed by the Advent body made little or no impression on her mind from the reading of the scriptures, until she had visions relative to those doctrines or subjects. She instanced particularly the doctrine of the mortality of man.

I would ask again, without casting any reflection on any individual, or [illegible] to the spirit, to ignore any [illegible] Christ, the star Lucifer of the Gospel dispensation, or even the closet doctrine with impunity? For instance, Dan. xii. 4, prophecy relative to the time and [illegible] of long period, mentioning to give place to the [illegible] kingdom, one that shall not be set to other people, one in which the saints are to have a share of the honor to them appointed. Do [illegible] the last in the series mentioned one? For proof, please consult Dan. ii. 44; vii. 9-27; Psa. cxlv. 8-9.

These writers were inspired to write with regard to events which are still future; for prophecy is only history in advance, and after it is once uttered on record is the clearest fact; sufficient? Would it be any more explicative if a revelation should be made direct to us?

Paul, in his letter to Timothy, very graphically describes the characters which should figure conspicuously in these last days, viz: A departure from the faith unto fables; disobedience to parents; and all the crimes in the criminal calendar. But we are told that all these crimes have been committed from time immemorial. Granted, at least for argument's sake. What then? Does it indeed invalidate the testimony of the apostle? Not in the least. Every candid man at my age—seventy-seven or even half that, will bear witness that for the last twenty years there has been such an increase of those crimes enumerated, as to emphatically mark the time. It is not necessary as a sign-mark, that a new phenomenon should be used exclusively. The rainbow was to be a sign that the earth should not again be deluged. The rainbow was no new phenomenon at that time; it is one of the laws of nature that sunshine through a mist will produce this; but every occurrence of this was to be to him a reminder of the covenant.

The frequent occurrence of earthquakes, tidal waves, etc., the present Eastern war, with its inhuman atrocities, the late war (as we may call it) of labor against capital, are to the Christian and Bible student significant signs or way-marks on the chart of time, our whereabouts in the world's history; the time when men's hearts are failing them for fear, and, paradoxical as it may appear to some, the true Christian who has followed the Savior "through evil as well as good report," may now look up and rejoice that his redemption draws nigh.

M. I. LEWIS.

Literal Return of the Jews.

I write to ask for more light. A discussion on the subject of the literal return of the Jews to Palestine, has more it necessary not more held upon the subject at this place, and I write to some of our brethren who are well posted on this subject to give us their views through the columns of the RESTITUTION.

The study of the subject has brought out a few thoughts I wish to present for consideration.

The return of the Jews I understand, is to be a national one, but is there proof that it is at or about the time of the first resurrection? As Paul says in Rom. xi. 15: "For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead," evidently implying their resurrection. He also says in his defence before Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 6, 7, that he was judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers, unto which promise the twelve tribes instantly serving God day and night, hoped to come. The promise that God made to the fathers was that they should receive the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession. This promise never having been fulfilled, their faith in God gave them the hope that he would yet, at some time in the future cause their hopes to be realized, but which could not be done only through a resurrection.

The thirty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel evidently speaks of the return of the house of Israel and it is called the whole house) after their graves are opened, and they are brought up out of their graves. There are many prophecies which foretell the gathering of Israel out of all countries and all nations, but do they foretell for only a part or for the whole of Israel? Do they not rather refer to the time when the hope that [illegible] Isa. xxv. 7-9.

I do not desire for the consideration of the brotherhood, and if I am in error in my views, I hope to be set right.

Your brother in hope,
ALONZO HASSON.

Grave Testimony.

It is I and no conformed in everything to the sober judgment and [illegible] the extreme opposite of Nicolaitanism. Instead of a church of domineering clericals, it is the church of the domineering mob, in which nothing may be safely preached except what the people are pleased to hear,—in which the teachings of the pulpit are fashioned to the tastes of the pew, and the feelings of the individual overrule the enactments of legitimate authority.

It is unknown, nothing decided, partly hot and partly cold, divided between Christ and the world; not willing to give up pretension and claim to the heavenly, and yet clinging close to the earthy; having too much conscience to cast off the name of Christ, and too much love for the world to take a firm and honest stand entirely on his side. There is much religiousness, but very little religion; much sentiment, but very little of life to correspond; much profession, but very little faith; a joining of the ball-room to the communion table, of the opera with the worship of God, and of the feasting and riot of the world with pretended charity and christian benevolence.

And it is self-satisfied, boastful, and empty. Having come down to the world's tastes, and having gained the world's praise and patronage, the Laodiceans think they are rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing. Such splendid churches, and influential and intelligent congregations, and learned, agreeable preachers! Such excellently manned and endowed institutions! So many missionaries in the field! So much given for magnificent charities! Such an array in all the attributes of greatness and power! What more can be wanted?

And will it answer to say that all this is not largely and characteristically the state of things at this very hour? Can any man scout the narrow) the professed church of our day, and say that we have not reached the Laodicean age? Is it not the voice of this Christendom of ours which says, "I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need in nothing?" And is it not equally the fact that this self-same Christendom of ours is "the wretched, and the pitiable, and poor, and blind, and naked?" Did the "Man, more, than upbraid it" of Belshazzar's palace better fit the ancient heathen than this modern Christian Babylon? Mene talk of it as destined to glorious triumph? They proclaim it eternally spoiled of God to convert the world. They point to its onward march as about to take speedy possession of the race for Christ and heaven. But "The Amen" hath spoken. "The faithful and true Witness" hath given his word: "I am about to spew it out of my mouth."

Friends and brethren, I have not made these pictures; I have found them; and the sevenfold admonition of Almighty God with reference to them is: "He that hath an ear, let him hear." You have listened to my statements; have you taken in their truths? If there is any just apprehension of Holy Scriptures in them, these seven epistles stand out in transcendent interest and value, as they do in the urgency with which they are pressed upon our attention. They are Christ's own history of his church. They are Christ's own criticisms upon all its characteristic features and doings for nearly two thousand years. They are Christ's own verdict upon all the great questions which have agitated it, and upon all the great influences and tendencies, from within and from without, which have inflicted its character or destiny in every period of its career. The teachers are few, but the marks of their divinity are in them. They are comprehensive, true, and unmistakable to him who will rightly approach and fairly deal with them.

And if these epistles to the seven churches—really are what I have represented them to be, then we have in them what Christians have so much felt the want of, namely, an authoritative settlement of the great questions between us and prelatists, papists, high churchists, and false pretenders, rationalists and radicals of many sorts. Then, also, we have in them a final settlement of the question whether the church, or the Anointed Savior, is to carry redemption into successful effect upon earth's depraved and rebellious peoples,—whether there is to be a millennium of peace and universal righteousness wrought by present instrumentalities or not, whether the tendency of Christendom is toward improvement and perfection, or, like everything else with which fallen man has to do, earthward, deathward, and hellward,—and whether or not the true flock of God is ever to be anything else in this dispensation than a feeble, depressed, and hated minority. All these questions, and many more alike interesting, important and vital, are put beyond all reasonable disputation in these epistles if the doctrine of their proper prophetic aspect is to be maintained. And I submit it to you, as you shall answer before the bar of God, whether the truthfulness of this acceptation of them has not been credibly and conclusively made out. The key exactly fits the lock, the impression answers to the stamp, the cast bears the precise outlines of the mould; and it would seem to me like trifling with the truth not to admit that, in the mind of Jesus, they belong together. Let us see to it, then, that we hear as the text commands, and learn to view the Church's errors, corruptions, mistakes and sins, as Christ views them; to love what he loves, to hate what he hates, and to hope only as he has given us authority to hope. And to this may Almighty God grant us his helping grace! Amen.—Lectures on the Apocalypse, by Dr. Seiss.

The Red Sea.

The Red Sea is said to be the hottest place in the world. The atmosphere for about sixty miles in that sea is steamy and sticky. Every thing in the shape of iron or steel about the ship takes a coat of rust. During the summer months no one travels on the Red Sea unless compelled by business or military orders to do so. In the winter and spring the passage is delightful. Yet the navigation in that body of water is always attended with many dangers. The Red Sea is long and narrow, with sunken rocks and projecting reefs; and counter winds prevail, which produce dangerous currents. There are three lighthouses on the sea, which must be kept by white-headed fire men, since the heat would make quite a degree in July, and approaches 90 in early spring.

Prodigies.

Frequent earthquakes have been reported in Japan since July 1, but they were unattended with disasters.

The insurrectionary war in Japan is drawing to a close, the leading rebels admitting that all hope for the cause is over.

In two recent attempts to sound the Northern Ocean with lines one mile and a half in length, no bottom could be found.

Advices from China state the cholera has appeared in several parts along the coast, and famine continues in the northern provinces.

The British army in India, exclusive of Europeans, has 177,821 men; 27,900 Mohammedans, 2,270 native Christians, 250 Jews, and the rest Hindoos.

A subterranean telegraph cable, 400 miles long, has just been laid down between Berlin, Frankfort, Mayence and Cassel, the longest thing of the kind in existence.

Prof. Fritzsche, Director of the Russian observatory at Pekin, has compared his experience of the climate there with the five-year observations of the Jesuits in 1756-62, and finds no evidence of any change.

St. Michael's Church, at Marblehead, Mass., was built in 1706 of material wholly brought from the mother country. It has a rere'os, an ancient chandelier, and a pulpit of a quaint wineglass pattern. Its second rector was the minister who married the widow Custis to George Washington.

Mr. Spurgeon, who is at present the guest of Mr Duncan, of Benmore, Scotland, preached a sermon to some 7,000 persons at Dunoon on a recent Sabbath. Many of the audience traveled as far as from Garelochhead, a journey involving a walk of twenty-two miles, besides the crossing and recrossing of two lakes.

The throne room of the Sultan at Constantinople is a gorgeous apartment. The gilding is unequalled by that of any other building in Europe. From the ceiling hangs a Venetian chandelier with 200 lights. At each of the four corners of the room tall candelabra in Baccarat glass are placed. The throne is a huge seat covered with red velvet, and with arms and back of pure gold.

The valuable library of the late George Bedey of Hartford, which is called the choicest private collection of rare books in the country, is to be offered for sale. Among the treasures is a Mazarin Bible, which cost $12,000, and except the one bought by Mr. Brown, of Providence, from the Lenox library, is the only copy in the country. There are also several Eliot's Indian Bibles and a particularly rich collection of the Mather works.

The leading Hungarian newspaper, the Pesther Lloyd, reports that a society has been formed among the Jews of Roumania whose aim it is to overcome the prejudice and animosity to which they have so long been subjected. They have donated 1,000 francs in aid of the Roumanian army in the present war, established an ambulance corps, furnished surgeons and physicians, and equipped a corps of volunteer soldiery.

In that part of the Black Forest belonging to the grand duchy of Baden lies the pretty district of Koenigsfeld, containing 410 inhabitants. During fifty years there have been in it no crimes or misdemeanors of any sort—neither transgressions of the policy regulations, nor sheriff's sales, nor illegitimate births, nor divorces, nor lawsuits of any kind. Moreover, in these last fifty years at Koenigsfeld no one has ever got drunk or stretched out a hand to beg.

A new method of preserving the bodies of the dead has just been exhibited in Berlin. It is the invention of a Mr. Tomlinetti of Hamburg, and consists in a thorough drying of the tissues by means of an injected gas, which absorbs the moisture and drives it out through the pores. Prepared in this way, an animal preserves its form and color in perfection. Mr. Tomlinetti exhibited a bear which had thus been treated after its death four months previously. Slices were cut from the body to show that the tissues were not destroyed, but, except for their desiccation, were preserved in excellent condition.

The Restitution.

M. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUG. 22, 1877.

BROTHER REED is away preaching in the middle part of the state. May be absent two weeks.

A SAMPLE of the wheat advertised in this number come to hand. The grains are long, clear and perfect. It will probably interest our subscribers in the South to give it a trial.

THE NURSERY, the neatest sort of a monthly magazine for very young readers, for September is at hand. Address John L. Shorey, 36 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass. Terms $1.50 a year in advance.

THE news from the eastern conflict presents nothing of a decisive character as yet. A movement is on foot for cutting off Osman Pasha's supplies by blockading his connection with Sophia by way of Ochurik Pass, thus endeavoring to effect by famine what would not easily be effected by force. The latest news is that 7000 Turkish or Egyptian troops have been disembarked at Sulina, and are moving on Tultscha, which is weakly garrisoned. They are also making demonstrations in other quarters, thus assuming the offensive, while, at the same time, the Russians are moving heavy forces up to the points threatened. Conflicts may be looked for daily. Greece is also fortifying all her important forts, as well as preparing her men-of-war. We await the development of events in the great drama.

WE have, for the last week, been suffering from quite a severe attack of intermittent fever. We have it on alternate days, and have had four days of prostration already. We have had to manage this number on the alternate days of freedom from its paroxysms, as our fever runs high, lasts about twelve hours, and transports us to the very borders of delirium. We are using means to break it up, and, by the Divine blessing, hope soon to succeed. If the brethren furnish means, the paper will be issued regularly, if our Heavenly Father gives us alternate days of comparative freedom from disease, with his own heavenly assistance. We want to be true to God, true to the interests of our subscribers, faithful in our ministry, do our life-work as well as we can, and hope, notwithstanding all deficiencies and shortcomings, to be saved through the mercy of God, and the redemption in Christ Jesus.

BROTHER Z. GOWER writes us from Texas, that the cause of truth is onward in that state. He has baptized several recently. He also says that the cotton crops are fine, and thinks that considerable help will be sent to the RESTITUTION when cotton is marketed. In this connection we would say, that we hope that our brethren will everywhere exert themselves for the prosperity of our paper. A medium of communication must be sustained in these critical times. Some love this world better than the kingdom, and will have this world for their reward. The kingdom will be given to none but those that seek it, and labor and sacrifice for it. Those who drop papers treating on the fulfillment of prophecy are most essentially injuring themselves. We are starting a little subscription in this part to see if we can do something for the RESTITUTION. If all would do a little we should get over the remaining months of this year, and we hope to find the affairs of the paper in a "larger place" next year. We are not soliciting for ourselves. If the paper is suspended for a week at any time it will be for the want of means. God has provided wonderfully thus far, and we trust him still.

Temperance.

At the present time the temperance movement is attracting unusual attention. We learn from the Northern Indianian that over six thousand have signed the pledge at Fort Wayne. In other towns, along the line of the railroad westward, it is said equally favorable results have been reached in proportion to the population. The Hon. James Collins has taken an active part in the movement in his own county, Whitley, with marked success. As drunkenness is a crime enumerated as excluding from the kingdom of God, and as temperance finds a central place in that constellation of cardinal virtues, that finally procure "an abundant entrance" into the glories of that future kingdom of honor and blessedness, no one, properly instructed, can feel indifferent as to the propriety, nay, the absolute and imperious necessity of total abstinence from every form of intoxicating beverage. The movement has reached Plymouth, and the leaders are reported ...ing with results quite encouraging. The state of our health has prevented our attendance on a single occasion. The peaceful policy is the true one. We wish that the young and enterprising city, in which we are spending a few years of the evening of life, might become noted for the universal temperance of its inhabitants. All spent in intoxicating liquors is a dead loss to the drinker, aside from the moral and physical injury entailed on himself, and the social degradation that extends to an innocent family and relatives.

We hope that those who sign the pledge will be true to themselves, their comrades, and their God. We can assure them, one and all, that they will soon find out that they are a great deal better off financially, socially, physically, and morally, from letting the poisoned spirit alone. In these United States, untold millions are yearly sunk in this destructive business. The condition of other professedly Christian nations is scarcely better. Our temperance friends have confronted a monster evil, but God is always on the side of the right. May he bless every effort calculated to promote the best interests of humanity if it be only for the present life. Christian ethics allow no place for dram-drinking. Holy devil would be a no greater solecism in language than lit ...ling Christian Revelations.

The prophecies of Revelation do not find a complete fulfillment in a single consecutive line of historical events, but in several parallel, and contemporaneous lines. As writers of universal history find it convenient, and even absolutely necessary, to trace certain courses of events to their several issues, and then to return, and carefully narrate other discontected, contemporaneous, and equally important events; and as they often find it will produce the best effect, in making their pages instructive, as well as interesting, to portray some great event as an episode by itself, though falling into ...ome one of these parallel lines of history; so Revelation treats the prospective of human affairs. The seals unfold one line of history to the day when men of every condition, from the royal magnate, to the manacled slave, shall call for mountains and rocks to fall, and hide them "from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." The trumpets take up another and quite distinct line of events, and terminate that line only when "the kingdoms of this world become our Lord's and his Christ's." The vials trace out still another line and extend beyond the thief-like coming of Christ for his saints. As an episode synchronizing with the events of the seals, though separately narrated, is the sealing of the hundred and forty-four thousand from all the tribes of the children of Israel, as well as the innumerable company "of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues" of the white robed throngs that will stand "before the throne, and before the Lamb." There are several episodes that synchronize with the events of the trumpets each in its proper place. The mercuring of the temple of God, its altar, and the worshipers in one; the prophesying, the death, and the resurrection of the two witnesses, is still another; so of the woman that flees into the wilderness, of the dragon that persecutes her, as well as the remnant of God's people; so of the beast having seven heads and ten horns as well as of the other with his two lamb-like horns; and so finally of the harvest of the earth and the gathering of its vintage,—all are so many distinct episodes covered by the long historical line of the sounding of the trumpets. An episode belonging to the vials is the gathering of the victors to the sea of glass. They are not gathered until Christ comes, and he comes while the sixth vial is poured upon some power symbolized by the Euphrates. Opening the temple is entirely a separate affair from the coming of the Lord and gathering his saints to the empyreal and flame-colored crystal. So far as relates to the redeemed, it would be altogether congruous for them to meet the Lord and receive their official positions before either reigning as kings, or entering upon the Holy Temple service, as the royal priesthood of a coming age. The fall of Babylon is embraced in the line of the vials as well as the drying up of the Euphrates. It is one of the most solemn and awful episodes in the whole book. What the first five vials have left unaccomplished, will be consummated at the out pouring of the seventh. She will yet be impaled on the very horns that have impaled millions of saints as executors of her inexpressible wickedness and cruelty. Her final plagues are not symbolized by the evaporation of a river, but by the burning of a great, wealthy, luxurious, and wicked city, ending in a denouement symbolized by a mighty angel casting a great millstone into the sea. There is quite a difference between the burning of a city, and then hurling all its horrible debris into an ocean, and the evaporation of a river to dryness. So much so, as we are compelled to think, that both classes of figures can never harmonize in the overthrow of one and the same system of wickedness. The downfall of Babylon is connected with the pouring out of the seventh vial; for this vial "is to her, especially, "the cup of the wine of the fierceness of wrath." The blasting effect of the contents of the seventh vial will be as universal in the world as the extent of the atmosphere itself. Its destructive influence will be as all-pervading as the influence of the "prince of the power of the air." It will be Satan's Kingdom out of existence. It embraces the fearful time of trouble that will be experienced while God's people will be safely hidden in the chambers till the indignation shall be past. Isa. xxvi. 20. This time of unparalleled distress is in the comparatively near future. May we be accounted worthy to escape all those things that are coming on the earth and to stand before the Son of Man.

Exegetical.

Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you, that ye should earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. Jude, 3.

The very common construction put upon this text, as enjoining an earnest argumentative or controversial contention for the faith once delivered to the saints, certainly comes short, or goes beyond, or shoots aside, of the genuine purport of the original. Not that such a mode of vindicating or upholding the great truths of Christianity is in any way wrong or liable to objection, provided the spirit of meekness and candor breathe through our writings. Neither do we consider it a violent wresting of the text to apply it in this sense; but we only wish to say there is no evidence that this is the leading scope of the passage. The original epagōnizesthai has the predominant sense of agonizing, and implies a strenuous, fervent and laborious endeavor to compass an object which is environed with great difficulties. It conveys, in this connection, undoubtedly, the idea of earnest and assiduous striving for the practical rather than the theoretical faith of Christianity, and does not necessarily imply any other adversaries than a man finds in the corruptions of his own nature. In a word, it is a term which would be equally appropriate to the duty of a Christian, even though there had never been a personal impugner of any of the grand doctrines of revelation on earth.—Prof. Bush, in Hierophant.

In the Field.

Brother Chaplin:—I returned from Harvard, Illinois, on Tuesday last. I was called to that place to attend the funeral of Robert Gardner, who died August 10th, and was buried on the 11th. A large concourse attended the funeral, which was held in the M. E. church. Mr. G. was one of the first citizens of that young and thriving city, and one of our most warm and devoted friends. We knew him for many years and can bear personal testimony to his kindness of heart and unselfish devotion to those in need. No brother ever did more for us. The loss to Sister Gardner is irreparable in this life. We deeply sympathize with her and the dear family who are now in the deep shadows of grief.

On Sunday we gave a lecture upon the new things of the Bible, to a very large audience in Ayer's Hall. Harvard was our home for twelve years, and we were greeted by many dear friends who have a warm place for us in their hearts.

In the afternoon we went about six miles from Harvard and talked to the people upon the subject of looking for Christ. A number of the community are in sympathy with the gospel, and are looking for him who is the desire of nations and the Christian's hope. Our brethren in Harvard have not had much preaching for some time, but they are firm in the faith of the gospel and trusting in our absent Lord for immortality. To-day we leave for Colfax, Indiana, where we are to work for the cause of truth. Will report in due time.

Your brother, H. V. REED.

Important Astronomical Discovery.

The telescope in the National Observatory, near Washington, has been doing its first signal service in assisting the eye of Professor Hall to discover a satellite to the planet Mars. This discovery, which was made last Thursday night, and confirmed by nightly observations and measurements since, must rank among the highest astronomical discoveries of the age, and will materially lift into importance the standing of American star-gazers, as well as the grade of American instruments. The revolution of the newly-found body is calculated at one day and eight hours, or a little less, the diameter being not more than 5,000 miles, while its revolution about Mars is about thirty hours. As the distance of the body from Mars is only some 14,000 miles, it is less distant from the planet than any known satellite. The astronomers in the observatory believe that another and smaller satellite has also been sighted by them near the first.

Not too Fast.

Almost all who write on prophecy, tell us that we are under the sixth plague, and that the great river Euphrates is now being dried up. Come brethren, don't be too sure! If this is so tell us when there fell on the men who have the mark of the beast, a bad ulcer? When did the sea become as the blood of a dead man, and when did every living soul die in the sea? When did the third of the rivers and fountains of waters become blood? When did the sun burn men with great heat, and when was the throne of the beast and his kingdom full of darkness? And back of all this, when did the conquerors of the beast stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. When was the temple of the tent of the witnesses opened? John says, after these things this temple was opened, and the seven angels who have the seven plagues came out. Let us stick to this order:

First. The conquerors of the beast stand on the sea of glass.

Second. The temple of the witnesses is opened.

Third. The seven angels come out, receive the seven vials of wrath, and then begin to pour out the plagues.

Come brethren, tell us when and where all this took place. But if you know nothing about the opening of the temple, how can you tell when and how the plagues begin. If you say this temple is in heaven and out of mortal sight, I answer that it is in the same locality of other scenes of this book. In Rev. xii. 1, a great sign is seen in the heavens. In verse 3 another sign is seen in the heaven—the first a woman, the second a dragon. In chap. x., a great star falls out of the heavens. In chap. xv. 1, another great sign is seen in the heavens; seven angels having the seven last plagues. The temple of the witnesses is in the heavens; the woman is in the heavens, the Dragon is in the heavens, till he is cast out, and the seven angels who have the seven last plagues are in the heavens. Hence all these things seem located in the same place. If this Dragon was the ruling power of Rome, and this woman was the church, then this is the Roman heaven, the fourth prophetic kingdom, and according to Daniel, the saints take this heaven as a kingdom. And in Rev. xi. 15, John says that great voices were heard in the heavens, saying, "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

These voices are heard in the same locality where the temple is opened, where the woman and dragon are seen, and where the seven angels are, and where the seven plagues fall; and this kingdom which becomes our Lord's is the fourth, the Iron, the Roman heaven. Now tell us when the temple of the witnesses was opened in this heaven? Give us this event that we may follow the plagues from the first to the sixth, and see if Turkey is the great River Euphrates. The fact is, these plagues all fall on great Babylon and the nations who committed lewdness with her, and it is said that her plagues shall come in one day; then, at most, we only have one year in which to pour out the plagues. The Lord will make a short work in the earth when the stone smites the image on the feet. Turkey, and all other kingdoms that stand in the way, will be dashed to earth as a potter's vessel. But I expect Turkey to stand till the Lord comes, then the bond woman and her son to be cast out that the estate may fall to the legal heir. But the temple will be opened, the messengers will come out of Babylon, the plagues will fall on the guilty, and thus the time of trouble will begin.

In another article I want to present to the readers of the RESTITUTION some of the evidences why Rome instead of Turkey, is the great River Euphrates of prophecy. In the meantime let us watch and pray that we may be counted worthy to escape the things that are coming on the land, and to stand in the presence of the Son of Man, keeping in mind the fact, that after the plagues begin to fall no one will be able to enter the temple till the seven plagues of the seven messengers are fulfilled. And, now, dear brethren, if I am so far behind the times that this great event has transpired and I knew it not, lend a helping hand to lift me out of the fog. Has the temple of the witnesses been opened and I knew it not?

Yours in the love of the truth, and in the bond of love. J. C. KINSEY

Does Jesus Love Me?

How often do we hear sung, the hymn "Jesus Loves Me?" This, indeed, is a beautiful hymn; but we should not sing it unless we knew that he does love us. Does Jesus love us? This is, most assuredly, a question we all should ask ourselves. It causes deep thought. Then with a solemn, earnest, and truthful answer, we say yes. For did he not give his life as a ransom for us? Did he not groan upon the tree, that we, through his death and suffering, might have access to eternal life, and become heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ? To love is to do; and he surely did something for us. Some are so foolish as to think that Christ's crucifixion had nothing to do with our salvation. But stop; were not the Jews the chosen people of God? Did not they depart from God's law, and did not Christ come into the world to tell the people of the glad tidings of the promises made unto the fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and after the crucifixion, did not God command the apostles to preach to the Gentiles? Surely, had not the Jews rejected Christ, we could never, never have become heirs to the promises of God. Just think of it, how solemn, yet how true! God sent his Son to die that we might live. Oh, lovers of truth, as he has done so much for us, let us do something for him. Come, let us assemble ourselves, praise him day and night throughout all ages; praise and adore the Lord God on high; unfurl the gospel banner, and put on the whole armor of God. Let us do good in our weak way. We cannot enjoy the smallest thing, we cannot look upon an object, but what was made by his mighty power. Oh, that my eyes were as a fountain, that I might weep, and my tongue as the pen of a ready writer, for my tongue never can find language to express the depth of his might, his word, or his power. My heart is heavy, for I cannot praise my God as he does his holy name. Oh heathen, every one, to the gospel trumpet; unfurl the banner of righteousness, another Sabbath, root out all evil communications, and put on the whole armor of God. When we do these things, we then can sing "Jesus loves me" with the spirit and understanding. Oh, let us all be up to God; work in the vineyard; do unto others as we should be done by; weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those that rejoice; look for glory, honor, immortality, in a never ending eternity, where praise shall forever ascend to God, our Savior, our Redeemer and Friend, our God.

Fate of the Last Man.

What will become of the last man? Various theories that have been seriously mooted by scientific men are described in the Scientific American and we summarize them: 1. The surface of the earth is steadily diminishing, elevations are being lowered, and the seas are filling up. The land will at last be all submerged, and the last man will be starved or drowned. 2. The ice is gradually accumulating at the North pole and melting away at the South pole, the consequence of which will be an awful catastrophe when the earth's center of gravity suddenly changes. The last man will then be drowned by the rush of waters. 3 The earth cannot always escape a collision with a comet, and when the disaster comes there will be a mingling of air and cometary gas, causing an explosion. If the last man is not suffocated he will be blown up. 4. There is a retarding medium in space, causing a gradual loss of velocity in the planets, and the earth, obeying the law of gravitation, will get closer and closer to the sun. The last man will be sunstruck. 5. The amount of water on the earth is slowly diminishing, and simultaneously the air is losing in quantity and quality. Finally the earth will become an arid waste, like the moon. The last man will be suffocated. 6. Other suns have disappeared and ours must sooner or later blaze up and disappear. The intense heat of the conflagration will kill every living thing on the earth. The last man will be burned up. 7. The sun's fire will gradually burn out, and the temperature will cool. The earth's glacial zones will enlarge, driving our race to the equator, until the habitable space will lessen to nothing. The last man will be frozen to death. 8. A gradual cooling of the earth will produce enormous fissures, like those seen in the moon. The surface will become extremely unstable, until the remnant of humanity will take refuge in caves. The last man will be crushed in his subterranean retreat. 9. The earth will at last separate into small fragments, leaving the people without any foothold. The last man will have a dreadful fall through space. 10. The tenth theory, proving that there will be no last man at all, is thus expressed: "Evolution does not necessarily imply progress, and possibly the race may have retrograded until the human being possesses the nature of the plant louse; such being the case, this single inhabitant will spontaneously produce posterity of both sexes."

Destructive Fire in Wisconsin.

A prolonged drought in the neighborhood of Green Bay, Wis., culminated on Sunday in a destructive conflagration sweeping before it the thickly settled farming township of Eaton. For two weeks past the forest in the neighborhood of Woodruff's mills has been burning more or less seriously, ominously threatening the neighboring farming settlements. The creeping motion which the fire had as yet maintained was urged to almost lightning rapidity by a small hurricane which put in an appearance Saturday night, Aug. 4. Sunday morning brought no cessation of the fire. Most of the men in the township were off in camp on the prairies mashing hay, and their wives at home had to turn out and do duty in fighting the fire. Their utmost efforts availed nothing. They were baffled at every point, and again and again sought new places of safety with their children. In the township of Eaton only three houses were left standing, two families have lost their lives, and thirty families or more are destitute. Of a settlement of seventeen houses, in the neighborhood known as Benjamin's, not a single one remains. Not a fence is now standing in the township, and the affrighted cattle thus freed seek safe destruction in the neighboring woods, yet burning. Dead sheep, pigs and cows lie scattered everywhere. A drove of seventeen sheep was found huddled in a heap, all roasted. The ripening grain escaped serious injury. The fire extended for many miles in every direction, destroying millions of feet of lumber and thousands of dollars' worth of other property. The settlement of Polanders, twelve miles from Green Bay, also suffered severely. About thirty families were rendered homeless and lost their crops and everything else they possessed, and barely escaped with their lives, being compelled to force their way through a line of fire about two miles. They huddled together for protection in a tract of broken ground, many being severely burned in the face and in some cases partially losing their sight.

Eastern Items.

VIENNA, August 18.—The Politische Correspondenz has a Bucharest telegram saying: "General Gourko declares that the Russian positions from the Danube to Schipka Pass are so strong that the Turks will not venture an attack."

Both armies are constantly intrenching themselves. The Turks especially hold a wonderfully strong position at Plevna, but Osman Pasha is nevertheless in a difficult situation, because the numerous cavalry attached to the 80,000 Russians now covering him completely cut off his communications with Sophia, and capture his convoys of ammunition and provisions.

LONDON, August 19.—It is said the Russians intend to blockade Plevna, but will not attempt to take it by assault. Osman Pasha's supplies are beginning to fail.

LONDON, August 19.—On Saturday the Russians, numbering 25,000 infantry, ten regiments of cavalry, and 110 guns, attacked Mukhtar Pasha along the whole line, extending from Macarajikh to Yakinler. The cannonade began at 7 in the morning, and at 6 in the evening the Russians retreated in good order to their encampment, pursued by the Turks. The Turks lost 165 killed and wounded, and the Russians 1,200.

LONDON, August 20.—The Times' Calcutta correspondent telegraphs that the prospects for the Autumn crops may be regarded as hopeless in Southern India; most critical in Western, Central, and Northern India, and fairly good in Eastern India.

A recent writer from Jerusalem says: "The Jews here greatly outnumber all others, and their numbers are constantly increasing. The aged are returning here to die. Near the garden of Gethsemane are a vast number of newly made graves—many as yet not used. In the Jewish quarter of the city are found, perhaps, the saddest looking people on the face of the earth. Their countenances do not indicate a ray of joy or hope. Not all the Jews who come here are poor. Quite a town is springing up outside the north and west walls of the city; some wealthy Jews are building fine houses with gardens for themselves. One rich man from London has built houses for 160 families of poor Jews. A number of houses are nearly completed, built by a company."

Matthias.

"And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven apostles."—Acts i. 26.

Called out to fill a vacant place,
I hear the name of each apostate,
And for it, all, one lot is cast;

Called forth, the wanderer home to lead,
Called forth, the flock of Christ to feed,
To come on earth the heavenly seed!

O blessed lot, and yet I know,
Some might loathe his name we know
On whom God did this grace bestow.

We know not where for God he toiled,
What wo, distress, pain, he for Christ sought,
What burdens of Christ's love he taught.

Then never deem it gain or shame,
If none on us a line be thy name
Write in the book of worldly fame.

For God's chosen holy saint
We only see the outside paint
What legal love we to make complaint!

He who doth in secret see Approve our work, exalted have we
Of his life name or offering.

Grant only, Lord, that in thy sight
We walk as did men of the Light,
And 'neath thy banner bravely fight.

Conference Report.

Conference of Northwestern Arkansas met pursuant to adjournment, at 2 o'clock p. m. Preaching brethren present were—from Missouri: W. C. Herren, Josiah Pierce, of Arkansas; H. Robertson, George Kidwell, Thos. Malone, R. H. Sherrell.

On motion Brother Robertson was chosen moderator, and Brother John Jeffres secretary, and Brother Joseph Terhune, treasurer.

On motion of Brother Kidwell, Brother Robertson was chosen a delegate to the South-western Missouri conference.

On motion Brethren Scott, Jeffres, and Phillips, were appointed a committee to arrange the order of exercises during meeting.

On motion of Brother Kidwell, conference ordered the secretary to prepare credentials for each of the Evangelists present.

The following resolution was introduced by Brother Sherrell, and unanimously adopted:

Be it resolved by the annual conference of North-western Arkansas, representing the Church of God, That in order to promote the interest of the cause of the religion of Jesus Christ; it must in the purity of the church; to carefully guard against innovations of any and all kinds, and to sustain the unity of the faith, that we adhere to no other than the apostolic mode of induction into Christ, but by receiving members into the church of God upon a profession of faith in the gospel, and obedience to the same in baptism.

On motion, conference adjourned to meet at 8 o'clock a. m., August 5th.

Preaching Friday night by Brethren Pierce and Herron.

Saturday, 8 o'clock a. m., August 4, conference met pursuant to adjournment. Prayer by Brother Sherrell.

On motion of Brother Kidwell, Brother Sherrell was chosen traveling evangelist for the district of North-western Arkansas.

The following recommendation was offered, for the consideration of the brotherhood at large: "That we do most cordially invite the co-operation of the evangelical brotherhood of the unit faith, to spare no means or labor within their power in sounding out the gospel of the soon-coming Kingdom of the Blessed Messiah. We furthermore recommend to the brotherhood the importance of looking well to the actual necessities of the evangelists who are wholly devoting their time to the proclamation of the gospel, and that it is the indispensable duty of all who have named the name of Christ to contribute means to this end, as the Lord has blessed them."

The committee on arrangements reported the following as the order of the services of the day: Preaching at 11 o'clock by Brother Herron, followed by Brother Malone. At 4 o'clock by Brother Kidwell, followed by Brother Sherrell. At night by Brother Pierce, followed by Brother Herron.

On motion a committee was appointed to confer with Brother Sherrell with regard to the amount requisite to meet his actual necessities the ensuing year as district evangelist.

On motion conference adjourned to meet at 8 o'clock a. m., August 5th.

Conference met according to previous arrangement, at 8 o'clock. There being nothing of special importance before the conference, report of committee on arrangements was received. Conference soon after adjourned.

The committee's report on order of preaching on Lord's Day, August 5, was as follows: At 11 o'clock, preaching by Brother Sherrell, followed by Brother Kidwell. At 4 o'clock by Brother Robertson, followed by Brother Pierce. At night by Brother Malone, followed by Brother Herron. Brother Malone being absent, Brother Herron occupied the time.

Conference adjourned to meet at 4 o'clock p. m., on Monday, August 6.

Conference met as per adjournment. Secretary handed to each evangelist present credentials previously ordered.

Report of committee appointed to confer with Brother Sherrell being next in order was received and adopted. Said committee report that one hundred dollars will probably meet the actual demands or necessities of the district evangelist, and also recommend that an assessed valuation of property of each member be made, and that a tax of one-fourth of one per centum be levied for the purpose of raising the necessary amount, and that a report of assessed valuation of property be made to the next annual conference.

On motion it was ordered that the secretary prepare and forward a report of the proceedings of this conference to the RESTITUTION for publication.

Thus after a harmonious meeting of four days and nights, conference adjourned to meet at Shady Grove, Jefferson county, Arkansas, at 11 o'clock on Friday before the first Lord's Day in August, 1876.

A short time was spent by members of the conference in praying and rejoicing the hand, and congratulating each other upon the mercies of God, and the inestimable blessings we are daily receiving from his bountiful hand; and should we meet no more in conference capacity in this life, hoping that all, without the loss of one, should meet in the fair clime of the eternal day, there to behold the rapturous beauty of the workings of the great Jehovah, there richly enjoy the felicities of that kingdom where pain and sickness and death shall never enter, there to behold and be with Christ our Savior and Redeemer, the then King of earth, to then hold that communion with him that will be sweet, that will be everlasting, and that love that will ever flow from him who sits and reigns in power, during the eternal and unending ages of the age to come.

Editor Restitution:—It has been some time since I have written to you. I shall write you an article for the paper soon. I moved from Iowa the 11th of February, and located in Easton, Kansas, Labette county. Having lost my property in the manufacturing business I was obliged to go where I could get land cheap for a home. I have no services here, and am preaching about nearly. I am the only one here of our faith. I preached here over two weeks. I am having a meeting here.

Editor Restitution:—As I am all alone in this part of a promised earth, surrounded by those who are proclaiming "lo! here, and lo! there," having to deceive, if possible, the very elect, and as I have never had the privilege of hearing a gospel sermon by any of God's servants, and being for five years old, and being thoroughly convinced by the reading of my Bible and the RESTITUTION that it is fully time for me to make the inquiry, "What shall I do to be saved?" I know that I have learned this much—that it is my duty to be buried with Christ, my Savior, in baptism, and that it is essential to live a holy life, being governed by a principle of love toward all men.

But it is hard to live a godly life, surrounded as I am, with all manner of corruption, and ignorance of sinful men. I have given them tracts, and tried to persuade them to take the RESTITUTION and read it carefully; but they seem afraid.

But on my own part, as I feel that it is time for me to ask in regard to my own welfare, I will ask a favor of you: Can you tell me of any preacher of the church of God, in the vicinity of Toledo, Ohio? If not please let me know where I can find one, for I am anxious to join with God's family, hoping to receive strength to bear the burden of the cross. Please excuse my long letter, though I have not fully expressed my feelings from inability. I remain yours in hope of Christ's soon return.

Editor Restitution:—I am again anxious to let the friends and readers of the RESTITUTION hear from Oregon, and to let them know that a few of us on this coast are watching the signs of the times as to the fulfillment of prophecy, looking for the drying up of the River Euphrates that the way of the Kings of the East may be prepared, and for the soon coming of that same Jesus that the angels said should come, in the same way and manner, as when he left the disciples and went into that far country, to receive a Kingdom and return to bless the waiting bride who will have made herself ready by having on the wedding garment to go into the marriage supper.

But, as we see, very many who started out have fallen asleep during the tarrying time and have no oil in their lamps. They see the darkness that surrounds them on every hand, but do not discern this lack of oil in their lamps. Soon the Bridegroom will come, and they will cry "Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out going out." Dear friends of the company that started in the race according to the parables in order to teach and give the word the light of God's Word. How many there are who are crying "Peace in the way, when ye the cry"—exclusive of doctrine the entire salvation of mankind and Christ.

They preach themselves, and not Christ Jesus the Lord, and are Virtually, "Where is the promise of his coming?" "Why, he has already come and set up his kingdom; it is in our hearts, we feel it; he set it up in the days of the Cæsars, in the apostles age."

I have been a believer in the Abrahamic promises for a long time, and did not know, I fairly, how much that faith was deepened by the mean lies of the Christian church. I learned that there were no Scriptures to prove the main key to all the doctrines held by that church and its leaders of to-day. When I had learned this, I boldly told them that I could no longer stop in their ranks. I bade them farewell by telling them that I now professed faith in the Christ of this Dark Night Seer, but who will soon return in the Bridge of quick and dead to be the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords; and this when he comes he will reign on the throne of his father David, and that his kingdom will be an everlasting kingdom when all shall serve and obey him. Then, believing it to be my duty, I was immersed into the Christ of God upon the profession of that faith.

D. C. Pierce has been preaching at Carbon several days, I hear, and has over twenty members as the fruit of their labors and that place. He intends to go there in the spring. I have a load of lumber, and am getting about ready, I am the only one here of our faith. I preached here over two weeks. I am having a meeting here.

The cause is here, and with the people, and seems desirous of hearing about the coming Kingdom. Several have been added to the church, and others are expected to be added soon. Brethren, pray for us, that we may be found faithful in the day of the Lord. Pray that we may be found worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man. Pray for us that we may be found worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man.

The India Famine.

LONDON, August 14.—A Calcutta dispatch says that in portions of Madras and Mysore it is now clear the famine will rage with the usual fatality for at least six months longer. To afford increased facilities for carrying food the Madras government has directed the discontinuance on several passenger trains daily on railways. It may be said regarding the greater part of India that the situation is critical and great danger of almost universal famine exists.

LONDON, August 15.—The Times' Bellary (Presidency of Madras), correspondent, describing the awful effects of the famine in southern India, says: "The great bulk of people are now emaciated; their ribs are sticking out in painful prominence, and their skin covered with a dirty-looking desquamation of cuticle described in the Irish famine of 1846-47, by Dr. Donovan, as a peculiar familiar eruption. If we look at the thousands of people collected on the relief works, we find famine marks are of universal prevalence. The superintendent of relief operations in Adoni reports that the journey over one of the roads resembles the path of a great battle in the number of dead and dying. If the people had been smitten by a local outbreak of cholera in ordinary times, they would have fled from the works and never returned, but so severe is the pressure for food that none could afford to leave the works and lose their pay, even for a single day."

CALCUTTA, August 14.—At a public meeting held at Madras on the 9th instant to consider the steps necessary for securing help from England for the famine sufferers, the Duke of Buckingham, the governor of Madras Presidency, stated that the famine area contained 13,000,000 people, of which a large proportion were dependent for their daily food on the exertions and activity of those who transport grain to the country. The necessity for supplies is steadily increasing. The wants of Madras are already beyond the means of the presidency. Every effort that can be secured is need of to save the people. The increasing severity of the distress necessitates an appeal to the public charity.

Dr. Paralsk, Sanitary Commissioner, said that there were already 1,500,000 people being fed, and over 500,000 had died.

A resolution was adopted that the principal cities of England, Scotland, Ireland and India be informed of the urgent necessity for assistance. The mover of this resolution said that more people were found dead on a single morning in Madras than had died in the whole Bengal famine.

Were They Footsteps?

Bishop Tuigg, of Pittsburgh, whose bravery of the mob we have recorded, has stated to the Catholic Review, of this city, that he is told that not five per centum of the mob were Catholics. He does not say he believes what he is told. He does not believe it, or he would not have exposed his person and office to the violence and irreverence of the rioters. He was asked to speak because a large part of the rioters were Roman Catholics, and he appealed to them on that very ground. It is a pity for the Bishop to depreciate his own heroism in endeavoring to control a raging mob by the power of his religious character and office, in order to ameliorate a sect. The Pittsburgh Dispatch says: "The names of the killed and wounded, and a few of those since arrested, prove beyond the power of successful contradiction that both the conflagration, and a vast amount of the lawlessness and crime committed during those terrible days and nights were done by Roman Catholics and no others."

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF IOWA.

To the brethren and friends throughout Iowa, and elsewhere:—We would say that our annual conference will commence in Knoxville, Knox county, Iowa, on the 24th. We believe it to be for all interests that we meet together as much as possible, and we feel that we need a representation from Northern Illinois, Southern Missouri, and other localities in this section of the country. We would be glad to have a representative from each church in the vicinity of the Kingdom.

We have arranged with Brother H. V. Reed, of Princeville, Ill., to return and be with us on the meeting, commencing on Saturday evening, August 25th, and continue to Monday, August 27th. Brother Reed is a good speaker, and will present, we believe, the glorious truths of the coming Kingdom.

Brethren, it can not be expected to raise and to remain, unless prepared to enjoy the meeting. We must make some preparations, to cultivate friendship and brotherly love, and to be benefited in faith, hope and charity.

Light.

BY WILLIAM PITT PALMER.

[Pronounced by the most eminent critics in Europe to be one of the finest lyrics of the same length in our language.]

From the quickening womb of the primal morn
The sun rolled bleak and bare,
Till I wove him a vest from his Ethiop's rest
Of the threads of my golden hair;
And while in the East I spun out the firmament
Over all the airy host,
I purpled the lute on the midnight's lip
And enamelled it round the star.

I painted the flowers of Adam's bower,
And their leaves of living green,
And some were the dyes in the skiey eyes
Of Eden's virgin queen;
And when the first child on the threshold of life
Had fastened its mortal cell,
In the nursery sphere of Her life's dear fear
I wrought the lullaby earth I tell.

When the wave that bore over a world accursed
Closed o'er each wrath-laid couch,
As I wove my bow, the token and type
Of the Shepherd's smile on Heaven's tears
Were the only lights that lit the dismal deep
Of the covenant of Peace.

Like a pall to hide each wreck—a banner,
Amid the tempest's glory—
When Shepherd's smile on Heaven's tears
Were the only lights that lit the dismal deep
Of the covenant of Peace.

Yea, all over I show to be jolly and low,
Or be tied and wind I do send;
I am the light, whose very sphere toil in darkness and fear;
Evil may smite the best child of mortal;
Nay, the flower of the wood by my hand is enamored
As the rose in the garden of kings,
As the ripe ear for the scythe I appear,
And for the gray hair by wiles.

The desolate mom like a mourner forlorn,
Conveals all the pride of her charms,
Till I bid the bright hours clad in the night from her lover
And lead her roaring day to her arms!
And when the sun rose sinks low for his hour,
And sinks to her holy repose,
I wrap the soft veil for the weary-eyed West,
In twilight of amber and rose!

From my scathed sheep by the thistle-headed star,
I gaze with unclouding eyes,
When the eye come state of the Savior is bathed in mist the dark!
And crowned he with the thorn of His mortal woes,
His robe soiled by the hyena and wolves,
He comes—yea, yea, from the midnight Soul—
To life's dawn pure made by the rings.

I waken the forests in their sweet-pungent bowers,
The lions in their chambers of green,
And the stable and pasture now with herds again,
As they look at a radiant dawn,
And with the Lord's [illegible]
Through its [illegible] the whole,

The Antichrist.

The term Antichrist occurs only in the first and second letters of the Apostle John. Various applications of this word have obtained among students of the Bible. It is supposed that the right use of it would be ascertained and practised. As a contribution toward this desirable end, I beg to offer a few remarks to the readers of the Outlook, in hope that some attention may be given to the subject, and a correct judgment arrived at. A glance at the more prominent senses in which it is used, will help us to form a judgment in accordance with the Scripture teaching regarding it.

The most generally received application of Antichrist is that by which it is used to designate that form of professed Christianity which acknowledges the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome. Bishop Newton in his "Dissertations on the Prophecies" says: "The tyranny of power one described by Daniel and St. Paul, and afterward by St. John, are both by ancients and moderns generally denominated Antichrist; and the name is proper and expressive enough, as it may signify 'both the enemy of Christ,' and 'the vicar of Christ.'" He also says: "Such, doubtless, at this time, necessarily give great offense to the bigots and devotees of the Church of Rome; and no wonder, therefore, that in the last Lateran Council, the Pope gave strict commandment to all preachers that no man should presume once to speak of the coming of Antichrist. The King of France also, with the advice of his council, interdicted that anyone should call the Pope Antichrist."

Mr. E. B. Elliot, in his "Horæ Apocalyptiæ," speaking of Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Hippolytus, says: "They urged, with one consent that Daniel's fourth wild beast symbolized the Roman Empire; as also that the little horn of this wild beast, symbolized one and the same Anti-Christian power, as St. Paul's Man of Sin, and St. John's Antichrist."

With most Protestant writers in modern times, Antichrist is the most usual designation of the Papal system. This seems to have arisen from the circumstance that it is a convenient term, consisting of a single word, and is ably expressive of what they conceive to be the most salient feature of popery.

Another class of writers apply this term more especially to what they term "the Personal or Infidel Antichrist," to be manifested about seven years before the second advent of Christ. The Rev. Charles Maitland, in his "Apostolic School of Propectic Interpretation" (1849), advocates this view at considerable length. Burgh in 1832, Bickersteth and Birks in 1838, Darby in 1842, and Tregelles in 1846, had also maintained it in their published works. It seems also to have been held by some of the early fathers; quotations being given from Irenæus in the second, and Hippolytus and Origen in the third century, apparently to the same effect. Mr. M. Baxter in various tracts and pamphlets of late years, and more recently in the Second Advent Library, has ably advocated the same view. He says: "A leading event, in connection with our Savior's return, is the manifestation of Antichrist. The Man of Sin, as foretold in 2 Thess. ii. 3 (quoted also in 1 John ii. 18, 22 applied). From these and other passages, it has long been concluded, that although many Antichrists have risen, such as the Pope and Mahomet, yet there is a peculiar and individual Antichrist to arise, just before the second advent, who is generally called the Personal or Infidel Antichrist, and who is to be worshipped as God in the temple at Jerusalem, and is already to deny the existence of Jehovah and of Christ. His exploits are fully described in Dan. xi. and Rev. xvii., and also in the literal day fulfillment of Dan. vii., viii., xii., and Rev. ix., xi., xii., although the yearday fulfillment of these chapters relates to Papacy and Mohammedanism."

Mr. Baxter further enlarges upon the identity of Antichrist with the various names or persons mentioned in the scriptures quoted, thus:

"The proof of the fact that the Personal Antichrist is identical with our enemy, head of the beast, it is only necessary to ascertain the various passages in which he is described. The following are some of the distinct names given to him:—

1 John ii. 18, 22: The Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son.

2 Thess. ii. 3: The man of Sin, the son of perdition.

Dan. vii.: A little horn on (relation to the Gentiles).

Dan. viii.: A little horn, or King of fierce countenance.

Dan. xi. 36: The Prince that shall do [illegible].

Dan. xi. 36: A vile person, or King who shall do according to his own will (the willful King).

Rev. xiii. 3: The beast, or eighth head of the beast, or beast of; deadly wound was healed."

After speaking these passages in full, in parallel columns, Mr. Baxter says: "It is evident from the above passages that the Antichrist will be an avowed and hardened infidel, totally rejecting the Christian religion, and God, like the Pope, professing and doing it."

It will be seen that this view, as it is with the other which regards the Papal system as the Antichrist, disregards the personal rule of the future by the same title. I shall examine myself to the question as to the true application and use of the term Antichrist. This method will leave the other question precisely where it stands at present, with this advantage, however, that it will be freed from the complication entailed upon it from the term Antichrist being supposed to belong to it.

It is very evident, from the quotation from Mr. Baxter, that it is Antichrist's denial of the Father and the Son that forms the principal point of identity between the Antichrist and the future personal ruler. He says, Antichrist "is utterly to deny the existence of Jehovah and of Christ." This seems to me to be a most unwarranted use of the language of John, which is simply, "He is the Antichrist who denieth the Father and the Son." It never seemed to cross the mind of Mr. Baxter that there are other ways of denying persons besides "denying their existence." Peter denied Christ: but we never dream that he, therefore, denied the "existence" of his Master. Besides, we have in John's allusions to Antichrist, what amounts to a definition of the denial of the Father and Son, as well as a definition of the term Antichrist itself.

In the First Epistle (ii. 18-22), the Apostle says: "Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that (the) Antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists, whereby we know that it is the last time. They went out from us, but they were not of us: for if they had been of us they would no doubt have continued with us: but they went out that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us. . . . Who is a liar, but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ. He is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son. Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father."

Again, in Chap. iv. 1, he says: "Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the spirit of God: every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God: and this is that spirit of Antichrist, whereof you have heard, that it should come, and even now already is it in the world."

And once more in Second Epistle, verse 7: "Many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and (an) Antichrist. Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought, but that we receive the full reward. Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ hath not God: he that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, hath both the Father and the Son."

These three quotations contain all that is said about Antichrist by the Apostle John; and the first remark that seems to me is the entire absence of any intimation of his being a ruling power or person; and also of any future destruction of him by the coming of the Lord. Another observation is that the Antichrist had been foretold in the hearing of those to whom the apostle wrote his first letter, and that this prediction had been fulfilled. "Ye have heard that the Antichrist should come, even now, there are many antichrists, whereby we know that it is the last time." The word rendered "shall come," in the common version in ver. 18, is the same as that rendered "should come" in chap. iv. 3, and does not, therefore, point to a time subsequent to the date of the Epistle.

The definitions given of Antichrist by the Apostle are threefold in expression, but may in substance be considered as one.

First: "He is Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son." Second: "Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God; and this is that spirit of Antichrist." Third: "Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?"

I have already referred to the interpretation which makes denial of the Father and Son to be denial of their existence, as a proposition that cannot, with reason, be maintained. I would now refer to the apostle's explanation of this denial, so far as it relates to the Father. He says, "Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father," which he repeats in the second epistle, thus: "Whosoever . . . abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God." From this, it is evident that denial of the Father, by these heretics, was not direct but implied. That denial of the Son was direct, and the proof of this was a virtual, though not an express, denial of the Father. If Christ was denied in the relationship of Son, it must have been equivalent to a denial of God in the relationship of Father. But in neither case was it necessarily a denial of the existence of either the Father or the Son.

What then did denial of Christ consist in? "That Jesus Christ had come in the flesh." This is twice given by the apostle as the distinctive feature of Antichrist; and it is important to ascertain the exact sense in which the language is used. To my mind, the most obvious sense is the true one; namely, that Jesus Christ possessed a really human constitution and was not a mere phantom which, in some mysterious way assumed the human form. This natural sense of the words is strengthened by the manner in which the apostle introduces his first epistle: "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life. . . . That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you." The intervening verse which forms a parenthesis, shows plainly that it is Jesus Christ he is speaking of: "For the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us."

Now it is a historical fact that, at the time when John wrote his epistles, the reality of our Lord's humanity was denied by many who professed his name. These are known in history as Gnostics, from gnosis, signifying knowledge or science, to which they made great pretensions. One of their leading principles, derived from the Oriental philosophy, was, that matter was essentially evil. Dr. Edward Burton, late Regius professor of divinity at Oxford, says:

"We find the Gnostic theology full of ideas and terms which must have been taken from the gospel; and Jesus Christ, under some form or other of Æon, emanation, or incorporeal phantom, enters into all their systems, and is the means of communicating to them that knowledge which raised them above all other mortals, and entitled them to their peculiar name."

Again he says: "Many Gnostics adopted the Oriental notion of two independent coeternal principles, the one the author of good, the other of evil."

And again: "We have a key to many parts of their system when we know that they held matter to be intrinsically evil, of which, consequently, God could not be the author."

Again: The Gnostics "either denied that Christ had a real body at all, and held that he was an unsubstantial phantom; or, granting that there was a man called Jesus, the son of human parents, they believed that one of the Æons called Christ, quitted the pleroma, and descended upon Jesus at his baptism."

These quotations from Bampton Lectures quoted in Kitto's Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature may suffice to show us that in the apostle's time there existed a class of persons professing the name of Christ, who corresponded to his definition of Antichrist. I can see no reason for seeking to apply the apostle's language to any other person or power in subsequent times, such as is evidently intended by Paul's "man of sin," &c.

The other form of definition given by the apostle, 1 John ii. 22—"Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?" although not expressly predicated of the Antichrist by name, but of some one under the designation "liar," is evidently intended for the same class. It occurs in the middle of the paragraph where the antichrist is spoken of, and no good reason can be given for applying the term "liar" to any other. Besides, the definition itself is the natural outcome of the more express denial that "Jesus Christ had come in the flesh." The grand central truth of Christianity, that "Jesus is the Christ," was based on the fact that Jesus of Nazareth was a descendant of David, king of Israel. The Christ of the prophets was a personage who should occupy David's throne, and be at once David's son and David's Lord. Denial of the fact that Jesus had come in the flesh was equivalent to a denial that he was the Christ; for, according to the prophets, there could be no Christ except in the person of the "child born and the son given." The doctrine of those of whom the apostle writes was, therefore, in a peculiar respect, opposed to what constituted the very essence of Christian truth. We are informed that when "Philip went down to Samaria, he preached (the) Christ to them. This was a short but comprehensive summary of Gospel preaching; and it is easy to see that the Gnostic doctrine would be anti, or opposed to (the) Christ thus preached. It seems to me that this affords an adequate definition of the term Antichrist, as used by the apostle in the passages quoted.

There is a passage in Paul's first letter to Timothy which seems to me to refer to the same class of errorists, and which furnishes a corroboration of John's statements. "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so-called; which some professing have erred concerning the faith." 1 Tim. vi. 20, 21. The word here rendered "science," is gnosis, and that rendered "oppositions" is antithesis. This seems to point very clearly to the Gnostic pretensions to superior knowledge, and also to the anti or opposing influence which they exercised upon the central fact of the Christian faith. This is evident from the apostle's closing words—"which some professing have erred from the faith." This is in exact accordance with the apostle John's statements concerning the Antichrist, which relate exclusively to "erring from the faith," and have no reference to the usurpation of authority, as in the case of "the man of sin" in the writings of Paul.

There can be little doubt that John wrote his gospel in view of the same class of persons as those termed Antichrist in his letters. He declares the purpose he had in view in writing his gospel, "that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and that believing ye might have life through his name." In the beginning of his treatise he intimates that "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." And he relates a circumstance not mentioned by the other evangelists, which afforded a clear demonstration that, not only in the days of his flesh, but after his resurrection, he possessed a substantial bodily organization. I refer to the scene with Thomas the apostle, who was not satisfied with the testimony of his fellow apostles to the fact of our Lord's resurrection. Thomas declared, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side I will not believe." Eight days after this, in the next interview between our Lord and his apostles, Thomas being present, Jesus said to Thomas, "Reach hither thy finger and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless, but believing." Again, John is the only evangelist who mentions that "one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water." And it is worthy of note that he makes special mention of his reason for recording this fact—"And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true: and he knoweth that he saith true that ye might believe." The believing produced by the fact recorded, must have primarily consisted in the belief of the reality of the death of Jesus, for the water showed that the pericardium, or sac in which the heart is enclosed, in which a clear fluid like water is contained, had been pierced, and that consequently the spear had reached the substance of the heart itself. But the reality of the person of Jesus was also demonstrated, and as this was the fact especially called in question at the time the gospel was written, it must have been for the correction of this fatal error that the fact was so particularly recorded.

I may mention that the apostle John seems to make allusion to the fact referred to, in his first epistle v. 6, but I shall not dwell on it further than to say that it strengthens the probability that John wrote his gospel chiefly to maintain the reality of the person of our Lord against the Gnostics.

This denial by Antichrist that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh was, as has been already stated, a most effectual means of subverting the grand central doctrine of the gospel—namely: that "Jesus is the Christ." And while this central element of the one faith was subverted by other means, the Gnostics must have largely contributed to that general apostasy which soon spread over the professing church. The various creeds of Christendom, even the earliest, known as the apostles' creed, (but which all agree is not quite so ancient), agree in ignoring that definite form of this central truth as stated by John, both in his gospel and epistles. The formula of the apostle is reduced from a proposition—containing subject and predicate—to a mere name and surname. "I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, his only Son our Lord." Here the Christship, or that official dignity which belongs to our Lord, in virtue of the covenant with David, and which forms so prominent a portion of the prophetic word, is entirely lost sight of. And this even, although the reality of his person is distinctly maintained, in the clauses declaring his birth, sufferings, death, resurrection, ascension, and coming again. And we know how common is the belief that Jesus was a real person, throughout Christendom, but how few apprehend the true force and meaning of the truth that Jesus of Nazareth, who suffered and died as a sacrifice for the sins of the world, is that anointed King whom God has destined to be, not only the ruler of his people Israel, but the monarch of the whole earth.

From what has been advanced I submit that a mistake has been made in applying the term Antichrist to the man of sin or beast, or the wilful king, or Gog, as Mr. Baxter and many others have done. As I have said, the question of a personal antagonist to the Messiah in the future, or the development of an apostasy in the papal hierarchy is left exactly where it was. Mr. Baxter seems to hold that both of these are to be understood, and I do not now give any opinion on that matter. But it must tend to simplify the question, if one of the elements, hitherto so deeply entering into it, be withdrawn. Perhaps I am too sanguine in expecting such a result; but I shall be glad to consider any suggestions on the subject.—J. Cameron, in Rainbow.

Figures Versus Science.

In a late issue of the Gazette we find an array of figures from so-called scientific writers, designed no doubt by these astute calculators, as a thrust at the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. They claim that the surface of the earth has been dug over 128 times to bury its dead. If this assertion be true, of course there could not be standing room for the sleeping millions of the dead in case of a general resurrection. How does the writer of the article above referred to know that the quadrillions (60,527,843,257,076,250) he names express the number of persons who have lived since the beginning? Oh! scientific writers assert it. There are some who, if you only label it "science," will swallow a chestnut burr and call it a cherry. There are, according to the most careful estimate, about 1,260,000,000 of human beings on the globe to-day. We will suppose the race started with this number, instead of a single pair, as the Bible asserts, and that a generation has passed away, according to the present short-lived standard, every 33 years, how many human beings will this calculation give us to the present time? Make what concessions we will to the pretensions of geology it cannot be claimed that any traces of human beings are found further back than 6,000 years. Three generations to every 100 years would give us 180 generations of 1,300,000,000 each, amounting to 234,000,000,000 of human beings to the present time. This is certainly a very liberal estimate, much more than the reality demands; but for the sake of satisfying the most extravagant demands, we are willing to go upon this basis. Now, how much territory would it take to give this number decent burial—a space 2 feet by 6, or 12 square feet? We find, on a careful estimate, it will take just 100,723 square miles. The single State of Colorado contains 104,500 square miles. Therefore, there is room in Colorado alone for every human being that has ever lived on the earth, to find a grave, and several thousand square miles to spare. These are plain facts, which any schoolboy can figure out for himself. Then how inconceivably absurd and ridiculous is the statement that "our earth is one vast cemetery," having been dug over 128 times to bury its dead! Let the intelligent readers of the Gazette lay up these facts in their memories, and with them smite the puffy face of science, so-called, when it puts forth its absurd claims to cloud the record of Moses or the glorious doctrine of the resurrection.—E. O. Hammond.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints associated with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Analysis of Prophecy.

The symbolry of the eighth chapter of Daniel, and the prophetic chain of the eleventh are in perfect accord in reference to the three great kingdoms that shall succeed Babylon. Commencing with the Medes and Persians this chain of events is in accord with the leading events represented by the symbols in the second and seventh chapters. The three paragraphs below the head represent the three kingdoms succeeding Babylon. The two less represent the two divisions of the Roman empire. The ram, the goat, and the notable horn which passed through the Macedon horn of the goat, represented the same three kingdoms which succeeded Babylon. Commencing with Media and Persia, and climaxing with great and powerful Rome, Gabriel has given us the gradations of these three empires, as attested by all testimonies. Thus, the ram, Medo-Persia, "great;" the goat, Grecia, "very great;" and the fifth horn, the Romans who plucked up the four horns representing the four divisions of the Grecian Empire, "exceeding great." Every historian will recognize at once the gradations of these three great empires. The position of some, that the fifth horn which appeared through the Macedon horn (the Roman legions who passed through Macedon, subverting it and the other divisions of the Grecian Empire, which were superseded by Rome,) before which the other three were plucked up, was Antiochus, is lame and ridiculous. What—Medo-Persia "great," Greece "very great," and about one-fourth of Greece ruled by Antiochus "exceeding great!" The eleventh chapter of Daniel, though almost exclusively literal history given in advance, harmonizes with the foregoing symbols and applications of them, both in character and their ordained relation to one another.

Thus, dividing this remarkable prophecy into four great paragraphs and two minor ones, I would observe that from the first to the fifth verses of this chapter, we have a terse history of Medo-Persia; and from the fifth to the fourteenth, we find a compendium of the most memorable events in Grecian history. From the fourteenth verse (exclusive of the fifteenth verse) to the twenty-sixth verse, we find a history of the Romans.

I will now note a few minor points in this prophetic history of Greece and Rome.

After this angelic expositor had foretold the rise and fall of Alexander, and the division of his empire into four parts, toward the four quarters of heaven, he then drops two of these kingdoms, and confines his narrative to only two of these kingdoms, which he denominates the kingdom of the south and the kingdom of the north. See verse fifth. Why this? We must permit Gabriel to explain himself. We may find a cogent reason by referring to the ulterior design of this whole prophecy. It was not to note all the memorable events in the world's history, but only such as should sustain an important relation to Daniel's people and their Holy Land. Thus he said to Daniel: "Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days; for yet the vision is for many days." Dan. x. 14.

So interwoven was the history of Egypt south, and Syria north, with the history of Israel geographically and politically, that the history of the central kingdom could not well be given without giving the history of the kingdoms on either side. The same political and geographical reasons hold good to-day, and the two kingdoms north and south of the central power, which in the latter days control that land, should be called the kingdom of the north and the kingdom of the south. Will the reader please remember this divine reason for calling the kings whose kingdoms were located north and south of the land belonging to Daniel's people, the king of the north and the king of the south. This reason will hold just as good in the latter days, when two kings north and south of the king who controls that land, shall act a grand part in the removal of this central power out of the way, that Daniel's people may return to their own land. At the fourteenth verse a third party is introduced, called the robbers of Daniel's people. According to the analogy of this literal history with the symbolic history of the power which, from a small beginning, should uproot these dominant kingdoms of the Grecian empire, was the Romans. This position is established or confirmed by all the inspired and profane historians who have spoken or written on these events. Thus, the Romans stood up in the southern division of the Grecian empire as the connecting link to confirm this whole vision. Passing, for brevity's sake, the conquest of the holy land by the king of the north, the brilliant conquest of Julius Cæsar and his relations to Egypt and its desolate queen, we will note the tragic end of this mighty prince. Returning to the stronghold of his own land, the city of Rome, he was elected dictator or defacto emperor of the Roman empire; and having been assassinated in the senate chamber, (in the terse language of the angel) he "stumbled, fell, and was not found." According to the next verse, the raiser of taxes stood up in his place. Verse 20. This was Octavius, the nephew of Julius Cæsar. He was emphatically the raiser of taxes, for he taxed all the world. Luke ii. 1. According to the next verse a vile person was to stand up in the place of Augustus Cæsar, but unlike his illustrious predecessor, he was to come to his end by violence; "yea also the Prince of the covenant"—Jesus Christ, the great Prince of all the covenants, was to come to his end by violence also. All these points culminated in Tiberius Cæsar, and his death by violence by the same power which put the Son of God to death, viz.: the Roman power.

One word in reference to the Prince of the covenant. A prince is the son of a king. The royalty belonged to Judah, and not Levi, from whom the priests of Israel were taken. All the covenants relating to the prince and king of the Jews culminated in the head of God's Anointed "Prince of the kings of the earth." All the other points being historical need only be stated to be appreciated by the intelligent historian. At the twenty-fourth verse we find a prophetic period measuring the supremacy of Rome, as an unit empire, having but one stronghold. "He—the imperial head of Rome—shall fulfill his duties, or will, in (not against) the stronghold (the city of Rome) even for a time." A symbolic time, according to God's calendar would be the round period of 360 years. Add 360 years to B. C. 30 when the battle of Actium was fought between Octavius Cæsar Mark Anthony, and Cleopatra, which decided the fate of Egypt, and marked the universality of Rome, and it brings us down to A. D. 330, when Constantine the Great, transferred the seat of the empire from Rome to Constantinople. Reference is made to the termination of this prophetic period at the twenty-ninth verse. The angel says: "At the time appointed he shall return and come toward the south; but it shall not be as the former (when the Roman legions went south to conquer, and bring under the Roman yoke, the kingdom of Egypt headed by Mark Anthony and Cleopatra,) or as the latter (when he (the imperial head of Rome) went south to destroy the Jewish nation and scatter them to the four quarters of the earth;) but he will go south for a very different purpose, viz., to transfer his seat of empire from Rome to Constantinople, which eventuated in the division of the fourth kingdom of earth into two nearly equal parts, as symbolized by the two legs of the metallic image. One great mistake which some able expositors of this grand outline of the world's modern history have made, is to give two prophetic histories of the western division of the Roman empire, and no history of the eastern empire; thus presenting the anomaly of a man with only one leg, and standing erect, too, at that. No Roman historian has ever attempted the surgical operation of amputating one leg of that perfect image of a man. Having traced the history of the western division of the Roman empire down to the time of the end, noting the rise and fall of great Anti-Christ, the persecution of the church of God, &c., Gabriel goes back and takes up the history of the eastern division of the Roman empire, and traces it down to the time of the end, marking the rise of a great politico-ecclesiastical hierarchy and the enthronement, in Constantinople, of the founder of the mighty Ottoman empire, which should control for centuries the land of Canaan. He also noted the event which should mark the time of the end, viz., the pushing of the king of the south. He also noted an event that shall mark the end, viz., the standing up of Michael to deliver Daniel's people. The signs of the times clearly indicate that Michael is now standing up in the councils and cabinets of the kings and rulers of the world, as well as in the thunders and earthquakes of war, thus preparing the way for the deliverance of Daniel's people. The power that has controlled their sacred Palestine so many centuries is in its death throes. The epoch which marked the infliction of the deadly wound upon the infidel head of the power which controls that glorious holy land, will also witness the time of the end, which shall usher in the latter days. The same reason holds good to-day, why the two kings south and north of the power holding and controlling the land belonging to Daniel's people, should be called the king of the south and the king of the north. These two kingdoms north and south of the central kingdom controlling that land are Egypt and Russia.

According to some very able expositors, the hour, the day, the month, and the year, during which the four angels, which had been chained by the great river Euphrates, were unrestrained, received its exact fulfillment in 1840, when the Sultan of Turkey signed, sealed, and passed into the hands of the Christian powers in Europe the supremacy of his empire, since which, what was once the magnificent Ottoman empire, has been dying up; or, in the significant language of Lamartine, Turkey has been dying for want of Turks. Reckoning symbolic time, the hour, day, month and year, commencing with the consolidation of a united army under the leadership of Othman, A. D. 1440 would bring us down to A. D. 1840, at which time the mighty Ottoman empire did cease to be an independent power among the great powers of earth. Since A. D. 1840, Turkey has only been a nominal power, existing by the suffrage of the great powers of Europe. The infliction of the deadly blow that nailed this power to the wall, was in fulfillment of the prediction of Gabriel, that "at the time of the end shall the king of the south push at him." That central power is passive between the kings south and north, at whom both push. A. D. 1833, the Pasha of Egypt, or the king of the south, commenced pushing at him, and continued to push until he was brought to the verge of ruin, and he was forced to appeal to the great balancing powers of the world's alliance to arrest the victorious march of the Egyptian armies, and restore his captured fleet and conquered domain. Thus, the angel Gabriel foretold the event that should mark the time of the end, and the beginning of that ring which shall encircle the latter days; and within which shall culminate all the rays of prophetic light, that the generation living in these grand and awful times, may see clearly to read their latitude and longitude, amid the gathering darkness which shall blind the vision of all who shall close their eyes against the sure word of prophecy—that circle within Gospel. On the human side it is faith which was clung all the chronological and events, whose design was, not to reveal the definite time of Christ's coming, but the providential events that the wise may understand the times and seasons in which they are living—that they may keep their armor bright, and be upon their watch-tower, waiting, watching, praying, come Lord Jesus and come quickly. Having inspired an expectation that the coming of Christ is near, chronology and prophetic events will have accomplished all they were designed to accomplish. Time setters fulfill one class of prophecies—that is "my Lord delayeth his coming." Time must be set and pass before there can be delay.

In my next I shall endeavor to show that Dan. vi. 45, and Ezek. xxxvii, and xxxix. chapters, relate to the same general events.

The Gifts and Promises of God.

It is most remarkable that all of those gracious provisions of salvation unfolded to us in the plans and purposes of heaven, are presented under the precious and endearing words of gift and promise. This idea is so very prominent in the word of truth that some have forgotten the sacredness of works and rely alone upon faith. This is the opposite swing to the pendulum of truth. We generally find the truth between extremes. We go too far when under excitement, not far enough when cold.

Gods gifts and promises are based upon eternal principles of love and loyalty, and will not flow out to those who turn away from the paths of truth and goodness.

What can be more holy and pure than a gift? It is written among the purest and most noble principles of nature. Hospitality, friendship and love, are shining its companions, and before its holy altar the emblems of hope and trust stand leaning upon the arm of God.

Kings have made their gifts when their kingdoms were trembling in the balance of destiny. Heroes have ruled armies by gifts, and beautiful maidens have held the stern hearts of men by tokens of love. Gifts have powers which control the humble and great, the poor and the rich. It is not the thing given, but the heart which prompted it, which holds the key and unlocks to us the secret of affection. The same applies to promises. Men rely upon the words of men. They trust to promises, and await the fruition with hope. Promises are dependent upon the ability of him who makes them. Men's confidence is gauged by this. When, therefore, God makes a promise, it becomes an immutable basis of hope and faith. It comes not from man, it is not dependent on man, and will be fulfilled in spite of man. The gifts and promises of God, therefore, become to us the basis of our consolation and the ground work of our destiny.

If we were to take from the holy Scriptures its gifts and promises, we should take away the power and influence of Christianity. Some would make religion a matter of mere history and not rest our faith upon what has been. This would meet the demands of the yesterday, and give joy in the to-day, but the to-morrow would be a cloudy landscape, over which no sun of hope would ever shine. God's gifts and promises reach beyond the now and shine in their full-orbed brightness in the eternal then.

If God were to express his love to us in its dearest form, how could it be done better than in the gift of his Son? "He so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son!" What a consummation of love! What a sacrifice for the lost! But this gift was first a promise, recorded in the prophets of the age before. Men are dying, graves are being dug every hour, and the dear ones of earth are rapidly falling into the chambers of death. In view of this, how sweet is the promise of life. This is the promise which he hath promised us, even eternal life. But this is made still more sacred because it stands recorded as a gift of God through him who is the way, the truth and the life. How unspeakable is this gift. No grave can bound it on the other side. It takes in that forever which flows out from the great white throne. Before us there arises a kingdom of this promised and will be given. Indeed all things eternal are written among the gifts and promises of the word of prophecy—land circle within Gospel. On the human side it is faith and works; on God's side it is gift and promise. On the human side it is trust, and on the divine side power and will. Here then we can rest and await the final triumph. Ages may sweep by, but the promises will remain sure and will come true, for the gifts and callings of God are without repentance.

The Key to the Labor Problem.

Are workingmen, as a class, frugal and provident? Do they curb self-gratification, and make present sacrifice for future advantage? How many mechanics and day-laborers calculate their annual waste of means on such unnecessary articles as tea, coffee, tobacco, beer, whisky, etc.? How many, instead of selecting plain wholesome cheap food, spend their extra dollar on pastry, rare fruits and vegetables, etc.? The business done in this line by the grocers and bakers of the lower wards of New York will answer this. I have eaten at the tables of rich and poor in many states, and my experience teaches me that, as a rule, the well-to-do mechanic lives better than many merchants, bankers and professional men, as long as his wages hold out. The same prodigality is manifested in dress and ornament. They will make any sacrifice to ape with the rich or vie with each other. Servant girls often dress better than their mistresses. Who will calculate the dollars wasted by that mechanic's family, before sickness or accident drove him to the poor house? How much did he throw away on rent, that he might live in a better house than he was well able to afford? How many dollars were spent on theaters, balls, socibles, fairs, or excursions, that might have been saved? How much did superstition extort from him? These are few of the many avenues through which his hard-earned wages escaped. Add to this the physician's bills, for attending to himself and family when over work and uncleanness brought on sickness; and last, though not least, consider the number of mouths he is himself the cause of having to fill, and the number of backs to clothe. If his income had overbalanced this expenditure, when the crisis arrived he would have been safe. With how many of our present paupers and tramps is this the case? Are the careful to be forced to bear the load of the careless? Self-restraint is more important to the poor man than legislation. This will give him a fitness for the battle of life, while that but unmans and effeminates him.—Popular Science Monthly.

Nebuchadnezzar's Hunting Diary.

Among the discoveries made by Col. Rawlinson in the excavations of Babylon was Nebuchadnezzar's hunting diary, with notes, and here and there a portrait of his dogs sketched by himself, with his name under it. He mentions in it his having been ill; and while he was delirious he thought he had been out to graze with the beasts of the field. Is this not a wonderful corroboration of Scripture? Rawlinson also found a pot of preserves in an excellent state, and gave some to Queen Victoria to taste. How little Nebuchadnezzar's cook dreamed when making them that twenty-five centuries after the Queen of England would eat some of the identical preserves that figured at his master's table.

John Taylor Innes has an article in the Popular Science Monthly on the trial of Jesus Christ before Pontius Pilate. He subjects it to a searching analysis in the light of what is known of Hebrew and Roman criminal jurisprudence, and concludes that the proceedings were irregular and illegal from beginning to end.

A blue pigeon with red legs lighted on a steam tug on July 29, about eight miles from Scalham harbor, England, Attatched to its leg was a piece of paper signed "William Stoker, Quebec. Sent up at 12:15 o'clock." The bird appeared to be very tired and hungry, and is supposed to have crossed the Atlantic.

Archbites.

The engineers of Marseilles have, it is said, discovered that since the opening of the Suez canal the level of the Mediterranean has sunk three and one-fourth inches.

In Sumatra, the expedition of the Dutch Geographical Society has discovered a mountainous region of great fertility and beauty, peopled only by a few wretched Malays.

Forty Scottish kings, two Irish kings, one French king, two Irish princes of the Norwegian race, besides innumerable chieftains and ecclesiastics are said to have been buried in Iona, Scotland.

The ruins of an ancient Babylonian city have just been discovered by M. DeSarzec, the French Consul at Bosrah. In the course of his excavations he found several slabs and bronze figures. The ruins are not far from the River Hai.

Dean Milman, in his "Annals of St. Paul's Cathedral," says: "The archives of St. Paul's still contain copies of indulgences issued from the year 1261 to 1387. They extend to almost every diocese in England and Wales, commencing with Bangor, &c., Ireland answered freely to the appeal. Seven dioceses appear, Emly and Leighlin twice."

The Grand Sheriff of Morocco, Abdes-Solam-el-Ouazain, has left Paris for London. As a lineal descendant of the Prophet he wears the green turban. His wife, whom he married several years ago, was a governess in the family of Sir Drummond Hay, the British Envoy at Tangiers. He surprised and angered his co-religionists by marrying a Christian, especially as he refused to take any other wives or odalisques. For a time he was disgraced by his cousin, the Emperor of Morocco, but afterward recovered his position.

Political societies are now springing up in all parts of Greece to stir up the country to a war against the Porte. At Thebes a "holy band" has been formed out of physicians, students, and the richest of the citizens, and a second "holy band" of students is assembling at Athens. Two important societies, that of "national defence" and that of "brotherhood," have decided to unite their efforts for the national cause; they possess considerable funds, and upwards of 32,000 rifles, with the necessary ammunition. These arms are to be sent to the Greeks in Turkey, who have already been provided with several thousand of rifles by these societies.

A circular to the Israelites of the world has gone forth from Amsterdam, signed by representatives and dignitaries of the Jewish communities of the Holy Land, imploring speedy and generous aid. They say that famine and suffering prevail in Jerusalem, Hebron, Safet, and Tiberias, caused by the drouth and the Turkish war. All industries are prostrated, and the withdrawal of the regular troops has exposed the defenceless populace to the inroads of Arabian robbers. In addition to this, the Jews experience the further misfortune that the war has also cut off the regular contributions of money which they have hitherto received from their co-religionists in Russia.

The Viscountess Strangford, who raised and distributed a large sum of money for the relief of the Bulgarian peasants last fall, is now establishing hospitals for the wounded in Turkey, and superintending the details of field relief. As Emily Beaufort, she attracted much attention in 1860 by publishing two volumes, giving the results of explorations made by herself and sister in Turkey, Egypt, and Syria. Two years later she married Viscount Strangford, one of the finest Oriental scholars in Europe, and for seven years she accompanied him in his studies and travels. At his death in 1869, she founded a college for the promotion of medical sciences in Damascus, and established a prize for geographical proficiency at Harrow, where her husband had been educated. When the story of the Bulgarian atrocities was exciting the sympathetic world, she collected the sum of $145,500, and, in person, purchased and distributed that amount of necessary articles. The National Association for providing trained nurses for the sick and poor of London owes its origin entirely to her efforts. She is about forty years old.

The Restitution.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, SEPT. 19, 1877.

MANUSCRIPTS have accumulated. Will give place to several as soon as possible.

REMEMBER the Indiana annual meeting appointed at Rensselaer, Jasper county, Indiana, on the last three days of the current month. See notice in another part of this paper.

SOME grave typographical errors escaped correction last week on account of the poor health of the editor and assistant proof-reader. We are trying to be very careful this week in this respect.

BRETHREN often send, requesting back numbers of the RESTITUTION of certain specified dates, to whom, in reply, we have to say, that we have no back numbers of the present year on hand to supply.

WE call special attention to the articles of Brethren Stephenson, Wilson and Weethee, in this number. Do not pass them on account of their length. We hope these talented correspondents and others of ability, who have been writing on prophecy, will not lay down their pens.

WE publish an appeal this week under the head, ALTAR OF SACRIFICE. It will be noticed in our relief receipts this week that several others have afforded help whose names are not in the list attached to this call for help. On our own part, we have canceled a claim of considerable amount aside from making no charge for editorial services for the present year, and would do more if we could spare the means and provide for ourselves at home. If brethren can not help in any other way, will they please to promptly renew their subscriptions as fast as they expire? No one will be a loser, even in this world, who helps forward the cause of our Redeemer, and those who sacrifice for God are objects of special remembrance. See Ps. l. 5; Heb. xiii. 15.

ON the question of temperance, which so agitates the public mind at present, there is quite a diversity of opinion among our brethren. Some think it not incompatible with the spirit and genius of the gospel to act in concert with all classes of persons in endeavoring to eradicate an intolerable evil. Others, however, think that, while Christians should withstand intemperance, as well as every other form of iniquity, they should exert their influence against intemperance and the liquor traffic solely as members of the church of Christ, and leave the world free to act in any work of moral and social reform as it may think best. For ourself we have always acted with the church alone. We regard temperance as one of the cardinal virtues, and have lectured a very few times upon it; but in doing this we have addressed the public as an individual, and not as a member of any organization, or in behalf of any organization outside of the church. Our counsel to our brethren would be, to do nothing calculated to wound feelings, or cause divisions in these last perilous times. We can speak and act decidedly in our church capacity, but while doing this, let us not oppose anything that others may do, in their own way, to, in any degree, suppress a monster evil. Do nothing rashly, and see that ye fall not out by the way.

From the latest news the tide of defeat seems to have set in quite strongly against the Muscovite, and the Russian armies may possibly be compelled to withdraw all their advances to the line of the Danube. The Eastern question, grave as it is, may not very long remain paramount to all others. The Pope is near his end, and a successor will undoubtedly be elected who will strenuously endeavor to regain the lost temporal power. To accomplish this design, some alliance and theater of action are indispensable. The clerical party are active in France, and some political change seems imminent in that country. It is very possible that France and Germany may be antagonized once more, and that the whole power of the Papacy may combine with France, not only for the overthrow of German supremacy, and the subjection of Protestantism, but for the enthronement of the Pope once more in the seven-hilled city. Heavy clouds are gathering over Europe, and they will hardly clear away without destructive tempests. Great events may burst upon the world before 1877 shall be numbered with the years gone by. The Roman question is soon likely to be as significant as the much talked of Eastern question.

Exegetical.

The Hebrew word נָפַשׁ, yah nah, and the Greek word ἀποκρίνομαι, apokrinomai are usually translated, according to their primary meaning, into English by the equivalent term answer in some one of its correspondent forms. Another secondary signification, to begin to speak, is a definition that eminent critics give these terms, inasmuch as in Hebrew, Greek, and English, the terms are often employed when no interlocution between different parties is rehearsed. On the employment of the Greek term, ἀποκρίνομαι, we give the following criticism, showing that the idea of response is always tacitly implied. It is an exegete on John ii. 18, where the Jews address our Lord after he drove the buyers and sellers from the temple. "ἀποκρίνομαι, apokrinomai, is never used in the N. T., except where the words are occasioned by, or dependent on, something that precedes. Hence arises this more general idea, viz.: of words occasioned by something with or without a question, or by an act or event of any kind. In Matt. xi. 25-30, it is his sad experiences of the unbelief of the people, (see from verse 11 to 24), that give occasion to the Redeemer, not for complaint, but for thanks to God, that his teachings were hidden from the wise and prudent of this world. The declaration of Jesus, John v. 17, 'But Jesus answered them: my Father worketh hitherto, and I work,' has its particular occasion assigned in verse 16. In the passage before us, John ii. 18, this is the connection: The violent act of Jesus, (see verse 15,) could not be suffered to pass unnoticed, by the Jews (the officers of the temple, the chief of the people); and by this occasion they were moved to (ἐπερώτησαν,) answer and ask him," for his authority. Their response was to Jesus' action.

In Deut. xxi. 7, the meaning is not "they shall speak and say;" for they are called upon to answer the imputation of blood-guiltiness tacitly charged against them, to which they thus, with ceremonial solemnity, respond. The phrase "Job spake and said," (chapter iii. 1,) is rendered in the Revised Version "Job answered and said."

Multiplied queries must have passed through the minds of Job's three friends during the seven days and seven nights of unbroken silence and grief which passed and "none spoke a word." Job's first response to all these mental questions is to "curse his day." In this fearful malediction of his natal day there is one idea of sublime dreadfulness, that is lost sight of in the authorized version, which the revised version has preserved. There are two Hebrew words of the same radix letters, that, notwithstanding this similarity, have very different meanings. The word גָּאַל, gaal, signifies to stain or pollute. The common version taking this meaning render: "Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it." Gesenius draws his interpretation from the other word, which means to redeem, or reclaim, and renders—"let darkness and death-shade redeem it for themselves, i. e., recover it, again take possession of it." Job contemplates the horrors of that original gloom, before God said "Let there be light," and implores the blackness and death-gloom of ancient night to take back his birth day. He does not merely wish it stained with a shadow, but would have it lost irrevocably in the very blackness of original darkness. Our translators' idea is tame and vapid compared with the sublimely frightful imagery of the original.—EDITOR.

Sententious Paragraphs.

I hold him to be dead in whom shame is dead.—Plautus.

Grief subdues and makes silent, but vexation is noisy and boisterous.

Whatever be your outward lot in life, your condition is truly pitiable if you are guilty of neglecting moments.

"Have you a heart of calm repose
Amid the world's loud roar?
A life that like a river flows
Along a peaceful shore?"

The talkative listen to no use, for they are ever speaking. And the first evil that attends those who know not how to keep silent is that they hear nothing.

Holiness consists not in the rushing of intense resolve, which, like Kishon sweeps everything before it and then subsides, but in the constant flow of Siloam's waters, which perpetually make glad the city of our God.

SEEDS.

"A wonderful thing is a seed—
The one thing deathless forever!
The one thing changeless—utterly true—
Forever old and forever new,
And lucky and faithless never.

"Plant blessings, and blessings will bloom;
Plant hate, and hate will grow;
You can not sow to-day—to-morrow shall bring
The harvest that proves what sort of a thing
To the seed, the seed that you sow."

Correspondence.

G. M. MYERS TO J. M. HENRY—SECOND LETTER.

Brother Henry:—Your letter has been received, and in reply I must say that it is not altogether satisfactory.

You repeat that "immortality is predicated of the body," and then state under answer to the third question, that you know of no text in the Bible where it is predicated of the entire man. To elucidate this point, let us raise the question, What is man? In answer to this question, Webster (Ed. 1861, pp. 71 and 688) says primarily "man" signifies form, image, suitable form. Of his composition Moses says God formed him out of the dust of the ground. Gen. ii. 7. God says that he is flesh. Gen. vi. 3. Therefore, according to these authorities, we have man complete without spirit, life, thought, or consciousness. Further, Moses says (Gen. ii. 7,) that God breathed into his (man's) nostrils the breath of life and he became a living soul. Now let me suggest to you the thought, which I think you will hardly deny, that the breath of life here put into Adam was no part of him as a man, but was simply the power caused to move upon the organism which produced life in all its manifestations. Thought was not in the man independent of the power, (the breath of life), nor was it in the power independent of the organism. But thought was the result produced by the power moving upon the organism. Next, with this power withdrawn, we have death, according to your definition, a separation of the breath of life and the organism, and following as a result a total extinction of consciousness in man. See Job xxxiv. 14; Psa. cxlvi. 4, 5. Therefore the immortality for which man is to seek, spoken of in the Bible, is predicated of all that the Bible knows of man. The Bible talks of the mortal man now, the immortal at the resurrection: the natural now, the spiritual then.

You say the Scriptures teach death to be a separation. I ask, a separation of what? Is it a separation of the body and the breath of life? If so, then are not all the functions, arising out of their union broken up? Or will you claim that life, thought, reason and consciousness belong to the breath of life independent of its union with the body? If such be your idea, then pre-conscious existence necessarily follows. Further, if separation be a correct definition of death, what is its effect upon a dying soul? "The soul that sins, it shall die."

You fail to tell me where in connection with the facts or commands contained in the gospel or Jesus disembodied consciousness is taught.

I repeat, I believe the gospel of Jesus, and still disbelieve in disembodied consciousness. Can you say as much of the gospel and maintain your position? Are you standing upon holy or safe ground? According to 1 Cor. xv, 1-4, the favorite text of the Disciple church, it is there taught that Christ died, which I believe, while you and the Orthodox world disbelieve it, and say it was only the body that died. It is there taught that Christ was buried; this I believe, while you and the Orthodox world disbelieve it, and say that only his body was buried; that his soul or spirit went to God, went to Paradise with the thief, and went to Tartarus and preached to the wicked spirits who lived in Noah's day. It is there taught that Christ arose according to the Scriptures; this I believe, while you and the Orthodox world say not; that merely his body arose; that Christ came back from Heaven; that he came back from Paradise or Hades. I repeat, Are you upon holy or safe ground? "If Christ (not the body—one half of him,) be not raised, our preaching is vain, your faith is vain, and you are yet in your sins." This, with the following remark, is sufficient relative to the case of the thief.

The Paradise of God contains within it the tree of life. Rev. ii. 7. This tree of life is to stand upon the new earth when the new heaven and new earth are to be introduced. Rev. xxii. 2, and therefore in its existence must be future and located where the old was when Adam lived in it. This new heaven and earth is the order to which Paul was in vision caught away to which you refer. Peter maps out the first, second and third heavens and earth upon a chronological line, instead of the Orthodox idea of so many steps in altitude. This is easy and plain when the expression in the King James—caught up—is made to read "caught away," as A. Campbell and H. T. Anderson render it.

To the case of the Rich Man and Lazarus you refer as literal. Now, do you understand this to be a literal history? If so, do you hold to the old idea of transmigration of spirits, that when death came their spirits crept out of the fleshly bodies and into the spiritual bodies prepared for them? If not, then they must have come out with spiritual bodies when they left the fleshly bodies, for they (if literal) saw, felt, talked, heard, had eyes, ears, tongues, vocal organs, fingers, then necessarily hands, arms, and, in short, bodies complete, and therefore not disembodied consciousness, as you claim.

Again, will not such a position render a resurrection of the fleshly body unnecessary, and a future judgment a farce?

Further, as a literal history, why adopt such an idea as you set forth relative to disembodied consciousness, since neither the word soul or spirit occurs in the entire text?

Next you say that "the spirits of the dead (those separated from their bodies) are in Hades until the resurrection of their bodies." This is simply your idea, and the position taken, as I well know, by the Disciple church. If this be true, let us refer to inspiration to learn of their condition while there.

1. We read in Gen. xlii. 38, and xliv. 29, of the prospect of Jacob's going down to the grave (Hades) with his gray hairs. Question: Do spirits wear gray hairs in the spirit land?

2. Job x. 20-22, says: "Are not my days few? cease, then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little before I go whence (on the supposition that his sins were not pardoned) I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death: a land of darkness as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness."

3. Again, Job xiv. 13, prays to the Lord to be hid and to be kept secret in Hades: "Oh, that thou would'st hide me in the grave (Hades) that thou wouldst keep me secret until thy wrath be past."

4. Job xxiv. 19: "Drought and heat consume the snow waters, so doth the the grave (Hades) those which have sinned."

Now, whatever may be said of those who go to Hades, it is certain that the same effect is wrought upon them that drought and heat work upon the snow waters in resolving them back into their native elements.

5. Psa. vi. 5, reads: "For in death there is no remembrance of thee; In the grave (Hades) who shall give thee thanks?" Here the interrogative is equivalent to a negative. What, then, of Abraham, Lazarus, Christ and the thief in happiness and praising God while there?

6. Psa. xxxi. 17, David prays: "Let me not be ashamed, O Lord, for I have called upon thee; let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave (Hades)." What, then, about the rich man talking while there?

7. Again, of the wicked in Hades David says, in Psa. xlix. 14: "Like sheep (as sheep are laid) they are laid in the grave (Hades); death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave (Hades) from their dwelling." Then of himself he says, in verse 15, "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave (Hades)."

8. One more text I will add while upon this point. Solomon, in speaking of humanity in general, both good and bad, says: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, (Hades), whither thou goest. Eccl. ix. 10. These texts I deem sufficient for all purposes upon this point.

Yours truly,

G. M. MYERS.

J. M. HENRY TO G. M. MYERS—SECOND LETTER.

Dear Sir:—Your second communication has been received. I respond at once as far as I choose. My worst fears concerning you have been realized, if, as I suppose to be true, your last to me is a full expression of your sentiments.

1. You think me incorrect because I believe there is something more than body in man. Do you not know there is something more of you than body? If you do not know that, I must tell you I know something of you which you do not know of yourself, otherwise you would not have written to me. I have seen the bodies of dead men, but I never knew one of them to write a letter. But I suppose it may be necessary to modify that idea now, if you are correct, because your body (man) has written to me.

2. You call my attention to a definition of man in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary: "Man primarily signifies form." Your cause would seem to be better sustained if the above quotation were in Webster, but it is not. He says the Welch word, mon, primarily signifies form." Please let us have a definition of the Hebrew or Greek word for man, for in these languages only has God's inspiration reached us. Your boldness in assumption may appear by substituting your definition for the word in some of the passages you immediately quote, as, Gen. ii. 7, God formed (form) man of the dust of the ground?

Also, 1 Cor. xv. 47: The first (form) man was of the earth earthy, the second (form) man was the Lord from heaven. But then some comfort may be found in the next passage you cite, Gen. vi. 3: He (form) also is flesh.

You then confidently inform me that the breath of life is not a part of man, but is simply the power caused to move upon the organism man, and the result produced is life in all its manifestations. The following is so profound that I may not get your meaning: "Thought is not in the man independent of the power (breath of life), nor is it in the power independent of the organism; but it is the result of the power brought to bear on the organism."

I do not certainly know how you aimed at the above conclusions. Was it by natural philosophy, speculative philosophy, or was it by some kind of metaphysical chemistry? God breathed into man the breath of life and he became a living soul. I believe that. But what you say may not mean the same thing. How is it about a babe before it is born? Has it life? It has. What kind of life is that? These questions are on the borders of embryology. Perhaps you can give me some light on this subject. It is the foundation of a professedly scientific basis of materialism or atheism. Neither is cumbered with an effort to defend the Bible.

"Life and immortality are brought to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. i. 10. Life is one thing—immortality is another. Does your system know any difference between them? "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory forever and ever." 1 Tim. i. 17. What does eternal mean, if not ever-during? From this and more, I conclude that life—eternal life—is one thing, and immortality is another.

You tell me that you believe Christ died. What does death mean, or what is death?

You say that I and the Orthodox world disbelieve it (that Christ died), and that only his body died. Who told you I believe that only Christ's body died? He was forsaken of God—was separated from him. Please see John x. 17, 18. "Therefore my father loveth me, because I lay down my life that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father." If there was not disembodied consciousness, how could he take his life again? The Scriptures teach that his soul was in Hades. I believe that. They also teach that his soul was not left there. I believe that, too. Jesus told the thief he should be with him that day in Paradise, which is in Hades, all your sport to the contrary notwithstanding. The word hades was in use among the Greeks when the Savior and the apostles were here. In that language the inspired gospel was recorded. They used that word eleven times, perhaps. Have they defined it? They have not. What, then, is its meaning? The current one at the time. To deny this is to virtually charge the Lord and his Apostles with the intention to deceive by using the word in an unusual, but undefined sense.

Your manner of treating the narrative concerning the rich man and Lazarus lacks the novelty of an argument. If it be a parable, what does it mean? Whom does the rich man represent? And whom Lazarus? What does hades mean? What does Abraham's bosom mean? What does the death of these men mean? You know what I think about the text. What do you think about it?

You gravely inform me that I cannot very well maintain my position and believe the fundamental facts of the gospel. If I regarded that decision of yours as final, I would attempt to maintain what I believe concerning the death, burial and resurrection of Christ. Young men are sometimes more confident than intelligent. I believe that Christ died, was buried and arose again. I believe that his soul was not left in hades, nor did God suffer his flesh to see corruption. See Acts ii. 27, 31. I believe Christ when he says, "A spirit hath not flesh and bones." Luke xxiv. 39.

Paul confessed himself a Pharisee, touching the hope and resurrection of the dead, and concerning angels and spirits. Acts xxiii. 6-8.

I will not reply in detail to all that you have said, because I deem it unnecessary.

You want to know if spirits have fingers, hands, arms, bodies, hair, etc., etc. If they have, then your conclusion is that they are spiritual bodies, and as their consciousness continues after the spirit leaves the body, why, there must be a transmigration of spirits. As my spirit pervades every part of my body, it must be the shape of my body, fingers, toes, arms and all. It is not transmigrated into a spiritual body, yet you seem to have your mind so full of the idea of body as to be continually assuming the point in discussion.

You make of hades, sheol, a chemical laboratory for working the dissolution of the body into its primary elements, so that there can be no resurrection. Of what use can it be to raise their bodies? There is nothing to put into those bodies. There can be no shouting, "O hades, where now thy victory!" because there is no victory but the grave. You will remember I deny that hades is the grave.

I am sorry that you suffer yourself to be misled by unreliable authorities. You quote Job xiv. 13, as I say hades, the Greek representative of the Hebrew sheol, when it is, Heb. kober. This, your first of a number of passages, is not a beginning of good promise. You quote Job xxiv. 19, as containing hades, sheol; this, too, is kober. Psalm vi. 5, you say hades, sheol, the book says kober. Next, Psalm xxxi. 17, Let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent, you say, hades, sheol—the book says kever—the grave. You do not improve on your quotations by practice. Psalm xlix. 14, 15. Like sheep they are laid in kober—you say hades, sheol .... consume in the grave—kever—you say hades, sheol—from their dwelling. But God will redeem my soul from sheol—hades. The rendering of keber by hades except it be used figuratively, is unwarranted. But I will not pursue this unpleasant task further now.

You ask if I stand on holy ground? I do not know that I understand your use of the phrase. My faith is in him whom I love, and by whom I have eternal life and do not expect to die in your sense of that word. Man was made in the image of God, who is spirit. I think you and I can be better employed in persuading men to obey the gospel than trying to prove there is no difference between Paul and nerve power. I could say much more on this subject and would do so, if I thought it would do any good, but of that I hardly dare hope.

Yours in the truth,

J. M. HENRY.

LONDON, Sept. 15, 5 a. m.—A Bucharest correspondent says the Roumanians report their loss before Plevna at ten officers and 200 men killed, thirty officers and 1,000 men wounded.

Unfavorable rumors are current concerning the Russian position in Schipka Pass.

LONDON, Sept. 15.—A correspondent telegraphs as follows:

"BUCHAREST, Friday night.—I left the battle-field before Plevna at noon yesterday. Two redoubts taken by General Skobeloff, on Tuesday evening, were held for twenty-four hours. Wednesday the Turks made six attacks, and, finally, about 6 in the evening, drove him out. He lost three cannon, which he had placed in the redoubts. He asked for reinforcements several times, but General Levitsky refused them, thinking General Skobeloff had enough men to hold the redoubts.

"Finally, General Krilloff, on his own responsibility, sent the remnant of a regiment which had attacked the lower redoubt near Plevna, and whose effective strength was reduced to 1,100 men, and utterly unfit to go into battle even. This regiment arrived a few minutes too late, and another regiment, sent from headquarters of the staff to reinforce him, arrived when General Skobeloff already had retreated. The loss of these redoubts is disastrous for the Russian attack, as it seems that the Russians in possession of these two redoubts and the Grivica (Grivitza) redoubt, had counted upon recommencing offensive measures immediately. This is now impossible until the arrival of reinforcements. When I left the battlefield, all was quiet, except a light artillery fire. The Russians are still in possession of the Grivica redoubt, which was under continual heavy fire from the Turks. This redoubt was visited by Colonel Wellesley, who says it is heaped full of dead Russians and Roumanians."

A dispatch from Shumla, dated Friday, says Osman Pasha has attacked the Russians in great force at Dubrit, on the road from Plevna to Sofia, where they had fortified themselves, in order to prevent him receiving support. The Russians were badly beaten, and have lost several thousand men, besides nine guns.

Better to wear out than to rust out, will hold good in all ages. For the one who toils is a benefit to himself and to society, while the other is like a dry stick, always in the way and therefore pushed aside.

Church Rules for the Ladies.

FROM COL. FORNEY'S PRESS.

Dress hard all morning, such is fate;
Then enter church some minutes late;

All eyes will then be turned on you,
And will observe your bonnet new;

Let humble modesty wreath your face,
And take your seat with faultless grace;

Let all your thoughts be fixed on high,
And rearrange your ear-bind tie;

Think how religion's prone to bless,
And criticise your neighbors dress;

Let all your heart be filled with praise,
And notice Mrs. Maggie's lace;

Put from your mind, all thoughts of sin,
And readjust your diamond pin;

Think of how good religion proves,
And then smooth out your buttoned gloves;

Catch well the precepts as they fall,
And smooth the wrinkles in your shawl;

Think of the sinner's fearful fate,
And notice if your bonnet's straight;

Pray for the influence divine;
That ladies bazque—mark the design;

Let tender grace possess your mind,
And criticise that hat behind;

Reflect on Christian graces dear,
And fix those curls behind your ear;

Let your heart warm with silent prayer,
And view that horrid green dress there;

Reflect it, on the world's ways,
And see if your gold chain's out of place;

Think of the peace the good shall find,
And wonder who are sitting behind.

Our Letter Drawer.

On the eleventh of August, we took up our parable and journeyed eastward as far as the Blue Ridge, to the town of Liberty where our beloved brother Anderson is located, to attend a two days' meeting of the brethren and friends of the one faith, where we met a goodly number of intelligent enquirers after the truth, to whom we discoursed Saturday afternoon, and Sunday and evening. Our first discourse was on the manner of God's love in the gift of his Son, connecting with it our blessed hope of seeing Jesus and being made like him. Second discourse: "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Third discourse was Paul's charge to Timothy to "preach the word." All were listened to with deep and earnest attention. After the morning service, we organized a body of believers, eleven in number, and partook of the bread and wine. There are more who will soon unite with the little band of believers to follow the meek and lowly Jesus, and wait for his coming. Brother Anderson is doing a good work, is well received, and is an able defender of the truth. He is poor, needs assistance, has to travel on foot many miles to fill his appointments, has to labor through the week to get bread for his family. Who will come to the front in this time of need and lend a trifle to the Lord? The truth is taking deep root and the results will be permanent and lasting. We have the best evidence of what we state. Men listen with attention and candor, and, when properly instructed, go forward and put on Christ according to the word, and immediately engage in defending the truth, and building up a character in harmony with the Divine Being. We are getting our share of persecution as our master plainly predicted. Our prayer is, Lord give us grace and patience to suffer these things meekly for the name of him who is soon to come, and bring eternal deliverance to all whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life. I would like to do more for the paper, but my means are limited. God is doing a blessed work under our feeble labors. I have reproached myself most keenly for a lack of faith. I could never have believed he could or would use such a poor stick in his blessed cause. Praise his holy name. I am indeed sorry that THE RESTITUTION cannot be published without interruption. There is no real necessity for it, if the brethren really felt and realized what they so loudly profess—that the Lord is soon coming. There is an abundance of means. One has enough to supply the deficiency and never feel it. God help us to feel, and to do our duty while we have the opportunity, for soon the master will rise up, and shut the door. Then will we realize how sadly we have been deceived by the god of this world.

NEWELL BOND.

Ed. Restitution:—I have a moment's time and I will drop you a line. By the blessing of our Father in heaven, we are enjoying good health and crops this year, and hope soon to be able to send you some money for THE RESTITUTION, though that is rather scarce in this settlement. In the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit and for the remission of their sins, I baptized Mr. M. D. Edwards and his wife into the death of the Lord Jesus, in the waters of Spilman Creek, last Sunday evening, they previously having confessed that he is the Christ, and their faith in the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God as revealed in the Scriptures. To our God be all the honor and glory. I have an appointment for next Sunday at 2 p. m., at Pottersburg, Lincoln county, ten miles below here. The subject announced is, "Baptism, and its relation to the cause of Christ." Perhaps I may send you a synopsis more or less complete if I can raise enough paper. I preached at this place regularly three years ago, and the seed is not yet.

May God give us freedom and courage in the gospel, with patience to endure the final overcoming time.

Yours in the one faith,
J. K. THOMPSON.

Ingalls, Kansas.

P. S.—Bro. Barnhill and family residing two and a half miles southeast, are in tolerably good health. He is married again. J. K. T.

Editor Restitution:—Please give me a small space in our paper to report our success in Texas. I am still on the war-path, and fighting for the cause of truth. I have often been told that I should run the people off, but I and that I always draw them to me. In Missouri, Kansas, and Texas, good honest people love plain talk. I expect to be plain while I live, though all men should leave me to stand alone. I am preaching now, sometimes on Saturday, and every Sunday, with good results. About three weeks ago I baptized five, the next week one. The third Sunday in August seven came forward for baptism. I baptized five on that day, and the fourth Sunday I preached at the Denton school house, about eight miles from home. I went on to the ground with a chill and high fever, which was about the fourth attack. With a hard struggle I urged myself forward and preached. Six more came forward for baptism. We went about two miles to the water and baptized three of them, although I could scarcely stand upon my feet. We have set Monday to baptize the balance, which will be five or six more.

Now, my dear brethren, I do not write this to boast, but to encourage our preaching brethren. I do think the time is short to work in, and what is done must be done quickly. I am getting old, my time is short, but I expect to work till Jesus comes. Sister Hicklin, and Sister Steward, I am singing that good old song yet, but feel certain that it will soon be hushed, and oh, if we all live right, we shall all join in that glorious new song, saying, "Thou art worthy." Brethren and sisters, I am looking every moment for Jesus, our great King. I am not bothered about the re-erection of the metallic image, or the coming of Elijah first, although these things may be.

Z. GOWER.

Texas, Texas.

P. S.—Cotton is beginning to open, and as soon as we can get it to market, I think our brethren will do a good deal for the paper. Z. G.

Editor Restitution:—I commenced meeting at Millwood, Ind., on the 10th and closed on the 21st of August. Had a good meeting, good attention, and I think good will result in time to come. There are some almost persuaded to obey and, perhaps, will soon. I am to go there again in October and hold meeting over the first Sunday.

Conference Report,

The brethren of the Abrahamic faith in south-west Missouri met in conference at the Ackley school house, Dade county, Aug. 17, 1877, at 4 p.m. House called to order by the president. A goodly number from all parts of the conference district were present; also Brethren Kimsey, Hayworth, Foore and Ward from Kansas, and Brother Robertson from Arkansas. The conference elected Brother J. Butt, president, P. Finn, secretary, and Brother Darwin, treasurer, for the ensuing year. Brethren Meyers, Patterson and Beeson, were chosen a committee of arrangements, who appointed Brother Stringer to speak in the evening. After partaking of supper on the ground, we listened to Brother Stringer on Christian duties, who was followed by Brother Foore.

In our business meeting Saturday morning, took up the subject of organization, arguing it at length in brotherly love. Brother Robertson then addressed us from Rom. viii. 10, 11. All seemed well pleased with our brother's plain and practical remarks.

At half past two resumed the subject of organization occupying nearly one and a half hours, after which we had a pithy discourse from Brother Ward, on the nature of man, and in the evening Brother Hayworth entertained a large audience on prophetic time.

On Sunday morning a motion was made, and unanimously carried, to organize a union conference embracing south-eastern Kansas, south-western Missouri, and north-western Arkansas. Brother Robertson, of Arkansas, Brethren Foore and Kimsey, of Kansas, and Brethren Mendenhall and Finn of Missouri, were chosen a committee to choose time and place, join in that glorious new song, saying, Brother J. M. Stringer was chosen Evangelist for the ensuing year. After a short intermission, Brother Kimsey preached an able discourse on the signs of the times, to a crowded house, and deep interest was manifested. After partaking of a bountiful repast, prepared by our good sisters, we met and decided to hold our next quarterly meeting at the Springhill school house, in the southern part of Polk county, seven miles east of Walnut Grove, to commence on Friday before the third Sunday in November. We then engaged in social meeting, which was a love-feast long to be remembered; shortly after which Brother Kimsey resumed his discourse on the signs of the times, in which he proved his familiarity with the subject from his manner of treating it. In the evening Brother Foore spoke on the Restitution, giving good proof of an able workman.

The house, though commodious, was not large enough to contain the crowds that came out to hear. Thus closed one of the best meetings that we have ever had in the south-west. A good impression was left in the neighborhood from which we anticipate the best results. The parting hand was given, and we separated, feeling that we had had a foretaste of the good time to come.

P. FINN, Secretary.

Advent Exclusiveness.

BY H. V. REED.

Some of our brethren have had the impression that the people known as Adventists were a very free and liberal people, and that they would not put a padlock on the conscience of any man who might differ with them. The Adventists have been driven out of the different sects because of their views upon the great questions of the kingdom of God and the nature and destiny of man. They are branded as heretics by the different names and denominations of Christendom. But they no sooner become organized and get their religious machinery shit up and in running order than they turn round and whereas and resolve and denounce heretics who cannot endorse all they teach, or who believe a little more than they do. It is instructive and interesting to watch the growth of sects. Humanity is the same the world over. The Adventists are just as intolerant toward those who may differ from them as the other sects. They have some good and noble men among them, but the New England leaders are narrow-minded, and and exclusive. We have known this for years. The following from the annual proceedings we clip from the World's Crisis. Those of our brethren who trusted in a union will now see upon what grounds they can unite. Keep still upon the great question of Christ's reign over the nations, or, keep out of our churches. Your appointments cannot appear in the columns of the Crisis, and you are not to be encouraged in any way as proclaimers of salvation. Any orthodox church in christendom would be just as liberal and free. You can unite by a surrender of your liberty to teach what you believe upon points which may be at variance with the "general council of"—Adventists! What a union! What Christian liberty! Well, the "resolve" is out now, and adopted. We shall see whether they will now hunt up and report the heretics. We know of brethren who will not keep still. They will preach a whole gospel or none at all. But here is the extract:

In accordance with the direction of the A. C. P. Society, the secretary called the attention of the association to the matter of not publishing certain appointments in the Crisis, whereupon Bro. Wellcome offered the following resolution:

Whereas, the doctrines of the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, trine immersion, and probation for sinners after the second advent of Christ, are largely of heresy, and their influence has in our judgment, done much to injure the cause of true faith and piety, by undermining in the minds of those brought under their influence the scriptural doctrine of the wages of sin, the atonement and judgment; therefore

Resolved, That we cannot lend our influence either directly or indirectly to the promulgation of these doctrines or views on which they depend; and we hereby instruct those having charge of the columns of our paper not to allow any appointments or notices of meetings held by such men as declare themselves believers in said doctrines to be published therein.

The resolution was adopted.

Voted, that the president and secretary of the state conference be requested to inform the publishing committee of the names of all preachers in their vicinity who hold the doctrines referred to in the foregoing resolution.

DIED.

HELMS—Sister Helen [illegible] of Florence Helms, and daughter of Judge W. A. Mary Hackleman.

She was born Jan. 31, 1849, and died Aug. 19, 1877, aged twenty-seven years, seven month and four days. She embraced the gospel several years ago and continued in the faith to death. Funeral by the author. Text, Job 14, 14.

Practical Christianity.

The practical Christian takes the Bible for his guide, and lives up to its teaching, which is, in other words, walking after the spirit. He is fair in his dealings with all men; "does unto others as he would that others should unto him;" his weights have no lack; his measure is pressed down and shaken together, just the measure he expects to have meted out to him again, if not in this age, in the age to come. Luke vi. 38. He is faithful attendant at religious services when duty calls not elsewhere; but he firmly believes that there are some duties equally important to religious services. He is also a praying Christian, not simply at fixed or stated intervals, but at his business, walks or pleasure. Such a soul continually looks upward, asking strength and help for each hour of joy, sorrow and temptation. His Christian garment is always about him, hence he serves God as faithfully on Monday as on Sunday. His soul is so filled with the love of God, that it continually flows out to every creature. He delights in his neighbor's prosperity and cheerfully lends a helping hand and kindly sympathy to those in adversity. He has no need to go upon his knees and beg hour after hour for God to show him the work he would have him to do. He opens his eyes and beholds it all about him (and better far to be about it than screaming to God to show it to him,) no matter how poor or secluded, how wealthy or prominent, his work is on every hand. There are souls to win to Christ; there are sorrows to be soothed, hungry to be fed, the widows and orphans remembered, kind words to be spoken, injuries to be forgiven, and enemies to be prayed for. Is there no way to win souls to Christ but by talking religion? Aye, many ways, and the practical Christian will discover them. Shall we tell the half-famished street child that it is wicked to steal, and God will punish him? No, we should not; at least, not until we had fed the starving body, and placed it in a condition to live without stealing. A piece of bread at a proper moment may be more effectual in leading a soul to Christ than many prayers, and the same with many other gifts which it is in the power of all to bestow. Practice is better than preaching. Practice first, then the preaching will not be in vain. If the mother's cares have been many, and still the basket of mending bids wait to keep the weary hands employed, and the eyelids unclosed to a late hour, does not duty point that bright young daughter a position at the mother's side rather than the social or prayermeeting? Can she not light her heart in prayer and praise while the nimble fingers are busy, conscious of the sacrifice she has made, but grateful in her heart that the dear mother has rest by this sacrifice? Yes, she can pray, and that prayer will answer as a sweet incense to the all-wise Father who knoweth why her place is vacant at the prayer meeting. We don't like to trust those Christians who claim that nothing should keep them from religious services; who would rather go, than stop and give a cup of cold water to some thirsty invalid, or pay the least attention to poverty's dead. It is best that religious services be well attended if duty calls not loudest in another direction. It matters not if the theatres and socials be left to worldlings at these particular seasons. But we are drifting from our practical Christians. "Mother, let me lift that heavy package for you." "Wife, give me a cold dinner to-day, you are too weary and unwell to prepare a warm one." "Husband I will take the children out to walk and give you a little quiet rest for your aching head, I can go to church some other time." "I am going your way good woman, let me carry that heavy basket for you, for I am young and strong." "Dear old grandpa lean on my arm, the walk is very slippery, and I am the strongest and will keep you from falling." "I wouldn't cry little fellow; we'll help you to find your marble, and if we don't, here is our apple to make it up." "Mrs. D. let me take off that yard for you, you have no husband or boy, and God commands us to remember such as you." "I am going to the village auntie; isn't there some errand I can do for you, and save you a warm weary walk to the village?" "You are too ill my dear neighbor, don't try your strength yet; let me bake you a loaf of bread with mine, and wash out a few pieces with my washing. I shall scarcely feel the extra, and you will gain in health and strength a few days longer for it." "Let me take care of that little one to-day, and you go out to meeting. I am sure it will do you good, you are confined at home so much." "I am going to drive out to-day if it is so pleasant, come go with me you poor invalid, the fresh air will do you good." "Let me sit on that low seat grandma, and you take this comfortable seat, for you need it more than I." "Let me save your home for you my neighbor, I have means to spare and can wait a few years as well as not." "Let me assist you down those steps for you are so very lame." "Don't fly into this passion and fight each other friends, let me see if I can't help you over this difficulty." "Here, poor widow, is some wheat and potatoes, a thank offering to the Lord, he has blessed me so abundantly this season." (God bless you, Mr. practical Christian and he will bless your harvests still more abundantly another season.) And thus the practical Christian will find work, and who can say that a few of these practical sermons will not win more souls to Christ in one month than a hundred orthodox sermons in the same time. God bless the earnest practical Christians, and give them an abundant entrance into the kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. In the earnest prayer of one striving to do the will of God.

"Ixthus."

All those who attended the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance noticed the word ixthus on the platform, and there must have been many a question as to what it meant. It is one of those symbols which was peculiarly dear to the ancient church, because connected with the history of its trials and its triumphs, and there is not one so beautiful and expressive as it. It contains in itself a complete confession of Christian faith, and yet in such a way that until it was explained nobody could guess what it meant.

Ixthus means a fish, and in the catacombs of Rome there was found often a rude drawing of a fish over the place where human bones were placed—and why? Take the word and write it in this way, and you will see:

I	Iesous Jesus
Ch	Christos Christ
Th	Theou God's
U	Uios Son.
S	Soter Saviour.

And when the persecution was raging in Rome and the Christians took refuge in the catacombs and there celebrated their worship, and when they dared not even mark their Christian faith in any other way lest their very graves should be profaned by their enemies, they could make this symbol of a fish, which would be utterly unmeaning to the uninitiated, and yet should express the strength and the fullness of their faith in Christ's divinity and in his saving grace. So it is a precious symbol of the early church, and represents the dearest object of the believer's faith.—Sel.

The Altar of Sacrifice.

We, the undersigned, having the good of the cause of truth but least, and believing that it is our duty to sustain the gospel with our means as well as our time, and believing that God will bless us for all the sacrifice we make in behalf of the truth, agree to pay the sum set opposite our names for the purpose of freeing the RESTITUTION from debt, and sending it out as a messenger of truth to those sitting in darkness, and to comfort those who are waiting in the light of life:

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The congregation at or near Stevenson, on the G. C. & St. Joseph R. R., in Dodge Co., Kansas, will hold a meeting over two Sundays, commencing at Stevenson, on Saturday evening before the first Sunday in September. Meeting will be held half of the time at the square, and half of the time at the Stevenson school house, two miles south of Stevenson. We are trying to secure the services of Brother Myers, and Brother Proctor, of Missouri. The object of the meeting is to build such other expositions of the truth—and to persuade to obedience those that are already persuaded. All are invited—and all that will come we will extend for by the brethren. All the preaching brethren in reach are especially invited.

By order of Congregation.

J. F. BYERS.

Brother J. M. Stephenson's address is 35 Johnson Place, Chicago.

"The Whole Creation Groaneth."

A voice is heard upon the air,
A wail upon the sea;
The universe is bowed in prayer,
And struggles to be free.

Creation groans, and lifts her hands,
And earth in travail waits,
And nature's animated bands
Moan at their prison gates.

And hardened hearts, as incense rise,
From earth's afflicted ones,
In supplication to the skies,
To raise her sleeping sons—

For Christ to come, and bring again
The Eden shades of love,
And banish sin, and death, and pain,
As it is done above.

It is man's last appeal to heaven—
Prey'r's final agony,
To which an answer soon is given
In earth's great jubilee.

Then "COME, LORD JESUS, QUICKLY COME,"
Our longing spirits cry;
We wait to shout thy welcome home,
And meet thee in the sky. —C. S. M.

"The Time of the End."—No. 2.

In my last I endeavored to give what I understand is the end referred to—its duration—when it will begin—and when it will end. "The time of the end" is the last end of the indignation against Daniel's people, the Jews, and which is to befall them in the latter days. Dan. viii. 19; x. 14. It is also for an appointed or definite time—"at the time appointed the end shall be." Dan. viii. 19. That time appears to be the last week of the seventy which Gabriel said to Daniel, "are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city." ix. 24. This period of seventy weeks is a prophetic period of 490 years. Sixty-nine of these weeks ended with the cutting off or crucifixion of the Messiah, when the Jews publicly rejected him, and claimed Cæsar as their king. One week remains to be fulfilled in their history before the end comes. The commencement of that week of seven years, I believe, will be ushered in by the return of the anointed Jesus—not publicly, but privately. In like manner as he went away, so he will come at that time. Acts i. 11. He comes heralded by the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God. The dead ones who are sleeping in Jesus will hear, and live; and those of the living, who are waiting for God's Son from heaven, will be changed to immortality; and together they will meet the Lord in the air. 1 Thess. iv. 16–17.

The world at large will not be aware of the nearness of the Lord's presence. They may feel the effects of that coming, but will not see him, because he will not then manifest himself to the world. The resurrection of the dead, and the translation of the living, may startle a few in various localities, and when reported to the world by the daily press, it will not be credited, but classed with other phenomena which cannot be explained.

First and foremost of all events yet to occur in fulfillment of prophecy, I place the thief-like coming of the Lord for his saints. I know of no prophecy fulfilling, particularly relating to the present time, or to fulfill, before the resurrection takes place. That stupendous miracle, caused by the return of the Lord, will mark the beginning of a peculiar and momentous period, which will be full of remarkable events, and a fit introduction to the reign of the King of kings, and Lord of lords. Dan. xii. 1, 2, shows that at the time of the end a resurrection will take place; a great time of trouble occur, and Daniel's people will be delivered.

In order to assist the reader in the examination of this subject, I will submit in detail, some of the propheeies which I believe will be fulfilled during the time of the end. I will not vouch, however, for the order of fulfillment, as some may be concurrent, or precede others. I mention,—

1. The coming of the Lord for his saints—dead and living.

2. The resurrection of the dead in Christ first, and then the change of the living—both classes caught away to meet the Lord in the air.

3. The standing up of Michael for the Jews.

There will be a partial regathering of the nation in unbelief. At present they reject Jesus as their Messiah just as much as their fathers did ar I if they return to Palestine, from whatever motive, it will be in unbelief. Jesus cannot receive them in this condition. Hear what the Lord God says by the Prophet Ezekiel: "Because ye are all become dross, behold, therefore, I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem. As they gather silver, and brass and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace; to blow the fire upon it to melt it; so will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury, and I will leave you there, and melt you." Ezek. xxii. 17–22. This melting in the furnace implies trouble and affliction. Hence, when Michael stands up, it is for deliverance out of trouble. See Dan. xii. 1. The time of trouble is said to be unequaled—such as never was. This affliction will have a purifying effect. "I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried." Zech. xii. 9. These refined and purified ones will be the remnant of Israel, to whom the Redeemer shall come. Isa. lix. 20. When to all human appearance, they cannot escape out of the hands of their enemies, then deliverance comes. They will say, "this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord, we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." Isa. xxv. 9.

4. The rise, prosperity, and universal dominion of the Man of Sin.

He is revealed in prophecy by various names and characteristics. In Isaiah, he is called "the Assyrian, the rod of mine anger." Isa. x. 5. In Daniel, "the little horn," Dan. vii. 8, 20, 21, 24–26; viii. 9–12; this power is defined to be a king who will blaspheme the Most High, wear out his saints, for a time, times, and a half, and change times and laws; also as a king of fierce countenance, crafty, professing peace, yet destroying many; whose power shall be mighty, and shall destroy the mighty and holy people; and at last, standing up against the Prince of princes, shall be broken without hand. viii. 23–25. He is also styled "the prince that shall come." ix. 26. "The King," who shall do according to his own will, exalting and magnifying himself above all, and who shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; then he will come to his end and none shall help him. Paul calls him that Man of Sin, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped—that "wicked one, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and destroy with the brightness of his coming." 2 Thess. ii. 3–12. John calls him "antichrist." 1 John ii. 18; iv. 3. In Revelation he is described under the symbol of a wild beast, having a double character—political and ecclesiastical—or perhaps two persons, so intimately connected, that they are one in working—the beast and false prophet. Rev. xiii. 1, 11; xix. 20. This person will be the culmination of wickedness enthroned—the Satanic eighth head of the Roman empire. As antichrist, he will make a covenant with the Jews, and break it in the midst of the week, and then be their persecutor for three years and a half. And not only them but all who will not receive the mark of the beast. His object seems to be to obtain the sovereignty of the world, and rob Jesus of his right to reign. He will be shrewd, cunning, politic, full of flattery, make professions of peace, yet will be a destroyer. He will bring about the time of great trouble—make war upon the saints, and destroy the mighty and holy people.

5. Another important event which will take place in the time of the end will be the authoritative proclamation of the everlasting gospel. This is symbolized by the angel flying through mid-heaven. Rev. xiv. 6, 7. His message is the gospel, called the everlasting gospel, because it pertains to the age to come. He goes forth to all nations, calling upon them "to fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." Jesus said that "this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations, and then shall the end come." Matt. xxiv. 14. This prophecy may have a double application; first, to the end of the Jewish polity at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; and second, to the last end of the indignation, when "the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled." It is to be preached for a testimony to the nations.

It seems reasonable that public notice should be given to the world that the judgment is at hand, and that the kingdom of God is about to be set up, so that mankind may be prepared, and that the honest-hearted, whether Jew or Gentile, may be gathered in. In Rev. xiv. 4, there is mention made of a certain class who are called "first-fruits unto God and the Lamb." Then from verses 14–16, we read of an harvest being reaped. What produces this harvest, except this authorized sowing of the good seed of the kingdom? I believe the word will be preached, as in the Apostles' days, with the power of the Spirit of God. Such a proclamation will form a striking contrast to the popular gospel of the various sects of Christendom. It will command attention, and be either embraced or opposed. But, some one says: If the righteous are taken away at the beginning of the time of the end, who will be left to preach this gospel?

Of course, the angel flying through mid-heaven, mentioned in verse 6, is only a symbol of those who will be sent forth to proclaim the good news. In answer to this objection, I would suggest, that when the waiting and watching ones are taken away, the Laodicean church which will be left behind may be aroused from their lukewarmness, and may heed the admonition of the Savior to buy of him gold, and white raiment, and be zealous and repent. Rev. iii. 18, 19. From this class messengers may be chosen for this work. If they become thoroughly awakened and repent, certain glorious promises are given them of fellowship with Christ, not only in suffering, but also in glory. Verses 20, 21.

6th, what an arduous task they will have to perform! They will necessarily come into collision with the wild beast and the false prophet, and have to pass through the great tribulation. They will, as God's witnesses for the truth, antagonize the impious claims of antichrist, for 1260 days, or three years and a half; and as Christ's power was with the Apostles to confirm the Word, so it will be with them. See Rev. xi. 3–11. These witnesses for the truth of Jesus will suffer death at the hands of their enemies, but obtain a triumphant resurrection in their presence, and ascend to heaven in a cloud. They are then honored with participation in Christ's throne and glory, for a thousand years. Rev. iii. 21; xx. 4.

6. The reaping of the harvest. Rev. xiv. 14–16.

This harvest is produced from the seed sown by this angelic proclamation. The sowing and the reaping are both during the time of the end. The harvest seems to be composed of that great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, which John saw standing before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands. Rev. vii. 9. This multitude are said to have come out of "the great tribulation," and to have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Verses 13, 14. They are uncrowned, but they wave the palm of victory, and they are to be the special and honored servants of God, and find deliverance from all their former troubles. Under another symbol, John sees them standing on the sea of glass, having the harps of God, and singing a song of victory. Rev. xv. 1–4. After the reaping of this harvest comes

7. The gathering of the clusters of the vine of the earth, to be cast into the winepress of the wrath of God. Rev. xiv. 17–20.

This will constitute the hour of judgment, and a terrible one it will be. The vials of wrath will be poured out upon the worshipers of the beast and his image, the territory and throne of the beast, and end with giving unto Babylon the cup of the fierceness of God's wrath. See Rev. xvi., xvii, xviii. Thus the blood of martyrs found in her, will be avenged in her total destruction. This judgment is announced in the second angel's message. Rev. xiv. 8. Its consummation will be matter for rejoicing, both in heaven and on earth. Rev. xix. 1–6. Her destruction will be the death-blow to all systems of religion not based on the truth of God, and preparatory to that new order of things which will be introduced by the Messiah when he begins his reign on Mount Zion.

8. The third angel's message, (Rev. xiv. 9–11,) with reference to the worshipers of the beast and his image, and the decree of the beast and false prophet, that all who will not worship the image of the beast shall be killed, and that no one may buy or sell, except those having the mark of the beast, (Rev. xiii. 15–17,) will be the cause of the great tribulation through which many will have to pass. It will then be—"who is on the Lord's side?"—for or against Christ. This antagonism will cause a fierce persecution. Those who dare to profess their belief in Jesus, and the word of God, will hazard their lives, and many will be put to death. With respect to these, John was commanded by a voice from heaven, saying, "Write, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; (from this time;) yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." Rev. xiv. 13. Their testimony for Jesus, sealed with blood, will be rewarded. In Rev. xx. 4, John sees them admitted to a joint rulership with Christ and the first-fruits, for a thousand years. They will sit with Christ on his throne, because they overcome as he overcame. Rev. iii. 21.

9. During this period of the time of the end the marriage of the Lamb takes place in the heavenly regions. The church—the Bride—made herself ready through obedience to the truth in her trial state, and now having been taken away to meet her Lord in the aerial, they are united, become one, as bridegroom and bride. They are glorified and manifested together, as the future kings and priests unto God over the nations of the earth. Rev. xix. 6–9; Rom. viii. 17. This glorious union of Christ and his people causes great rejoicing to a vast multitude, who shout, "Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife prepared herself." Rev. xix. 7. Then a supper is provided, and guests invited. See Isa. xxv. 6–8.

10. The time of the end closes with the battle of the great day of God Almighty, and the apocalypse of the Lord Jesus and his saints in power and great glory. The unclean spirits proceeding from the mouth of the dragon, beast, and false prophet, will gather the kings of the earth to this great conflict. Rev. xvi. 14. All nations will come up against Jerusalem to battle. Zech. xiv. 1–5; Joel iii. 1, 2; Zeph. iii. . The beast and the armies of the various nations with him will be at Jerusalem for the purpose of effectually settling the Eastern question, which has so long troubled them. The Jews, being then gathered in, brought back to Pal tine in some respectable numbers, and rising in importance, must be crushed, and an end put to their hopes of becoming once more a prominent nation. Hence this demoniacal gathering of the kings of the whole habitable. But, while in the very act of taking Jerusalem, "the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee," says Zechariah. Then "the sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake; but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Joel iii. 15, 16; Isa. xxx. 30–33; lxvi. 15, 16. Amidst tempest, earthquake, darkness, fire, and the terrible and unexpected appearance of heaven's cavalry, (Rev. xix. 11–16,) will the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies be completely routed and overthrown. Gentile times and rule end together. The time of the end thus closes—Daniel's people are delivered—the kingdom of God begins with the remnant of Judah, who are thus saved from destruction—a new dispensation is ushered in—Christ and his bride become the Kings and Priests of the world—all Israel are saved and brought back to their own land, and become the chief nation on earth; and through the natural and spiritual seed of Abraham, all the nations are blessed, and the glory of the Lord fills the whole earth. Judgment On the Little Horn—Mystic Babylon—Rev. xiii. 5-10; xvii. 3.

We have now traced this extraordinary criminal through the visions of Daniel, and have identified him in the Apocalypse; have seen him charged him with the same crimes, condemned, thrown into prison, seized with a fatal consumption, and finally slain. Such must be his end.

How far this sentence has already been executed, will appear from history. An objection may arise in the minds of some that the session of the Ancient of Days, and the trial, are not named in the Revelations of St. John. If the same criminal is seen both by Daniel and John, and these his words, acts and sentence, why no allusion to a judgment? Read Revelation xvii.

On this point suffer us now to dwell. It is quite impossible that two agents can so exactly resemble without being the same. That they are similar in words and acts will not be questioned.

Daniel sees empires and kingdoms, and traces political bodies—their bloody deeds to their fall, by judgments inflicted by their supreme judge; John follows the saints in their persecutions, as they trace their dangerous pathway to the triumphant reign of Christ. The Apocalypse records the history of the true church, and the deeds of her enemies, the apostate church, and of those nations who have aided that corrupt body to oppress the people of God.

In Daniel we look for an outline of national history, and the reasons of their overthrow. What could be more appropriate than the introduction of a court, judge, criminal, accuser, sentence and execution? The unity of the subject demanded such of the ancient prophet. The church is John's pole-star. Her struggles, and final triumph are the burden of his prophecy. The Apocalypse, therefore, closes with shouts of victory from the bride, the introduction of the land promised to Abraham and his seed, he description of its capital, and the uninterrupted enjoyment of its inhabitants.

With the plan of each prophet in our minds, we are prepared for variations in their great threads of narration. The one describes minutely the events to which the other simply makes allusion. Thus Daniel is attracted by the court session, as it presages the dissolution of national power. He also notices an act of the little horn—the humbling three horns—which John omits, as an event not connected with the saints. As the execution of the court sentence is purely national, John merely names it in such words as to show that revelations are designed to disclose other events. The words, acts and fate of the agent brought to view in Rev. xiii. 5–10 are given by John, so far as they interest the saints. Hence, in his execution, the fact of his imprisonment of the people of God is noticed: "He that leadeth into captivity;" likewise that he was a murderer of saints: "He that killeth." These distinctive features are necessary to be borne in mind, in order to the clear understanding of the book.

The words and acts, as named by Daniel and John, prove an identity of agents. Daniel describes an agent, with his words, deeds and fate. John gives the words, deeds and fate—leaving us by these data to find out the name of the agent. In this way their identity is easily seen.

The sea monsters of Daniel and John are identical. Let us compare the records of the authors above-named, and the following propositions will be fully proven:

1. They have one origin. "And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and I saw a wild beast rise out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the names of blasphemy." Rev. xiii. 1. With this compare Dan. vii. 3. They both are seen rising out of an ocean, dark and tempestuous.

2. The time of their origin is the same. A great nation is about to change its religion. The Roman empire, to this time Pagan or Dragonic, is in the act of casting off its Dragonic coat and appearing in a new guise. That change convulsed the world, causing the moral world to resemble a stormy sea. These revolutions occupy the reign of the first seven Christian emperors, from Constantine to Gratian, from A. D. 313 to A. D. 384. The same fact may be learned from Daniel. The fourth beast came out of the same great convulsions which gave rise to the ten principal horns, and the little horn. At that period this beast attracts the attention of Daniel.

3. The leopard beast is described: "And the beast which I saw was like a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion: and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority." Rev. xiii. 2. Compare this with Dan. vii. 5, 10. These passages describe the mouths of these beasts, which would symbolize the organs of national decrees belonging to the empire. The worship of this beast, and his deadly wound, are named in verses three and four. The leopard beast symbolizes the fourth monarchy in its transition age, from Paganism to Papacy.

4. The rise of a new agent: Please read Dan. vii. 8, 11, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, with Rev. xiii. 5, 10, and the new agent will appear. The name of this agent is given to Daniel, with his words, acts, and fate. In Revelation the words, acts and fate are given to determine the agent. The fourth beast of Daniel represents a national family composed of many members. So of the leopard beast of Rev. xiii. The deeds of any member of the family are said to be the family deeds when sanctioned by it. In John's description the mouth is said to be given to the wild beast; in Daniel it belongs to the little horn, a member of said family. In this there is no contradiction. The leopard beast of Rev. xiii. has two mouths; the one the great national organ, the other the Papal organ, and was a donation; the one civil, the other ecclesiastical.

It must be kept in mind that John gives a view of this family as a whole, while Daniel notices the whole and its parts. John says, "There was given him (the beast) a mouth." Daniel says, "A mouth was in this horn." John states, "This mouth speaking great things and blasphemies." Daniel says, "A mouth (of the little horn) speaking great things....great words against the Most High," John says, "Power was given him to make war forty-two months ....to make war with the saints." Daniel says, "The same horn made war on the saints." John says, "Power was given him (the beast) to war with the saints, over all kindreds, and languages, and nations." Daniel says, "He (the little horn) prevailed against them until the Ancient of Days came....times and laws given into his hands for time, times and the dividing of time."

The dominion of the little horn is taken away, and the leopard beast is said to be led into captivity, showing that the member of the family whose agency is here delineated would, when his dominion should be taken away, go into captivity. That power was then to be seized with a consumption, which would terminate in death; and in Rev. xiii. 10, we are taught that that end would be brought by the sword. We are, therefore, forced to the conclusion that as both agents have the same vocal organs, speak the same things, commit the same acts, and share the same fate, they are identical. This noted criminal, the little horn of Dan. vii. is that agent whose mouth, words, acts and fate are recorded in Rev. xiii. 5–10.

If we have made clear to your minds that this little horn of Dan. vii. and the agent whose words, deeds and fate are recorded in Rev. xiii. 5–10, are the same, you are prepared to follow us while we present John's view and improvement of the same court session and judgment.

In so doing you must bear in mind that John uses the family name in describing said agent, viz., wild beast; while Daniel calls it by its individual cognomen—little horn—as a member of that family.

The character and destiny of said agent attract the notice of the Revelator.

1. Its mouth, the outward organ of speech, is here called a gift, having a special office.

2. Its words—decrees—bulls—claim attention. "Speaking great things and blasphemies," "opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven."

3. Its wars. "Power was given him to make war forty-two months." "It was given him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them."

4. Its destiny. "He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity; he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword."

It is here intimated that such would be the length and severity of his persecutions and the long delay of judgment against him, that it would require of the saints much "faith and patience."

The acts of the agent above described are in the past. This will be admitted.

Has the sentence here brought to view been executed?

If the judgment is not completed, how far has it progressed?

The sentence contains two elements—a captivity and an execution by the sword. Has the civil dynasty, the central kingdom of Italy, symbolized by the little horn of Dan. vii., and here represented as a member of the family of the leopard beast, passed through either part of the sentence? Did the head of that dynasty go into captivity? In proof we refer you to what we have written in a former number. The facts are clear and conclusive. A more accurate accomplishment could not take place. It was fulfilled literally, as the laws of symbolization require.

How soon the latter element (killed with the sword) will be executed we are unable to say. All we can now state is that the civil dynasty has not yet fully ended its days. God will, however, execute to the letter his own decision.

SUMMARY.

We have stated that God's plan, as exhibited in his providences, has been to enter into judgment with nations whenever they have filled the cup of their iniquity. The old world, the cities of the plain, the fate of the ten and of the two tribes, Israel, and Jerusalem, were named as examples.

We showed that Daniel vii. brought to view a judgment of the same class. This position was established by presenting the original of Dan. vii. 9, and by the explanation of the angel, and from the fact that said chapter describes a judge, judges, officers, court session, plaintiff and defendant.

We showed the identity of the criminals of Daniel and John by sketching the life of the Italian central dynasty, and by proving said race of priest-kings guilty of all the charges preferred against the little horn of Dan. vii., and by noticing its sentence and execution as already in part accomplished.

We then traced the same criminal through the Apocalypse, and, by comparing the features as given by Daniel and John, learned his fate.

Having, therefore, presented ample testimony that the sentence passed by the Ancient of Days, on the criminal aforesaid, has been in part executed, we are forced to the conclusion that the judgment of that power is in the past. Justice requires it. God does not execute before he judges.

When did the Ancient of Days begin to sit in judgment on the little horn?

Since no part of the sentence had been executed up to 1707, but was in 1708, we have dated its sessions as early as A. D. 1780. About that time the thrones were placed, the supreme judge was seated, the criminal arraigned, the charges preferred, the books opened, the testimony given, the defendant found guilty sentenced, and the executioners appointed to carry out the decision of the court.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a beauty in the Church, regardless of wealth and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Jerusalem, the City of God.

BY WM. SHEPHERD.

"Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God. Selah." Psa. lxxxvii. 3.

It is evident that the Psalmist here has reference to Jerusalem, which is distinguished all through the Scriptures as the city of God—the holy city. Jerusalem is a compound word, from Jeru, or Jobus, deriving this part of its name from the circumstance of its being captured by the Jebusites, about a century after its foundation, which is supposed to have been about the year 2023, and owing its origin to Melchizedek, king of Salem. The Jebusites held this place until David ascended the throne of Israel, who then expelled them, making it the capital of his kingdom under the name of Jebusalem, and finally, for the sake of euphony, called it Jerusalem. Salem was added from the fact that Melchizedek founded it, he being styled king of Salem, which means king of peace. The two offices seem to have been conjoined in him—king and priest—as he is named "priest of the most high God," (Gen. xiv. 17; Heb. vii. 1;) hence a most appropriate type of Christ, who is represented as the antitypical Melchizedek, and who will come forth subsequent to the battle with the kings of the weary my readers if I continue.

Allow me to close my personal remarks by saying that your kind letter, sent me some months since, was perused with much interest. My desire is that your health may be restored, and means sent you so that the RESTITUTION may be a weekly visitor. We cannot do without the paper.

To our brethren that write for the RESTITUTION: We may not always think alike, but we can agree in spirit. I love Christian knowledge, especially the precious and more particularly pictures of Israel's word in the English language which can be uttered by the organs of speech with less effort than the word Jerusalem. There is music, and a singular harmony in the very expression.

That theological alchemy which is so much in use now by the popular ministry, and which transmutes Jerusalem and Zion into Gentile churches, and Judah and Israel with Gentile Christians, and the land of Judah into a visionary or spirit land, without boundaries, circumference, or center, we have but little faith in, and less in those who propagate such imaginary notions as true ministers of Christ. We freely admit that these terms may sometimes have reference to the church, and to the people of God; but as a general thing they are to be accepted in a literal sense. We might cite a number of texts in proof of this, but such would swell this article beyond its proper limits.

Whatever may be said of this city in the past, of its glory or its shame, or of its being the theatre of so many wonderful scenes and transactions, and the place where Jehovah has made such awful displays of his judgments, and rich exhibitions of his grace, all of which has now become a matter of history, with which the prophetic student is fully conversant, it is not our purpose here to speak, but simply and briefly to notice some of the more distinguished prophetic utterances which relate to her future sublime destiny. It cannot but be deeply interesting to those who hope to participate in the privileges and immunities of "the commonwealth of Israel," and who live in expectation of seeing Jerusalem a quiet habitation, (Isa. xxxiii. 20; comp. Psa. cxvviii. 5,6,) to learn of everything which may be said of it, as prophets have declared; as much so as an individual who has a claim or title to some valuable estate, which he feels assured he should enjoy at a "set time," is desirous of knowing its exact location and a full description of it—more particularly so if he designs to leave here and make his permanent home there. So with the saints of God. They are ever ready to listen to every report concerning the promised land and the city of which we speak.

Even "as cold water to the thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country."

It may be as well here, before going farther to notice that Jerusalem and Zion in scripture are always used interchangeably, especially as to their future glorious destiny. As their fall was together, so will they rise. Indeed, their coexistence in prophecy is fixed for all future time. As to the terms being interchangeably used, we cite but one chapter, which is sufficient proof—Isa. lii. Hence in prophecy what is predicted of one may be claimed for both. In the restitution it will require the one as well as the other to form the theocracy and administer to the nations which are saved or survive the catastrophe, the new economy or government, as Zion is to be the seat of the political or civil part, while Jerusalem, the seat of the religious or ecclesiastical part, (Isa. ii. 1-4.) "Glorious things are spoken of thee," etc. That is, wonderful things are predicted of her destiny; surprising statements are made, which hardly seem credible, from a human standpoint, that they could ever be fulfilled; places that lie so desolated, and which are held in such light esteem by the infidel world and spiritualistic professors of Christianity, that such a sublime future could ever be realized. But as God has pledged himself with an oath, or by his very existence, that he would accomplish these things which are involved in the fulness of earth's glory, (Num. xiv. 21,) so we who believe God feel assured that Jerusalem's trending down season must soon terminate, and her promised glory follow.

Although the statement in our text was made a long time prior to the many glowing utterances of the holy

gers relative to the future of Jerusa-

A[illegible], yet David, possessing the prophetic spirit, may he not have anticipated, to a great extent, the prophetic strains of frien the prophets touching the holy city, Ezekiel as containing a description of her fear-lendid destiny, proving but the burden of their messages, as we find that the postall of their prophecies are introduced with the preface like unto this: seek The visions of Isaiah, the son of namoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem," etc. David being under the influence of a divine inspiration, speaks of these things often in his Psalms prior to this, so he may have had reference also to the statements he himself had previously made relative to Jerusalem's future and Zion's exaltation, under immediate inspiration; at any rate, the subsequent of his Psalms, from the point of our text, are fraught with passages descriptive of Jerusalem's ultimate and final grandeur.

It may be well here to say that the Psalms are highly prophetic, and that many of them have a two-fold meaning and fulfillment, as, for example, the second Psalm was partially fulfilled on Christ's first entrance into the world, and quoted as such, Acts xiii. 33, but it is obvious that this Psalm, as to its more perfect accomplishment, points forward to Christ's second advent, when he will subdue the nations, and cause the kings and peoples to serve him with fear, and respect his law, or "break them with a rod of iron... (or) dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel."

The phrase "set," here in the Hebrew idiom does not denote the act of anointing, which was fulfilled at our Lord's first coming, and quoted here by the Apostle, but rather the confirmment of royalty and power—its legitimate effect—his installation, inauguration, he being solemnly and publicly acknowledged and qualified to fill the office.

In Psa. xxi. we have this same personage spoken of as asking life which was granted him, "even length of days forever and ever;" and as having a crown of pure gold placed upon his head, and as being made "exceeding glad," and finding out his enemies, etc. This may have had a primary allusion to Solomon, but certainly pointed through him to the "greater than Solomon," even Christ in the days of his conquests.

Solomon's life was one of short duration, compared with him who is granted life for evermore. You may compare this Psalm with the second, and you will find they bear a similarity, one with the other. So with Psa. xxix., xiv., xlvi., xlviii., xlviii., and l. They would all seem to synchronize and point down both to the mighty travailing time and glorious triumph. The forty-eighth Psalm is another which runs parallel in its accomplishment with the second. Here we have the situation of Zion, of such a nature or so desirable as to become the joy of the whole earth, as lying on the "sides of the north, the city of the Great King." Now the city of the Great King is said by the Great King himself, when he stood near there at the time, to be Jerusalem. This confirms what we previously said relative to their being as one and the same when spoken of in Scripture. In the fiftieth Psalm Zion is called the perfection of beauty, and why? Both from the fact of its desirable situation, and that God has now made it his dwelling place, by and from which circumstance it is made to "shine," and here is why it becomes the joy or desire of the whole earth.

In the fifty-sixth Psalm David says: "Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion," etc. You will notice that this Psalm carries us down through the restitution, and points out both the endowment of Zion with beauty, and the wonderful fertility of the land, which sweetly accords with that spoken of by Ezekiel, xxxvi. 8-38. In Psa. lxix. 35, it is said, "God will save Zion, and build up the cities of Judah," etc., and in Psa. lxxii. David looks down through the vista of Solomon's kingdom, and sees through it, and predicts through it the glory of Messiah's kingdom. Here is the two-fold kingdom spoken of, and it does not require much of a discriminating mind to know where to apply the expressions, when to Solomon's and when to Christ's kingdom; when to Solomon and when to Christ.

The seventy-sixth Psalm has particular reference to our subject. So has the eighty-fourth and 122d. The 133d has especial reference to this. Here Zion is selected from all other places, "For the Lord hath chosen Zion, he hath desired it for his habitation; this is my rest forever; here will I dwell," etc. In the 145th the glory and blessedness of the kingdom at Jerusalem is quite minutely portrayed. The 146th closes with this expression: "The Lord shall reign forever, even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations. Praise ye the Lord."

In the 102d Psalm, which we had almost omitted, there is much said in regard to both Zion and Jerusalem, as to its august future, and that the more splendid exhibition of the divine glory is predicated upon the building up of Zion, and that this restoring is furthermore to be accomplished in order that the name of Jehovah should be authoritatively declared to the nations from here, and his praise resounded in Jerusalem. "When the people are gathered together and the kingdoms to serve the Lord." Compare Psa. lxxxvi. 9, Rev. xv. 4. "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob." This expression is given by way of comparison, showing Jehovah's choice, and how much more he esteems Zion and Jerusalem in preference to all other cities or places; even the very gates of Jerusalem he holds dearer than all the surrounding cities or villages you may make mention of—Rahab, or Babylon, or Philistia, or Tyre, or Ethiopia, which were famous places or cities in their shining days of prosperity, but these sink into insignificance in comparison with Jerusalem's or Zion's future glory; and for the matter of birthplace nothing may distinguish an individual so much as this, and to have our name found registered there "when Jehovah shall count, when he writeth up the people." Comp. Ezekiel xiii. 9; Dan. xii. 1; Mal. iii. 16, 17; Luke x. 20; Rev. xiii. 8.

"As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there." Here is another feature—vocalists and musicians will be regularly engaged there, affording additional attractions to its favored denizens, as there is no man who loves God but what loves good music. And here they will have it in its highest perfections, and consecrated to its primal and highest use—the service and praise of God.

"All my springs are in thee," showing that the source of all the Psalmist's consolation sprang in a great measure from this thought of Zion's restoration, of Jerusalem's redemption. Though it was in so remote a period from his time, he looked forward to that day as the center of his hopes—to see his greater Son, the Christ, there seated to reign over the house of Jacob, his progenitors as well as his posterity, for ever and ever. This thought, we say, he carried with him through life, and it tended to smooth many a rough place. His conversation with Nathan, the prophet, makes this obvious, and especially the words he utters before the Lord—"Who am I, O Lord God? and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? And this was but a small thing in thy sight, O Lord God; but thou hast spoken also of thy servant's house for a great while to come, and is this the manner of man, O LORD God?"—plainly insinuating that it would be contrary to the law and order of men, to carry out such a wonderful arrangement, which, of course, it will be. 2 Sam. vii., comp. Psalms lxxxix. 1-4, and, indeed, read the whole Psalm to get the gist of the matter. And this he is found saying, "Remember thy word unto thy servant upon which thou hast caused me to hope." Psa. cxix. 49. Doubtless he had reference here to those many interviews with Jehovah, and the promises which had been given him from time to time.

The Great River Euphrates—Rev. ix. 15; xvi. 12.

Is it Rome or Turkey? Having for a long time believed and taught that it is Rome, I desire space in the RESTITUTION to give at least a part of the evidence.

All seem to agree that Babylon, of chapters xvii. and xviii., is the fallen church, and that the Euphrates is not the literal river bounding the promised inheritance on the north. Then, if neither is literal, they must sustain the same relation to each other as the literal river sustained to the literal city; else how could we read the book and obtain the promised blessing. Ch. i. 3. There was a literal Babylon, and a literal Euphrates, and the city of John's prophecy must be located on the river or all is mere guess-work; and one might guess Turkey, another Greece, and another England.

No one will claim that the beast on which John's Babylon is seated is Turkey. The servants to whom Jesus sent this message on their journey to the promised rest long since passed the courts of literal Babylon, the Medo-Persian line, have left the coasts of Greece far behind, and have been sailing down the Roman shore for more than 1800 years, and still they find Babylon and Euphrates on the line; and now, brethren, I know of no other rule than the one given above by which to read this book. Are we left to guess these things out? or shall we take this God-given rule, and read the book?

In Dan. ii., the metals of the Image sustain the same relation to each other that they do in the minds of men, and in the mineral kingdom. Gold first, then silver, etc. In the symbol of the great tree, the tree sustains the same relations to the creatures in and under it that the kingdoms do to them. In Rev. xii., the sun, moon, and stars are grouped together; the sun first, the moon second, and then the stars. In reading this message in the order in which it is given, we find Euphrates first, then Babylon; and Rome being Euphrates, the great city is located on the river just as they were literally situated.

The woman of chapters xvii. and xviii being Babylon, the beast, upon which the woman sits, with his heads and horns, is the Euphrates. The woman sits on the many waters, and these are "peoples, and nations," etc. She sits on the beast with his seven heads, and these are peoples and nations. The many waters is Euphrates. Here we have three similes brought to a focal center: Waters, many nations; mountains, nations; a beast with heads and horns, nations—and all have branched out of the one. Hence we see the signification of the word Euphrates—fruitfulness.

Of all the prophetic kingdoms, Rome has been the fruitful one. See Daniel's fourth beast with his horns; John's dragon and beast with heads and horns; fruitful in divisions, and fruitful in all the abominations of the earth.

Let us take Shinar, Babel, Euphrates, and Babylon, and see if they are not all grouped together. To do this, let us take the testimony of another witness. Turn to Zech. v., and begin at the fifth verse. The prophet sees an ephah, a measure, on the move; then one woman sits in the measure. He is told that this is wickedness; or that this woman is "that wicked." Now, if the woman of Rev. xvii. is the church, this is the church also. But look again. Two women came out—one sat down and two came out. Then the one must have given birth to the other, and this would identify her as the mother, and this is her eldest daughter. But look once more, for the two take up the measure, and take it to the land of Shinar, to build for it (the measure) a house in Shinar, and this house was to be built there on her own base. Now, all the world knows what the mother's base is, and that the Greek woman, this eldest daughter, agreed to this base; and as both built in Rome, this territory occupied by them is the land of Shinar, and the fourth prophetic kingdom is Euphrates, and the city was built.

Now go back to the literal again; in Shinar, on the Euphrates, Babel was begun. From this central point confusion was spread all over the world. This eldest daughter was conceived and born in confusion. And the last born hails from the same city, and Babel—Babylon—or confusion has again filled the world.

In, or upon, this great river Euphrates the four angels were found. Who are they? To get an answer to this, let us accept the given similitude of waters. Just as one river empties into another, so the peoples of babylon were rushed into Medo-Persia; then these two into Grecia; then the three into Rome; then we have the Assyrians, the Medo-Persians, the Greeks and the Romans all in one empire—in the great river Euphrates. We have the gold, the silver, the brass, the iron mixed with clay, all together. Just as the Cumberland, the Tennessee and the Ohio rivers all merge into the Mississippi, we have all in Euphrates, and all bound in the union of church and state.

But these bands and ligaments are being cut. Reader, the sixth trumpet sounds, and only one more to sound, and the kingdoms of this (Roman) world will become our Lord's and his Christ's. Are you ready?

On this great river the sixth angel pours out his plagues that its waters (nations) may be dried up, that the way may be prepared for those kings of the East—of the sun-rising—of the light—of the dawning. Just as you please; take either; these kings are the saints who arise when the Sun of Righteousness arises with healing in his wings. They are the saints of the Most High, who take the kingdom. These seven, who have the seven last plagues, are saints of the Most High. Just accept the fact that this book is a book of sevens; that seven signifies all the things or persons who are spoken of; and these seven are the seven stars in the right hand of one like the Son of man, in his power.

But who of all the messengers of the churches is willing to place himself in the power of the Anointed alone? Nearly all get their commission from and are controlled by the churches; one church says to her messengers, publish this, and another says, that. Reader, this is confusion, this is Babylon.

And now, dear reader, while you see and know that the four angels, or all the persons of the Roman world, have been preparing so as to be ready to the day, to the hour, to the month, to the year, to do the work assigned to them, let me exhort you to be ready to perform your part. Delay not one moment, for the time is short. No shelter, no refuge, is offered to you in Babylon. Just as Lot had to get out of Sodom, and the disciples out of Jerusalem, so must you get out of Babel. It is too late in the day to build towers, to make a name, to inclose the great city. The chief corner stone is sinking—the central tower is falling, and the crash is at hand. Will you get out? Keep in mind the fact that going from one church to another will not take you out. Babylon is confusion. Then take the straight path of the truth, and keep it till you reach the kingdom. Save some if you can, pulling them out of the fire, but see to it that you are out. Whilst her course is downward, earthward and hellward, let yours be onward, upward and Godward, and may the good Lord hold all the earnest ones. Amen!

Mr. Robert Elliot estimates that there are five millions of persons in the Madras Presidency of India, each of whose property is not worth at the most more than three or four shillings sterling.

Dr. Erisman, a pupil of Pettenkofer, the well-known Professor of Hygiene, Munich, has been applied to by the Russian Government to undertake the direction of disinfecting the battle fields in Turkey.

Plevna contains about 17,000 people, two churches, nineteen mosques, nine minarets; one thousand four hundred and twenty-seven houses are inhabited by Christians, and one thousand six hudred and twenty-seven by Mussalmans.

Writing of the battles at Shipka Pass the correspondent of the London Daily Telegram says: "Let this fact be noted—that all the Turks found killed, had their throats cut, clearly showing that the men were wounded first and slaughtered afterward."

The valley south of the Balkan, through which the Russian Gen. Ghourko lately retreated before the forces of Suleiman, is the centre of the Oriental attar of roses district. Immense fields of rose bushes are grown there in long ridges, like potatoes.

Dr. Farr, in a recent lecture before the British Association, said that in England and Wales the population doubled in about fifty years; in Sweden in sixty years; in Prussia in sixty-four; in Spain in ninety-three; in Italy in one hundred, and in France in only three hundred and sixty-one years.

Experiments with electric lights lately took place at Cronstadt. The apparatus was fixed on board the Peter the Great, and was of such intensity that small print could be read on a vessel moored four cables off. It is contemplated to furnish all the forts at Cronstadt with this light.

The bull regulating the procedure to be observed by the Conclave of Cardinals on the death of the present Pope has been completely drawn up at the Vatican. It empowers the Cardinal Chamberlain either to summon the conclave immediately, or to await the arrival of the foreign Cardinals.

A submarine tunnel is talked about between Spain and Africa under the Straits of Gibraltar. It would be about fifteen miles in length. This, with the tunnel between Dover and Calais, which is seriously contemplated, would give an uninterrupted railroad from England to Tangier of about one thousand two hundred miles in length.

Indications of a prehistoric people, which are plentiful in south western Colorado, have lately been discovered in western Nevada. Antique pottery and undecipherable writings on the rocks are the most common tokens. At one place, engraved upon a rock, is the nude figure of a man, holding in his right hand a shrub, the outlines of which show considerable artistic skill.

The olive tree, like the orange and lemon, is readily grown in California. Heretofore it has been cultivated more for its foliage than any thing else, and its fruit has been allowed to wither and go to waste. Within a year parties have been utilizing the fruit by manufacturing it into oil. Some of this oil has been put into the market and it has found a ready sale. It is of a bright, rich, color, and, if not equal to the pure imported Lucca oil, it is superior to most of the olive oil sold.

The Restitution.

E. L. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, SEPT. 26, 1877.

BROTHER J. F. WAGONER intends visiting Ohio. See his announcement in this paper. It was too late for insertion last week.

ANOTHER quarter of the year ends with this number. Quite a number are falling in arrears with their subscriptions. Will they renew at once, as the current year is one of unusual embarrassment, we shall need the most prompt attention on the part of all our friends to tide us over the remaining part of the year.

IT will be seen in a communication from him that our beloved Brother Bond has become the object of a gratuitous and relentless persecution. We shall not employ the language of bitter invective against the malicious-ness of his enemies in their uncalled-for exhibition of implacable spleen against the course of truth as advocated by our brother. Our prayer is that the Lord will sustain him and lead his persecutors to see their error and repent.

THE Eastern conflict is without any decisive results, after about six months of war, excepting a great destruction of human life. The Russians have been perfectly reckless, owing, no doubt, to an underrating of the power, resources, and fighting qualities of the enemy for whom they have felt a contempt that has led them into hazardous enterprises with most disastrous results. The Turks have probably been better officered than the Russians, as they have not hesitated to avail themselves of distinguished military talent, whether its possessor were some sprig of royalty or not. The Russians' experience has taught them caution, and the war hereafter will be conducted on other principles than hurling battalions against impregnable positions defended with a tenacity of courage inspired by fanaticism and a determination to die rather than yield to the invader. Success has had much to do do in inspiring the courage and perseverance of the Moslems. Should the tide of success turn against the devotees of the Prophet, they will probably lose that heart and spirit that has thus far sustained them. Russian success seems still an assured conclusion, sooner or later. God is in history, and prophecy indicates an important change at hand in the Orient. Turkey is doomed. Her crescent is waning. Her symbol river no longer swells over in floods of devastation. In the hand-writing on the prophetic scroll her days are numbered, and like a dead nation of old her latter end is to perish forever.

THE foreshadowings of the unparalleled time of trouble are already gathering. A terrible volcanic eruption in South America has destroyed life and property to an alarming extent. The sufferings brought upon the inhabitants of the provinces that have become the theater of the great contest in the East are dreadful to contemplate. But the famine in India is the crowning calamity of this year, so pregnant with direful visitations. One account says: "The railway is taxed to its utmost limits, and is bringing four thousand tons of grain a week into the province (of Mysore); but as this will only feed a million and a half of people, the other three millions and a half in Mysore must starve as all the stores of grain in the country are exhausted. Already the sufferings of the people are awful. There is a regular service organized, in addition to the police, to keep the streets of Bangalore clear of the dead and dying, but outside the municipal limits dead bodies are lying in all directions; the lower castes are cooking and eating the bodies." Another account says: "The population in Southern India more or less affected by famine numbers 24,000,000. In the most favorable circumstances, at least one-sixth of the people will die. In Madras, no camp of 3,000 rises morning after morning without leaving thirty corpses. In the interior the distress is most fearful. One gentleman passing down a valley in the Wynaad district, counted twenty-nine dead bodies on the road. A coffee planter seeking shelter from the rain in a hut found six decomposing corpses in it. On any day mothers may be seen in the streets of Madras offering their children for sale, while the foundling portion of the poor house is full of infants, found by the police on the roads, deserted by their parents. Since the famine commenced, 600,000 people have died of want and distress." The rain has failed for three successive seasons. In the best of times the swarming population have but the barest means of subsistence, and sink by thousands when a privation of sustenance takes place. The government has expended $18,000,000 in Madras alone down to the close of July, and millions more can only partially avert the calamity and distress. Land goes out of cultivation because of the death of the tillers, and then the revenues of the government are diminished to as great an extent as the enormous outlays. The future of India is dark in the extreme. Years of returning prosperity will scarcely restore the country to its condition before this appalling calamity befel it. The last paragraph penned upon the prophetic page is a writing of "lamentation, mourning, and woe." Deliverance is the hope of the church.

Exegetical.

Names in Hebrew are not meaningless terms. Thus the name Adam, Hebrew אָדָם, given to the first man has reference to the ground from which he was formed, which is called Adamah, Hebrew אֲדָמָה. The etymology of the name of the great ancestor of the human family would give us its signification earth man or earthling, showing by his very name his earthly origin. As a learned Hebrew professor well remarks, "Supposing the Hebrew language to represent accurately the primary ideas connected with the formation of man, it would seem that the appellation bestowed by God was given to keep alive in Adam the memory of his earthly and mortal nature."

The name Abraham is no less significant of the exalted position he sustains to the human family in the covenants of promise. The Hebrew term אַבְרָהָם Abraham, signifies father of a multitude; showing not only that his lineal descendants should be as numerous as the stars of heaven, and the sand upon the sea shore, but also that he should, through Christ, become the father of a redeemed multitude whom no man can number.

Let us now look into the signification of that name which God has exalted above every name, the name JESUS. This is the Greek form of the Hebrew Jehoshua, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, a word compounded of the two simple terms יְהוָה, Jehovah, and יֵשַׁע, Yeshuah, salvation. This name, dear to God, and inexpressibly dear to man, then means the salvation of Jehovah. It was enjoined upon Joseph by the angel of the Lord to thus name the Savior of the world: "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." Matt. i. 21. How wonderful is the relation sustained to the human family by these three individuals. The first man is of the earth earthy, and his very name Adam indicates his origin. All the descendants of the earthy are earthy also. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." The body formed from the dust was animated with soul-life, and became a soulual body, Greek σωμα ψυχικον, soma psuchi kon, used by the Apostle in contrast with the spiritual body, σωμα πνευματικον, soma pneumatikon, or resurrection body. Thus the first Adam became a living soul. Dr. Bloomfield has given a very good exposition of the Greek phrase ψυχην ζωσαν, living soul, commenting thus: "By which is properly meant a living sentient creature; but in the application made of the passage by the Apostle, it must mean more; namely, a vital principle intended for immortality, but lost by sin, and only to be restored by the last Adam, the antitype of the first." Adam, the earth-man, is the head of an earthy race animated with a soul-life or vital principle forfeited by sin. Jesus, the Jehovah-Savior, is the head of a heavenly family which will be manifested at the resurrection in spiritual bodies. The relation sustained by these three notable personages, which is also well expressed by their several names, may be thus stated: Adam, of earthy origin, stands at the head of the earthy family whose animating or vital principle is forfeited by sin, and, of consequence the earthy organizations return to dust. Abraham, of transcendent faith, stands at the head of the great family of faith as the Father of the faithful. All that are Christ's are the children of God, and all that are Christ's, too, are Abraham's seed, and as the whole family of the redeemed will consist of a "great multitude, which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues," his name Abraham father of a multitude is appropriately expressive of his relation to the believing, obedient, part of the whole human family. But Jesus, the Jehovah-Savior, or, salvation of the Lord, saves his people from their sins, in effecting which, he saves them from death. God has predestined that those whom he will recognize as children, shall be conformed to the image of his Son. The second man is the Lord from heaven; consequently those redeemed from death will, in their resurrection, no longer bear the image of the earthy, but the image of the heavenly. The earthy is soulual, (natural). Greek ψυχικος, from ψυχη, soul, the heavenly is spiritual. Greek πνευματικον, from πνευμα, spirit. The earthy, notwithstanding its soul-life, or animate vitalization, is corruptible; the heavenly, in the spiritual body, and partaking of the nature of the second Adam, who is a quickening or life-giving spirit, is incorruptible: the earthy is humiliated or dishonored: the heavenly is glorified; the earthy is weak; the heavenly is powerful; the earthy is mortal; the heavenly is immortal; in brief the earthy is sown a soulual body (natural body), but it is raised a spiritual body. Immortality belongs not to the earthy and soulual, but to the heavenly and spiritual. The heavenly family are the redeemed and saved, and Jesus, the salvation of the Lord is head and "Savior of the body," the church redeemed from sin and death. Adam, the earthy and soulual (natural), is head of the earthy, soulual, mortal and corruptible race. Jesus, the heavenly and spiritual, is the head of the heavenly, immortal and incorruptible family of the redeemed and saved. Of the living soul nature of the earthy man, immortality and incorruptibility are not attributes, though volumes are written in endeavoring to prove them such, but they belong exclusively to the heavenly spiritual nature, and are absolutely unattainable without that resurrection birth of the Spirit that imparts the image of the heavenly. Only as we are partakers of the Divine nature can we become partakers of immortality and incorruptibility which inherently belong to God alone. God gives eternal life only through his Son, and his transcendent gift of a deathless nature is not bestowed on the earthy and soulual, but on the heavenly and spiritual. We must seek for "glory, honor, and immortality," consequently do not possess them as attributes of the Adamic nature, though it be a soul nature. Our state, our relation, and our very nature must be changed. The salvation in Christ Jesus is a great salvation, delivering us from sin and the bonds of corruption and death, and transforming us into his own heavenly image by a resurrection to life eternal. Let us not neglect it, but seek the life of the world to come.

Our readers will pardon the use of the unauthorized word soulual, as there is imperative need of an adjective that shall sustain the same relation to soul that spiritual does to spirit. The word natural is meaningless in the Apostle's reasoning. If he had been speaking of something in nature, natural would have been the proper adjective. The forms of words may be thus seen: nature—natural; soul—soulual; spirit—spiritual. It is the earthy nature that is soulual; it is the heavenly nature that is spiritual, and —immortal.—[EDITOR.

National Judgment—Little Horn.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Associated signs.—As the people of God were deeply interested in the trial of their great enemy, it is proper that the chief judge should give them notice of its approach. The fact is written upon the face of the heavens. The sun, moon, and stars, are made to give signs of its coming. They mark the beginning of the Judgment Era, when the Father begins to execute judgment on the chief enemy of the saints—the little horn of Daniel, the fourth beast of Revelation, or the dragonic leopard or scarlet wild beast of Rev. xii., xiii. and xvii. chapters, the seven-headed and ten-horned beast of Daniel and Revelations, being the same power. That great national judgment is, in itself, a sign of the coming of the Son of Man, for he terminates judgments now in progress.

Jesus said: "There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." Luke xxi. 25, 26. The signs, connected with this great national judgment and which are designed to draw the attention of the world to the coronation of the Son of Man as King of kings, and to his return, are numerous, but they are so familiar to our readers that it is not necessary, here to repeat them. Two great divisions are made,—"In the heavens, above, and on the earth beneath." Hence we conclude that the signs belong to the physical, as well as to the moral and political worlds. The masses of mankind take more notice of the physical than the moral changes. Great political revolutions have their appropriate symbols (Rev. vi. 12-17). Joel speaks of the "heavens above," and the "earth beneath," and names signs belonging to each. Jesus says: "There will be signs in the sun, moon and stars, and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity." In plain historic prophecy, such as above quoted, no other interpretation is, by any means, consistent.

But, it is objected by some, that "meteors" are not literal stars. All atmospheric phenomena are meteors. They are either luminous or opaque. Storms of all kinds are meteors of the latter class, halos, the ignis fatuus, and shooting-stars of the former. We call all celestial phenomena, visible to the naturo eye, literal. Falling stars, from their motion, are more readily noticed than those stationary. As the same Greek word is applied to each class of stars, the adjective alone determines the class intended. Falling stars, are appropriate symbols of falling persons, and nations. As a proof that shooting stars are intended, we remark that falling is never applied, in Scripture, to the sun, or moon. How consistent with the divine character, that, when about to enter upon a trial, so intimately connected with the destinies of his church and of the nations he should give them timely notice so as to enable them, if they choose, to make due preparation. Thus God had always acted, why vary in the present instance?

Yet these signs must have expositors. And here we are prepared to notice the manner in which God has heretofore dealt with the human family.

He has never left his judgments without expositors. Trace every noted event recorded in the Bible, and you will find that God has made use both of prophets and expositors; the one class to predict events, the other class to expound the nature of said events, and to call the attention of all interested in their accomplishment. Let us notice a few examples:

1. The old world had its prophet and expositor—Noah.—During the long delay of the flood, while the ark is being erected, Noah is preaching righteousness to the ungodly. The flood, we may suppose, was the principal [illegible] of address.

While God sits in judgment, and the testimony against their corruptions accumulates, he sends to them his faithful prophet to declare an eve t, and its bearing on their future destiny. All the inhabitants had an opportunity of learning the nature of the flood (that of waters), its design, the mode of escape, and their duty as connected with said judgment. When it is said, "They knew not until the flood came, and took them all away," we understand that they were so engaged in "eating," and "drinking," "marrying and giving in marriage," that the preaching of Noah had no place in their affections. Our Savior draws the analogy, between that age and its judgment, and the age, whose introduction we are noticing.

2. Israel and Judah had their prophets and expositors.—The judgments of Jehovah fell not upon them without ample warning. They had divine light. No pains were spared, no opportunity neglected. Their duties were taught them, and the punishment God was about to visit on their sins. Every Jew sinned against knowledge. They went into captivity because they persisted in those acts, which, they were taught, would be their ruin.

3. Jerusalem had its faithful watchmen—the prophets.—Many saw the sword coming, and gave the alarm. Such watchmen escaped the guilt of the blood of that people. Christ predicted its second captivity, and said: "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto." Luke xxi. 20, 21.

4. The four Gentile monarchies have had their prophets and expositors.—God re-printed upon the mind of Daniel the metal-clay image, its features and its fate. Additional characteristics are brought to view under the symbols of four beasts, and amplified in the viii., ix., xi. and xii. chapters. A chain of events is here brought to view, extending, from the days of Daniel, to the time when he shall stand in his lot. At every link of this chain God has stationed expositors. Every event in this series has been explained —even as to Cyrus and Alexander—both before and after its fulfillment.

This is true up to the judgment on Daniel's little horn power. Daniel traces the Gentile family, through all its changes and developments to its submersion in the flood of fire. John gives a history of the saints from his days to their triumphant establishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, on the territory promised to Abraham and his seed. An event in Daniel's national line, is thus noticed by our Savior: "When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place,"—intimating that they (his saints) should be so familiar with his predictions as to know when it should take place, and flee as directed. The prophecies of Daniel and John have been familiar to some Christians in every century of the Christian era. Those familiar with ecclesiastical history will be able to trace a line of expositors from the Apostles, even through the dark ages. With the charts of Daniel and John they have been able to locate all the most noted events. We have attempted to prove that Daniel and John delineate the character, trial and execution, of a noted family of civil rulers; and that God has raised up, in every century of its life, persons to identify and trace said body. When his trial is finished, and the execution sentence about to commence, shall no persons be found to apprize the world of the facts and to urge a proper improvement?

We now introduce the following proposition, which we purpose to establish:

Proposition.—God has, according to the revelations made to John, his beloved servant, raised up, commissioned, and sent forth, a class of agents, for the special purpose of calling the attention of the world to the nature of said judgment, and the associated events, and to urge upon all the duties growing out of said events.

The record is as follows: "I saw another angel (messenger) fly in the midst of heaven, having an everlasting gospel (glad tidings) to preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying, with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth and the sea, and the fountains of waters." Rev. xiv. 6, 7.

An event is here enunciated, and its associated duty. Each will be noticed in the order stated.

1. The event.—"The hour of his judgment is come." That we may understand what event is intended, we shall consider the terms "hour," "his," "judgment," and "is come," separately.

a. "The hour."—The Greek word here translated, hour, is, and is used 111 times in the New Testament. In thirty-eight passages it means the one twenty-fourth part of a day. In twenty-seven places it expresses a definite point of time. In one text it denotes prophetic time, and covers fifteen days. In forty-five passages, it denotes a longer or shorter space, without defining its duration. The length of the period must vary with the nature of the events. In this last sense the word is here used. Examples of this kind occur in the following Scriptures: Jno. iv. 21, 23; v. 25, 28, 35; viii. 20; xvi. 2; Rom. xiii. 11; 2 Cor. vii. 7, 8; Philemon 15; Rev. iii. 10; xi. 13; xiv. 15; xvii. 12; xviii. 10, 16, 17, 19. In Rev. xiv. 7, hour means, the time, or period, allotted to this event, has arrived.

b. "His."—Stands for the name of the person. What person is intended? Does it mean the beast's judgment, or God's judgment on the beast, or the judgment of each person of the human race? If either of the former, it is the judgment of the Father, and national; if the latter idea is intended, then it is the Son's personal judgment of the human race. It will be seen to refer to a nation, when the word "judgment," is considered. We render it thus: "The hour of God's judgment" on the agent symbolized by the little horn of Dan. vii., which is the same agent whose words, deeds and fate are recorded in Rev. xiii. 5-10.

c. "Judgment."—What judgment? The Greek word is κρισις, krisis, and is found in forty-eight places in the New Testament. The word which is generally used to define the period is "days." In nine passages, a period is called, "the day of judgment." In one place the length of that day is defined to be a thousand years. The definite article is used before the word judgment, in twelve passages. The term "hour of judgment," is mentioned in two passages (Rev. xiv. 7; xviii. 10). We do not understand it to mean the same as "day of judgment," for the following reasons, viz.: There are at least four distinct judgments noticed in the Apocalypse, that passed on the agent of Rev. xiii. 5-10; and xvi. 2-6, by the Ancient of Days, as stated in Dan. vii. 9, 26.

2. The one inflicted on the harlot—the Babylon of the Apocalypse. (Rev. xviii. 8, 20; xix. 2; see Rev. xvii. 1.)

3. The judgment of the dead, (Rev. xi. 18; xx. 12, 13).

4. The judgment inflicted on the beast and false prophet, (Rev. xix. 19, 20). Two of these judgments are executed before the second coming of Christ, and are, therefore, national. The latter two are executed by the Son in person, after he receives from the Father a kingdom. Dan. vii. 13, 14; Luke xix. 12, 28. Without discriminating these four judgments, and noting the judges, and defining the periods when they occur, we introduce confusion into our interpretations. These judgments we have named in what we consider their consecutive order. All belong to what we have named the judgment era. The first, the session of the Ancient of Days on the little horn, introduces that era, which closes with the submerging of the wild beast and false prophet in the lake of fire. Rev. xix. 20. Which of these four judgments is brought to view Rev. xiv. 7? Answer: The first, the one recorded in Dan. vii. 9, 10, 26.

d. "Is come."—Having defined what judgment is here intended, we can see the propriety of the expression, "is come." The meaning we understand to be this: When this first messenger was dispatched, the period had come when God was to judge and punish this chief persecutor of the saints. He, therefore, sends a messenger to apprise the world of that fact, and to urge upon mankind the duties growing out of that event.

Editor Restitution:—Oh, how I love to read those blessed truths that are sent to me by mail each week. The most I want to live for is to become more acquainted with the blessed truth of the restitution of all things spoken of by all the holy prophets since the world began. I have often wished for the ability and talent to write, and express my good will to ward this precious cause. My heart is often warmed up almost to tears. I am now in my eighty-seventh year, and yet I would gladly live some longer to enjoy reading the Bible which has been a comfort to me for a number of years. I desire to see that dear One come whose hands and feet were pierced by the rugged nails. With what rapture should we gaze on those hands and feet once scarred for us! Brethren and sisters, pray that I may have on the wedding garment and be accepted. I have often desired to meet with the dear friends of Jesus; may he bless them.

Editor Restitution:—THE RESTITUTION still comes freighted with good things, although, owing to my failing sight, I am unable to read much; yet, it is a real comfort to see the dear familiar names of those whose Christian society I have so much enjoyed in former days, or whose writings I have read with so much pleasure and profit. Although I can read but little, I cannot get along without our paper, and I make it do all the missionary work possible. For six months the past year I was unable to read a word. A few years ago we had quite a large congregation of believers here; but they have all moved away, and I do surely, at times, feel lonely, but not sad, for I do not believe it is pleasing to our Father to have his children gloomy and sorrowful, dissatisfied with the position they are called to fill in life, any more than it would be pleasing to a kind parent to have his children murmur and complain about the sadness of their lot. I want to be faithful to the trust reposed in me, and go forth with a glad heart to meet our Savior. We have but a short time to work: let us be faithful.

Editor Restitution:—We could not think of doing without THE RESTITUTION in these eventful times. We are still looking for the return of our blessed Lord. We have but little preaching here this summer, but we have had the privilege of sitting under the sound of Brother C. C. Ramsey's voice. He preached three very able discourses on last Saturday evening and Sunday morning and evening. On Sunday he preached from Daniel, concerning the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, and, to my mind, he made the subject very clear. We have hopes of hearing him more frequently in the future. We are looking with a great deal of interest to the war in Europe, believing it has much to do with the fulfillment of prophecy. Hoping that God's kingdom will soon come, I remain your brother in Christ.

Editor Restitution:—Enclosed find subscription for your paper. I like it better than any religious paper that I have seen. I have become interested in the Word of God, and I am glad that you stick so close to it. We live in a day when the gospel is perverted, but I thank God there are a few that desire the truth and nothing else.

lunged to a living beast. In the work above named, "the data, geographical, historical and chronological," are given in full. I am sorry that I have not a copy to send our Brother. The article which treats of that change is too extended to transcribe in this letter. The change took place in 800, when Charlemagne, emperor of the Germans, was crowned emperor of the Romans. Then was the head, which was, "As it were, wounded to death," "healed." Rev. xiii. 12; also Rev. xvii. 10, 11.

The dividing of the kingdom (Dan. ii. 41 ff.) was not its death. Beasts do not die in giving birth to horns. Gibbon chronicles the decline and fall of one dynasty, quite Roman, and the rise of another Romano-Germanic. No other empire ever had such a mixture of races. The mixture of the Germanic races with the Roman family, in so many ways as slaves, subjects, allies, and conquerors, through such a long series of years, is unparalleled in the world's history. That mixture did weaken, divide and finally conquer the Roman dynasty, and did substitute a German dynasty, (one of clay). Germany was never called a horn, but that dynasty was sustained by other powers (ten horns, in carrying the papal hierarchy). Rev. xvii. 12, 13, 17. The ten horns constituted the seventh or eleven-regal head. The eighth is of the seven, viz., the sixth, or imperial, restored in the Germano-Roman dynasty. Germany came to the front A. D. 800, since which time she has never fallen to the rear.

Only four Gentile empires, So I read Daniel and John. True, they do not say four and no more; but the language used forces me, at least, to that conclusion. Dan. ii. 40-45, seems to limit to four kingdoms, for the Kingdom in verse 40 is called the fourth, the kingdom in verse 41, also in verse 42, is identical with the one called the fourth in verse 40. If not, it might be the twentieth as well as any other number. It is singular, with the pronoun "it." Verse 41.

The sea monster of Dan. vii. 7, is called a fourth beast; continues to the judgment, verse 11, is cast into a lake of fire. In all three places the Kingdom of God succeeds. I see no universal empire between the fourth and that of the God of heaven. To this time there has been no other. And as the fourth, under the German dynasty, now exists, when that is overthrown it will be by the armies of heaven, under the King of kings, in the battle of Armageddon.

That Russia has a mission to carry out in these last days, will not be questioned, by me, at least. What that mission is, I propose to answer as far as my knowledge and ability will allow me.

Russia may have "ameliorated the condition of her Jewish population," yet she is selfish, aspiring, and far-seeing. What she does is for her own aggrandizement.

One that has treated the Jews as Russia, in former days, cannot be depended upon any further than it will promote her own interests.

Russia will be the great enemy of the Jews. Ezek. xxxviii. 3-8; see Ezek. xxxviii. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, to the end; also Ezek. xxxix. 1-20.

A power that is to undertake such a daring robbery as Gog will strive to accomplish, cannot possess any sincere friendship. If Russia is the Gog of Ezekiel, the Jews have everything to fear from that nation.

If Russia is now the Jews' friend, the great crisis of Ezekiel seems to be in the distant future; for there she seeks to rob them. When this power, named in Ezekiel, "comes to the front," it is not to "emancipate" the Jews, but to despoil them of their wealth. So it seems to me. But of that we do not claim to be certain.

Rev. R. C. Shimeall, who began them in R. C. and ends them A. D. 1820, in which year the Turkish power began to be dismembered, and since when this work of cleansing the sanctuary, by wasting the Moslem empire, has been steadily progressing.

But this "cleansing of the sanctuary" is closely connected with "the standing up of Michael," according to Dan. xii. 1, and it might be well for us to inquire, How many Michael's are there? Jude refers to him as the archangel, and Dan. makes him "the great prince which standeth for thy (Daniel's) people, and his standing up introduces "the time of trouble and deliverance to everlasting life;" and in 1 Thess. iv. 16, when "the dead in Christ rise," Paul says "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel;" and in Rev. xii. 7, when Michael and his angels war against the dragon, and that old serpent, Satan, the devil, and his angels are cast out into the earth, immediately a loud voice is heard in heaven saying, "Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ." But now comes perplexity also, for how can Michael stand up (Dan. xii.) before the willful king (xi. 36,) "plants the tabernacle of his palace between the two seas," (v. 45) and how can the Michael of Rev. xii. 7, war against Satan, "the accuser of our brethren," until the Michael of Dan. xii. 1, does stand up for Daniel's people. Will brother P. Alling answer? G. W. STETSON.

Elmira, Pa., Sept. 5, 1877.

Editor Restitution:—I desire to say to the brethren and sisters of the One Faith, through the RESTITUTION, that about two years ago, Brother D. Bonner and myself, landed at Lockford, in San Joaquin county, California, where we yet reside. We were alone in "the faith once delivered to the saints," and would have been very lonely, had it not been for the weekly visits of the RESTITUTION, freighted with God's eternal truth. Although we were few in number, we went to work in the Master's vineyard; but not being of the number who received the ten talents, we did not accomplish much, numerically speaking. Believing as we do, that Gentile time is short, we thought it our duty to have the gospel ably expounded to the dying people of this locality; consequently a correspondence was brought about through the RESTITUTION with Brother Richard Corbaley, of Healdsburgh, Sonoma county, California, whom we induced to come and preach to the people at Lockford. We had fears that we could not get an able man, but thanks to God, our fears vanished as the dew before the morning sun, under the sound of Brother Corbaley's voice.

Our meeting commenced on the evening of the 4th inst., and closed on the 16th inst., during which time Brother Corbaley delivered fifteen discourses—the best, I think, I ever heard, (and I have been blest with the privilege of hearing many good sermons). The results of the meeting exceeded our expectations. Three were immersed into the Christ and an anxiety created in the minds of others to know the truth as revealed in God's Word. We organized in church capacity while Brother Corbaley was with us. There are eleven of us now. We desire to be known as the Church of God, at Lockford, San Joaquin county, California. Brother Corbaley is at this time holding a series of meetings at Willow Slough, in Yolo county, California, twelve miles west of Sacramento City. May God bless his able efforts and finally reward him for his labors, in the kingdom of his dear Son. Brethren, let us be up and doing; the time is short. The Lord will soon come. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.

LONDON, September 23. Osman Pasha attacked the Gravitza redoubt on Thursday night, and was repulsed with heavy loss.

LONDON, September 23.—The Russian official bulletin, dated Gorny-Studen, Saturday, says the Turks renewed the bombardment of the Schipka Pass positions Friday. In the afternoon they began an assault upon the right flank, but were repulsed. They then attacked the left and centre, and were likewise repulsed. Fighting lasted until night. It is thought they attack would be renewed Saturday.

A Russian official dispatch admits a loss in Schipka Pass September 17 of thirty-one officers and 1,200 men killed and wounded.

DIED.

SKEENS—Of consumption, August 29, 1877, Sister Hattie Skeen, daughter of Brother James and Sister Skeen, aged two months and eight days.

Nearly twenty years ago the author united with this family at Jamestown, Ottawa county, Michigan, during a series of meetings held in that then new place. The preaching of the gospel of the kingdom caused a great interest among the people. A considerable number of professors and nonprofessors embraced the gospel hope and were baptized, "both men and women." Among the first to be Brother and Sister Skeen. They have been pillars in the Church of God ever since that time. By precept and example they have recommended the same hope to their children.

Hattie, their eldest, and their only daughter, adopted and advocated the Faith of Clarence with much zeal. Her means of enlightenment were simple—consisting not only of the instruction of parents at home, but the public teaching of God's word from the lips of very many of God's servants who have expounded the word of life from time to time in that place. For several years past she has made herself very useful and respected in the various work of teaching the youth classes at Sabbath-school at the same time labored to convince unbelieving parents of the truth of the gospel. In this work her labors last winter were severe, during the spring Sabbath-school and other diseases made fatal ravages. She had hoped to join her death would relieve her from baptism, when I was there the first of July, but she was not able at that time. "The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law." Knowing herself to be a lawful subject of the kingdom, and heir of the glorious inheritance of Brother Myers, and Brother Prosser, of Missouri. The object of the meeting is to build such other organization to the will of God, and was enabled to rejoice in hope of the glory of God at the resurrection of the just. God grant that all her brothers may lay hold of eternal life and put on Christ before even by being toppled into him.

At her funeral a large concourse gave good attention to a discourse by the writer from the comforting words of Paul to the mourning Christians of this time. "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning those which are asleep, that you sorrow not, even as others which have no hope." 1 Thess. iv. 13. This only hope that Paul ever presented to the afflicted, was shown to be—

1. The personal descent of the Lord from heaven with a shout—with voice of archangel and trump of God to awaken the sleeping saints to eternal life, and change the living to immortal, spiritual and heavenly bodies.

2. The meeting in the air from which time they will be with the Lord in the heavenly country of earth made new, and "kingdom under the whole heaven."

Editor Restitution:—Our little body of the one precious faith have been called again to mourn the loss of one dear to us as well as to numerous friends and acquaintances. This time the monster, death, has laid his icy grasp on Sister Keziah Helm, wife of Brother James Helm, of this town, Ravanna. Sister Helm leaves three children to mourn her loss. Two of them, Ella and Mary E., are of the faith, being aged respectively twenty-one and seventeen years. The other child is only about one and one-half years old. Brother Helm came to this town about two years ago, from Oregon, to which state he moved from Arkansas. He did not live very long in Oregon, though long enough to bury two darling children. Sister Helm was forty-one years of age, and had been a firm believer in the gospel faith about two years.

Yours in the gospel hope.

JOHN A. HOBART.

FLEMING—Sept. 13, 1877, at the house in Warrensburg, Missouri, of consumption, our much beloved brother, Elijah Fleming, aged forty-seven years.

I have known Brother Elijah Fleming from an infant, as he was raised in our father's family, and we loved him as a brother in the truth. He was a good man, though, like all others, imperfect; yet he had many noble principles of virtues. He possessed a kind heart, one much devoted to the interests of others. He was a good neighbor, a kind and affectionate husband and father. In early life he embraced the faith of the Christian or Disciple church, and was a worthy member of that body until the mortality of man and the unconscious state of the dead, and eternal life only through Christ, was proclaimed. He was among the first to embrace these truths, and was always a bold and zealous advocate of them, and many others of a kindred nature. As all well know who knew him. His affliction was protracted, yet he bore it, still manifesting a resigned or grum. In the early part of his sickness he was anxious to get well, and said he thought he would like to live until Christ comes. But near the close of his life, he said it made no difference with him; he was ready to live or die. "Ready? Yes: to fall asleep in Jesus, blessed hope: that they who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep."

He leaves a bereaved family—a wife, two daughters, and a son—who have the entire sympathy of the entire community.

Funeral services by brother, S. K. Howard, of Kentucky, who spoke from a few favorite texts of the deceased, many of clearly the state of man in death, and the wisdom and "unity of God's plan of redemption in the resurrection of the dead.

Oh! Why Should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?

The author of the following beautiful poem is unknown. It was published more than forty years ago, and was then said to have been of Jewish origin and composition, and we think, was credited to the "Songs of Israel."
MRS. LUCIUS H. CAREY.*

Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a swift, fleeting meteor, a fast flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
Man passes from life to his rest in the grave.

The leaves of the oak and the willows shall fade,
Be scattered around and together be laid;
And the young and the old, and the low and the high,
Shall moulder to dust and to other shall lie.

The infant a mother attended and loved,
The mother that infant's affection who proved;
The husband that mother and infant who blessed,
Each, all, are away to their dwellings of rest.

The maid on whose cheek, on whose brow, in whose eye,
Shone beauty and pleasure—her triumphs are by,
And the memory of those who loved her and praised,
Are alike from the minds of the living erased.

The hand of the king that the sceptre hath borne;
The brow of the spriest that the mitre hath worn;
The eye of the sage and the heart of the brave,
Are hidden and lost in the depth of the grave.

The peasant, whose lot was to sow and to reap;
The herdsman, who climbed with his goats up the steep;
The beggar, who wandered in search of his bread,
Have faded away like the grass that we tread.

The saint who enjoyed the communion of heaven,
The sinner who dared to remain unforgiven,
The wise and the foolish, the guilty and just,
Have quietly mingled their bones in the dust.

So the multitude goes, like the flower or weed
That withers away to let others succeed;
So the multitude comes, even those we behold,
To repeat every tale that has often been told.

For we are the same our fathers have been;
We see the same sights our fathers have seen—
We drink the same stream and view the same sun,
And run the same course our fathers have run.

The thoughts we are thinking our fathers would think;
From the death we are shrinking our fathers would shrink,
To the life we are clinging they also would cling;
But it speeds from us all, like a bird on the wing.

They loved, but the story we cannot unfold;
They scorned, but the heart of the haughty is cold;
They grieved, but no wail from their slumberers will come;
They joyed, but the tongue of their gladness is dumb.

They died, aye! they died; and we things that are NOW,
Who walk on the turf that lies over their brow,
Who make in their dwellings a transient abode,
Meet the things that they met on their pilgrimage road.

Yea! hope and despondency, pleasure and pain,
We mingle together in sunshine and rain;
And the smiles and the tears, the songs and the sighs,
Still follow each other, like surge upon surge.

'Tis the work of an eye, 'tis the draught of a breath;
From the blossom of health to the paleness of death,
From the gilded saloon to the bier and the shroud—
Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud.

*The author of these lines was Wm. Knox, who published a little volume entitled, "Songs of Israel," nearly fifty years ago. These lines were highly eulogized by Professor Lincoln.—ED.

The Analogy Between Dan. xi. 40-45 and Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix.

1. According to Daniel (xi. 40, 42,) the king of the north will pass through the "glorious Holy Land" into Egypt, at the "time of the end." According to Ezekiel (xxxviii. 16,) Gog will invade "the land of Israel" in the "latter days." The difference between the "time of the end" and the "latter days," is simply this: "The time of the end" marks the epoch which begins the "latter days," while "the latter days" designate the circle of time intervening between "the time of the end" and the end itself. Thus these two phrases refer to the same period in the world's history.

2. According to both these prophets, this king is located north of the Holy Land, which, according to the covenant, extends to the Euphrates. Daniel calls him "the king of the north," and Ezekiel affirms that Gog shall come from his place in "the north parts." Ezek. xxxix. 15. Under another head it will be shown that "the land of Israel" is south of this northern power. According to Daniel the king of the north will pass through this land in his southern march into Egypt. The armies of the Czar of Russia are marching now in the direct route south by way of Kurl and Erzeroum, through Asia Minor and Palestine, to Egypt. According to Ezekiel, Gog's place is north of the "land of Israel." Ezek. xxxviii. 15, 16. Also in verse second in the same chapter, Gog is "the chief prince of the land of Magog, Meshech and Tubal." My Bible Dictionary informs me that the grandsons of Noah, Gog and Magog, settled in the present territory of Russia—that in process of time, Gog became the king, and the descendants of Magog the subjects. Not only so, but geographically the empire of Russia is north of the Holy Land, which, according to the covenant, extends to "the great river Euphrates." According to these two prophets, the king of the north and Gog will invade the same land at the same time; they must, therefore, be one and the same power. The Greek rendering of the Hebrew words, "Gog of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal," is translated "the chief Prince of Ros Mesech and Thobel." According to the researches of the most noted writers on the meaning of these words, Ros stands for Russia, Mosc for Muscovey, Tobel for Tobolski—all of which mark the vast empire of Russia as the one over which Gog rules or shall rule in the latter days.

3. The king of the north is to come "like a whirlwind," and Gog from his place in the "north quarters" is to "come like a storm." Two words significant of the same idea.

4. The king of the north referred to by Daniel, and Gog referred to by Ezekiel, are to invade the same land at the same time; they must, therefore, be the same power.

5. Ethiopia and Libya shall be with him according to both these prophets. Dan. xi. 40; Ezek. xxxviii. 5.

6. According to Daniel, Michael, the Legate of God Almighty, is to overthrow the king of the north and his army; and according to Ezekiel, the Lord destroys with overwhelming judgments the armies of Gog, which shall spread like a cloud over the mountains of Israel. Dan. xii. 1, Ezek. xxxviii. 18, 20 22.

This harmonizes perfectly with the instrumentalities by which the metallic image (which shall be represented in the great battle of God Almighty) shall be broken to pieces, ground to powder, and scattered to the winds, by the stone exhumed from the mountain without hands—when, according to the same angelic expositor, "the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold, shall be broken to pieces together, and become like the chaff of the summer threshing floors; and the wind carries them away, that no place is found for them." Dan. ii. 34, 35. These six points of identity must suffice to establish the fact that these two prophets referred to the Russian empire with its proud Autocrat as the Gogian power who should sweep like a resistless storm or whirlwind over what was once the magnificent Ottoman empire; and who with Gomer (the head of the great Germanic family) will be more than a match for half the world; but who will meet upon the lofty heights of Zion a greater than the allied armies of earth, to-wit: Great Michael, the Generalissimo of the armies of heaven.

We find, by reference to Ezekiel xxxviii. and xxxix., that there was to be one and perhaps two invasions of the Holy Land, before the final whirlwind move. God says, addressing Gog, "And I will turn thee back, and put hooks in thy jaws." Ezek. xxxviii. 4. Referring to the instrumentalities to be employed in drawing this northern power back, God says, "And I will draw thee back with a hook of six teeth." Ezek. xxxix. 2. Marginal reading. God operates with nations in controlling, scourging, or destroying nations. Any number of examples might be given. When the seal of secrecy was broken in the Paris convention, A. D. 1856, it was seen that six nations were in alliance against Russia. These nations were, England, France, Austria, Prussia, Sardinia and Turkey. Great Nicholas seized upon a difficulty in reference to the holy sepulchers at Jerusalem as a pretext for sending his armies into the Wallasian, Moldavian and Georgian principalities. He was not prepared to fulminate a general war upon the world, nor did he intend to do so. He only intended to place his finger upon the world's pulses to see how they would beat when he should strike for the golden key of the Mediterranean, and according to the declaration of Napoleon of universal empire. But when he saw the alliance of six nations against him, he saw that it would be bad policy to prosecute the war further in that direction. Thus he withdrew his armies from those principalities, and environed them with what was then supposed to be the invulnerable walls, Sebastopol. With what result, all are acquainted.

The invasion referred to, was the first move against Turkey after the king of the south had pushed at him. This move, therefore, could not be the last one, because in that case there would have been no turning back of the king of north, as foretold by the prophet. Never has a prophecy been more literally fulfilled than the one just referred to. The question may be pertinently asked at this point of the investigation, is the present movement of Russia the last great whirlwind move? I think not. The restoration of the Holy Land, and Daniel's people, and their dwelling in unwalled villages, in peace with all nations, without bars or gates, having no preparations of defense, indicating that they apprehend no danger;—this teaches to my mind that the Eastern question will be amicably adjusted, and that with the consent and co-operation of all nations the Jews will return to their own land—not only the millions of poor, but the rich merchants and bankers will go. It will be no great political or religious issue that will draw the king of the north against the "glorious Holy Land and Daniel's people." It will be to gratify sordid avarice. While at peace with all the world, he will look with a covetous eye upon the hoarded billions glittering in the coffers of the wealthy Jews, and their flocks and herds running over Judea's hills and valleys; and will say, "I will go up to the land of unwalled villages: I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates. To take a spoil, and to take a prey; to turn my hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited, and upon the people that are gathered out of the nations, which have gotten cattle and goods that dwell in the midst of the land." Ezek. xxxviii. 10, 11, 12. Please observe:—

1. According to Gabriel, no motive prompts Gog to move against that land with "many people," a great company and mighty army, except a sordid desire to possess the immense wealth of the Jews which will have culminated in that land when the richest bankers and merchants in the world shall have settled there.

2. That land will have been restored and the Jews gathered out of the nations, when Gog makes his final move against it.

3. The Jews will be dwelling safely in unwalled villages, showing that they are at peace with the world, and apprehend no danger from any quarter.

Who will contest the right of the Czar of Russia to rob the Jews? Answer: Sheba and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish with all the young lions thereof, shall say unto thee, art thou come to take a spoil? hast thou gathered thy company together to take a prey? to carry away silver and gold, to carry away cattle and goods, to take a great spoil? England is evidently the lion power who, in conjunction with France, Austria, Spain with all Mohammedan countries, and all the Jews in that land, will unite against Gog and all his bands, and Gomer and all his bands, and Italy, which will be in alliance with Germany. Thus the prophetic kosmos will be about equally divided. The great Germanic family, with Emperor William at their head, are the descendants of Gomer the grandson of Noah. It will be seen that all the elements of the metallic image will be represented in the Gogian army—and yet great Gog at the head of this great confederation—united, not by conquest, but by alliance. When the Czar of Russia shall control the ancient territory of Syria, he will be the golden head, the same as Napoleon, when he controlled Rome and Italy, was one of the heads of the scarlet colored beast, notwithstanding his capital was in Paris. The power that rules, or controls another, is the de facto head, no matter where his capital may be located. Whatever power controls, Rome is the beast with his historic seven heads and ten horns, whether the Pope, the Napoleon, or Victor Emanuel. Whatever power controls, Constantinople is the great red dragon with his historic seven heads, ten horns and crimson color, whether the Cæsars, the Sultans of Turkey, or Czar of Russia. When, in the final move of great Gogian power, Persia shall be with him, as foretold by Ezekiel, then will the breast and arms of silver have taken their position under the head of gold, in the reconstruction of this great political man, standing with one foot in Rome and the other in Constantinople. When the Czar of Russia shall be the civil, as he is now the spiritual head of the Greek element of the metallic image, then will the belly and sides of brass have taken their position; and when Victor Emanuel, in conjunction with the Emperor of Germany, shall be in alliance with the Czar of Russia, then will the legs, feet and toes, have taken their position under the Gogian chieftain, who, from his position and achievements, was recognized by the prophet as the leader, or chief power in the great confederation of nations. Thus the clay, the iron, the brass, the silver and the gold will exist together (having been welded by alliance, not by conquest), to be broken to pieces together upon the mountains of Israel. Of course, as universal powers, they could not exist contemporaneously, but as local powers they can and will thus exist. It will not be a fifth universal empire, but a confederation of nations, representing the metal which symbolized the local kingdoms, or territories in which culminated the numerical power which ruled the world, in its four imperial phases.

In our efforts to oppose those from whom we may differ, there is danger of being hypercritical. We need not expect the counterpart of every attribute of smiles used to represent events in the world's history. We might ask the question, what the ears, hair, mouth, fingers, etc., of the image represented; or what legs, tail, etc., of the four beasts of Daniel represented. As a matter of fact, the bones of the four empires exist, and when united, by alliance, or conquest, into a confederation, they will constitute a political man, the same as the bones in the valley, when united, will represent the whole house of Israel. Ezek. xxxvii. Of course these four paragraphs of the metallic image, must exist together to be broken to pieces together. According to Daniel and Ezekiel, Gog and Gomer, with a mighty army, will be victorious until they meet Michael, the chief of the armies of heaven, who shall stand up for the deliverance of Daniel's people, when no power on earth can help; and the proud Autocrat shall be hurled from the lofty heights of Zion, and his allied armies shall be dashed to pieces upon the mountains of Israel and they shall find an inglorious grave in Haman-gog. Report of Annual Assembly.

The annual assembly of the Church of God met, according to announcement, in Winchester, Va., at the house of the brethren, on the 4th of August, and while the writer was the only speaker in attendance, that fully advocates the principles we cherish, the other preaching brethren being hindered from coming, Brother B. F. Boyer having received a note from a believer of the gospel, to hold a meeting on the first Sunday of our assembly, and assist her in having the saving name Jesus Christ named upon her, which he thought he could do, and then come on to the assembly; but his health would not admit of it, and Brother J. D. Boyer writes me that he was too badly swollen from poison oak to attend. Notwithstanding, it will be seen that the meeting was to the glory of God who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. Having had some cards struck, you will please insert one here:

Announcement! Annual meeting at Winchester, Va. The annual assembly of the Church of God, will be held at the house of the brethren, in the city of Winchester, Va., commencing on Saturday, August 4th 1877, and will, if the Lord will, continue over the first and second Sundays, and as we maintain that there is but one great common school of Christ, on the earth, and all who have but one truth are thus far advanced in this school, and all who have become graduates of Christ's love, should heed the divine injunction: to call no man master upon earth, for one is your master even Christ, and all ye are brethren, and that all such constitute the Church of God; this grant, including all the land. All are respectfully invited to attend and hear the great doctrine of repentance and remission of sins, preached in the only and all-saving name of Jesus Christ. The import or significance of that name fully and Scripturally explained, and the great starting truth brought to light, that believers of the gospel do not obtain the saving benefits of that name, according to the order of God, by having the name of Father, Son and Holy Ghost named upon them in their baptism, and many other kindred truths, for the mutual edification and instruction of the assembly. So come one, come all! And let us imitate in the good old town of Winchester the model Church of God, of the Apostles' planting, who were of one heart and of one soul; all that believed were together, and the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved. ELDER B. J. MONDAY.

N. B.—All who attend on the first Sunday can witness the Scriptural idea of organizing such an assembly, so they may decide for themselves whether it is of God or no. All it will cost will be a prayerful hearing and Scriptural investigation, like the noble Bereans of old, to see if what is taught is so or not. July 25, 1877.

After the assembly got into working order, the time was spent in reasoning out of the Scriptures to respectable, intelligent, and attentive congregations, in the investigation of the great truths presented therein; whereupon, on Monday, the 6th, three very worthy students in the Lord's school, who being taught in the things of the kingdom of God, and having said to each other, that if the import of the name of Jesus Christ, was made plain at the meeting, that they would prove their fidelity to the truth by obedience, accordingly went to the water, and openly, before a gazing multitude, confessed their undoubting faith in the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ.

I, then in reply said, that with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation, and baptized them in the name of Jesus Christ, (according to the command of the Most High God, by the mouth of his chosen Apostle,) for the remission of sins. Thus, as a virgin throws off her maiden name, in her espousal to her husband, and henceforth to the honor of both her father and husband, acknowledges no other name only the one to whom she has given her hand as a companion for life, as a Sarah of old did to Abraham, so these faithful) Two of these judgments are executed before the second coming of Christ, and are, therefore, national. The judgment inflicted on the harlot—Babylon of the Apocalypse. (Rev. xvii. 8, 20; xix. 2; see Rev. xvii. 1.)

The brethren, in connection with the farewell greeting, gave the right hand of fellowship to those brethren who had for the first time partaken of the institution according to the sacred order; then our dear old Brother Himes asked to be heard for a few moments. He said that he thanked God that he had ever lived to meet with such a band of brethren and sisters as this; and he thanked God that it had been his happy privilege to join in with them. He went on to say that he had mingled with several religious elements during his life, but he had never seen anything rising his own words, like this. And to say mind, said he, turning to the congregation, according to my understanding of the Scriptures, it is the only sure plan for salvation. He said he was convinced that there was no other place to go, whereupon there was a reference made to the time when all left our blessed Lord but his chosen Apostles; and he asked if they would also go away; and Peter said, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life," etc.

I then proposed that we all give our hands again to the old brother, during which time he publicly resolved, and exhorted the brethren, to hold out faithful to the end, and they would receive a crown of glory that faileth not away. At the close of his remarks there was scarcely a dry eye in the house. It surely is cheering to hear such testimony from one who has just arisen to walk in newness of life. The assembly was then, in a short prayer, commended to God and the word of his grace, which is able to build us up, and give us an inheritance among them that are sanctified, to meet again, if the Lord will, at the same time and place, in A. D. 1878. N. J. MOTHERAL

Winchester, Va.

Years. The definite article is used before the word judgment, in twelve passages. The term "hour of judgment," is mentioned in two passages (Rev. xiv. 7; xviii. 10), which we do not understand it to mean the same as "day of judgment," for the following reasons, viz.: There are at least four distinct judgments noticed in the Apocalypse, that passed on the beast of Rev. xiii. 5–10; and xvi. 2–9, and the Ancient of Days, as stated in Dan. vii. 9, 26.

2. The one inflicted on the harlot—Babylon of the Apocalypse. (Rev. xvii. 8, 20; xix. 2; see Rev. xvii. 1.)

3. The judgment of the dead, (Rev. xx. 12, 13).

4. The judgment inflicted on the beast and false prophet, (Rev. xix. 19, 20; xx. 10).

These judgments are executed before the second coming of Christ, and are, therefore, national. The judgment inflicted on the harlot—Babylon of the Apocalypse. (Rev. xvii. 8, 20; xix. 2; see Rev. xvii. 1.)

The judgment of the dead, (Rev. xx. 12, 13).

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the re-establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortalized saints co-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Jerusalem, the City of God.

BY WM. SHEPHERD.

But let us see what others have spoken in reference to this glory. We shall begin with Isaiah, and only at most give the place where it is recorded, and quote but a few words.

"And I will turn my hand upon thee and purely purge away thy dross. . . . I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning; afterward thou shalt be called the city of righteousness," etc. Isa. i. 25-27. Compare Isa. ii. 1-5; Isa. iv. Observe the words, "in that day shall the branch of Jehovah be beautiful and glorious, and the fruit of the earth shall be excellent and comely. . . . And And it shall come to pass that he that is left in Zion, and he that remaineth in Jerusalem, shall be called holy, (see Zech. xiv. 20, 21), everyone that is written (or registered) among the living in Jerusalem."

In another chapter we have Zion personified and represented as saying "the Lord hath forsaken me," etc. But see what the Lord says in reply to these murmurings and lamentations. "I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands, (alluding to the Oriental custom of imprinting with India ink some device or figure upon the hands by way of memorial;) thy words are continually before me," etc.

This vision of beauty, or picture, is ever before the Lord, as the artist has some landscape or beautiful figure in his mind until he carries it out in reality, in a visible and tangible form; so with the blessed God: he will retain it there until we see it wrought out in the restitution of all things.

In Isa. iii. Zion and Jerusalem are personified again, and exhorted to awake, put on strength, and don her beautiful garments of salvation, etc., while the surrounding waste places and her watchmen are called upon to sing together.

Isa. liv. calls upon Zion as a barren woman to break forth into singing, "For thy maker is thy husband;" who had been forsaken for a moment, but now is to be gathered with great mercies, addressing her as "afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted."

This could never apply to the great nominal church body; for they certainly have most all the comfort this world can afford. Besides, they are at ease; and do they not claim to have all they want? Rev. iii. 17. Though it is a claim founded on a dangerous delusion, as the next verse proves.

"Behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires," etc. Now, if this is the material which is to compose the foundation, what will the superstructure be? Something surpassing all of our conceptions of worth and beauty, no doubt conformable to the words of our text: "Glorious things are spoken of thee," etc. But for the glory which is predicted of Zion, we have only carefully to read the sixtieth chapter. This exceeds all other descriptions that we may find in prophecy. The sixty-first, sixty-second, sixty-third and 65 chapters contain much to the point.

In Jer. iii. 17, we learn that Jerusalem is to be accounted the seat of universal empire, and that after the sword of the Lord has passed among the nations and they are compelled to drink the cup of his wrath which they have filled up themselves, as described in the twenty-fifth chapter, then Jerusalem is to regain her independence and Zion her liberty from the yoke of heathen bondage. See xxx. 16, 31, especially verses 12, 25, 28, 29; xxxiii. and xxxiv., especially verses 10-12.

We pass over the greater part of Ezekiel, and simply refer the reader to the minute description of the magnificent temple as recorded in chapters forty to forty-eight, inclusive, containing an account of the ordinances of the house and the new division of the land.

Hosea speaks more concerning Israel's restoration than Jerusalem's. The last chapter is very beautiful and encouraging on this point.

Joel gives us a very graphic and powerful description of the restoration of Zion and Jerusalem. After the record of the great gathering of the multitudes in the valley of decision to battle while the heavenly luminaries withdraw their shining, being obscured by the immense clouds of smoke that arise from the explosion of great quantities of gunpowder, then it is said; "And the Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and the earth shall shake. . . . but Judah shall dwell forever, and Jerusalem from generation to generation, for I will cleanse their blood, that I have not cleansed, for the Lord dwelleth in Zion."

Notwithstanding Amos sees in vision "a basket of summer fruit," which he was instructed was a suitable emblem that the end had come upon Israel and the Lord would pass them by no longer, but that he would execute his judgments upon them, even that he would send a famine, "not of bread, nor thirst for water," but of hearing the words of the Lord, yet in the latter days, this prophet speaks in glowing terms of the raising again of of the tabernacle of David and building up the ruins, etc.

Obadiah faithfully accords with Amos, although his prophecy is the briefest of any of them; his closing statement is, "And Saviors shall come upon Mount Zion, to judge the mount of Esau; and the kingdom shall be the Lord's."

Micah speaks more of the ingathering of the people than the place. He fully agrees with Isaiah as to that very same Zion and Jerusalem which was plowed as a field, and became as heaps, that they should be restored in the last days. Micah iii. 12; iv. 1-8. Observe the last part of the last chapter, giving us the utmost assurance that God will perform his "truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham which he had sworn unto our fathers from the days of old."

Zephaniah speaks of the gathering of the nations, etc., that he may pour out upon them not his grace but his indignation, after which he exhorts the daughters of Zion and Jerusalem to sing and be glad inasmuch as in her reinstatement "the King of Israel, even Jehovah, should be in the midst of her," etc. See the last part of the last chapter.

Haggai makes it clear that subsequent to the universal shaking down of all things susceptible of being shaken, that then, as an offset, the "desire of all nations shall come," and the "glory of the latter house shall be greater than the former," and that Jehovah would give peace in that place as never before. See the second chapter.

Zechariah is so full, so replete, and so fraught with prophecies concerning the restitution, that we hardly know where to go to select any particular passages treating upon this sublime subject. Hence we wish the reader to look over the entire prophecy, which seems but one continuous prophecy concerning this matter. We will say, however, that the prophecy is marked by two features which appear to mark all prophecies concerning this subject, viz., by a great battle being fought in or adjacent to Jerusalem, prior to the deliverance of Jerusalem and Israel. It seems the conflict must come before the victory, the battle before the conquest, the turmoil before peace. So prophecy lays it down. Amen! We have no objections. Let the will of the Lord be done.

There are many other prophecies much further back from the point we have quoted, as well as in advance of it, but let this suffice.

And now, taking all of these prophecies in the aggregate, how true the words of our text, "Glorious things are spoken of thee, city of God. Selah!" Amen! Even so! Hallelujah! (Which the word "selah" denotes.)

And now we inquire, Why should Jerusalem and Zion be selected above all other cities or places as the future dwelling place of Jehovah? This is readily seen from the fact of its being founded by Melchizedek, who was to God the first priest and king we read of, and hence a most fitting type of Christ in his coming reign, conjointly as king and priest.

Again, from the fact that Jehovah's name is forever associated with Jerusalem, both in profane and sacred history, so much so that he is called "the God of Jerusalem." Ezra vii. 19. From the fact that he had chosen that his name might be there forever, and his eyes and his heart perpetually. 2 Chronicles vii. 16. Compare 1 Kings ix. 3. From the fact that it is the place above all others of the most hallowed memories, endeared to him by everything the most precious and sacred that we can possibly conceive. The very land is holy, being both the birth-place and the burial-place of the holy patriarchs and prophets and apostles since the world began—the birth-place of the Son of God—the scene of his sufferings and death, resurrection and ascension. From the fact of its being the repository of God's truth for ages; the place where the first temple service was introduced, and where the first house was erected which he recognized as his.

Again, Jerusalem should be chosen as the city and center of universal empire, because it is "beautiful for situation" [illegible] in the interval between the most central part of the globe—hence the most accessible to all peoples as a great commercial point and general mart of nations. The advantage here of this location is seen in a religious point of view, in becoming the great central depot or reservoir of all religious truths—"the law (the civil code) shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord (religious truths) Jerusalem." This, then, will be the great repository for all civil and religious knowledge and how proper that it should be there at central point of the world as we believe has been fully proved.

And should the earthquake which is to occur when Christ shall plant his feet on the Mount of Olives, when he comes produce the effect as Major Scott Phillips in his Mathematical and Geographical Lecture on Palestine has said) that is, open a valley leading from the Great or Mediterranean Sea to the Dead Sea, which is said to be 1,312 feet below the Mediterranean, causing the waters to rush from thence into the Dead Sea, which would be a resurrection of that sea from the dead, infusing into it a new life, by the mighty flow of its comparatively living waters, and replenishing it with myriads of living fish; should this take place, it might prove to be above all others, "the river of God" spoken of, which is "to make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles (or dwelling) of the Most High." Psa. xlvi. 4. This would render Jerusalem still more a central point of commerce—this river being navigable, being easy of access by the largest vessels, precluding the necessity of having everything carried to and fro from the great sea by railroad.

It might be interesting to some by prolonging our remarks here, showing further how "beautiful for situation (or desirable is the city) is Mount Zion," etc., but as our article has extended beyond its limits now, may it be our happiness to in due time realize the beauty of Zion's situation, and behold with our own eyes the fulfillment of those glorious things which are spoken of both Zion and Jerusalem, and become the favored recipients of those rich provisions which are made for her (Psalms cxxii. 15.), and the happy denizens of the place and homestead of the Great King, who is to reign and rule there over the world.

The belief that baptism ought to be administered by immersion with the face downward, has spread among the Southern negroes, and in Raleigh recently, fifty-one chose that mode.

Orthodoxy vs. Orthodoxy.

It is very common for our brethren to refer to those who differ with us as orthodox, especially on the questions of man's immortality, and its cognate eternal punishing of the wicked.

Perhaps, Mr. Editor, you may think it well to publish some declarations of standard authors on the subject of man's immortality. The following is from Olshausen's Com., volume IV, page 250, and on 1 Cor. xv. 16-18, omitting Greek quotations:

"Paul then proceeds to generalize his statement, and proves to his readers, that if there is no resurrection their own faith is as nothing, for neither they, nor those believers already dead, could have forgiveness of sins. Finally, if the forgiveness of sins appears linked to the resurrection, and not to the death of Christ, we are to bear in mind the fact that the two are necessary co-relatives; the resurrection is equivalent to death, vanquished by the resurrection, and death is equivalent to resurrection, by which death is annulled."

19 and 20: "If, thereforee, there were no resurrection, and consequently no kingdom of God, no restoration to paradise, the Christians sacrificing everything in his life in order to gain all in the next, were the most miserable of men. . . . But the apostle by no means recognizes the possibility of existence as a pure spirit without bodily organs; the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the name, are alike unknown to the entire Bible; and, indeed, with justice, because a personal consciousness in credited beings necessarily presupposes the limitation of body. The modern doctrine of immortality is not materially different from the supposition that the soul flows back, like a drop into the great sea of universal life. It is indeed in apparent contradiction to our doctrine that, even according to the Bible view, the soul is to be regarded as existing [illegible] in the interval between death and the resurrection. . . . Lastly, as Christ here is styled the first fruits of them that sleep, so, in Rev. i. 5, and Col. i. 18, the first born of the dead. . . . In the apocrypha is not only contained the idea of the first, the earliest, but also that of the most costly, and as such dedicated to God."

Volume second, page 181, on the question of Sadducees to our Savior, in Matt. xx. 11, 20, 30: "In regard to the question itself, the Lord unequivocally replies that the life of those who are raised from the dead will be entirely different from earthly life, and hence the difficulty suggested by his interrogators falls to the ground. Now in this passage we have, chiefly, an express confirmation of the anastasis, resurrection, which it is to be observed, we must distinguish from the immortality of the soul. Of the latter, the scriptures never speak; on the contrary, God is called Ho monos echonten athanasian, he who alone hath immortality, 1 Tim. vi. 16."

Lange's Com. on 1 Cor. xv. 50, page 329: "Here, it will be observed all the way through that, in the apostle's mind, future existence, apart from the resurrection, was as nothing. The doctrine of the immortality of the soul seems with him to have been identified with that of the resurrection of the body. What he looked for was the glorification of his entire constitution, body, soul and spirit; and to be bereft of any part, was with him a marring of the whole. He 'would not be unclothed, but be clothed upon,' with a nobler vesture than that he had here. By Christian Friedrich Kling, Doctor of Theology, and late dean of Marbach, on the Neckar; translated by Daniel W. Poor, D. D., pastor of the High Street Presbyterian Church of Newark, New Jersey. (Here is orthodoxy enough for any one).

The same volume, page 339, 1 Cor. xv. 45; and so it is written the first man, Adam, was made a living soul; "The expression, living soul, as used in Genesis, is often taken to indicate an order of being superior to brute, and is the text of many an argument to prove the immortality of the soul. The incorrectness of this assumption will be readily seen by referring to Gen. i. 20, 21, 24, and elsewhere, in which passages the words translated 'living soul' are applied also to the entire lower creation. They are used indifferently of man and beast, to express animal life in general; and it is in this light that the apostle uses them, as the very course of his argument shows. Adam is spoken of as a living soul, not to prove his immortality, but rather his mortality. It is by means of the soul that he, and all descended from him, are linked to this changing and corruptible world, and so become heirs of corruption. . . . But the possibilities here involved for leading a true, spiritual life, could only be carried out by his abiding in fellowship with God and partaking of the divine spirit. On 48 verse, 'The second man is from heaven.' The question arises whether it means the heavenly origin of the second man, in relation to his human life; which, then, in case the term 'earthly' refers to the body of the first man, might be referred in like manner to Christ's corporiety, (hence the heretical assumption that Christ's body was from heaven); or whether it means the final appearing of the second man. His second advent. . . . The whole context appears to imply the latter (comp. 22, 23, 45, 49). What is meant, therefore, is his coming from heaven at his second advent, which will take place in celestial glory and in his transfigured humanity.

WM. DRESSER.

Slow to Answer.

Brother Kimsey asks, when and where the five vials were poured out? Those that claim we are living under the sixth seal, are "slow to answer." It is the opinion of some, that too many of the D. D.'s hold that view to be true. Things of a prophetic nature, are almost beyond their reach: especially Revelations. We find in this 16th chapter six plagues. The pouring out of the sixth vial, is not a plague, but preparatory for the receiving of the seventh vial, or sixth plague.

When Pharaoh refused to let the children of Israel go, they were smitten with plagues similar to those in Rev. xvi. Now go to Ezek. xxxviii.-xxxix. Therefore, thou Son of Man, prophesy against Gog, and say, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I am against thee, O Gog; the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal; And I will turn thee back, and strike thee with six plagues; (margin) and will bring thee upon the mountains of Israel. I (Gog) will go up to the land of unwalled villages; I will go to them that are at rest, to take a spoil, and to take a prey. Therefore, Son of Man, prophesy and say unto Gog, Thus saith the Lord God; in that day when my people of Israel dwelleth safely, shalt thou not know it? I will plead against him (Gog) with pestilence and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstorms, fire and brimstone.

This hailstorm, fire and brimstone, is after the pouring out of the seventh vial. Pharaoh desired Israel as servants. Gog (or Russia) will want Israel's money. Pharaoh and Gog's desires are the same, but in different form. The love of money is the root of all evil. 1 Tim. vi. 10. This certainly is true of Pharaoh and Gog. Pharaoh and host received their plagues; also their destruction by water. Gog and his band will meet the same; except the destruction will be by fire.

Now brethren, the river Euphrates was dried up, or changed, when Cyrus took the city of Babylon. Is it not possible, that the same or something similar may happen that literal river Euphrates again, when God has declared it by the pen of John?

We certainly have not yet reached Rev. xvi. These plagues are yet to come. More can be said upon this point, I leave it at present, for the older, and more experienced brethren. Hoping to hear from Bro. Kimsey and others I wait for the truth.

John Taylor Innes has an article in the Popular Science Monthly on the trial of Jesus Christ before Pontius Pilate. He subjects it to a scathing analysis in the light of what is known of Hebrew and Roman criminal jurisprudence, and concludes that the proceedings were irregular and illegal from beginning to end.

Spurgeon, in preaching on "Confession," lately said: "Having searched the Bible through, I can only find one man mentioned who ever confessed. That was Judas Iscariot; and you will remember, my brethren, that he immediately went out and hung himself!"

Near the city of Moyobamba, Peru, has been discovered a tree called the tamia-caspi or "rain-tree." It absorbs the moisture of the atmosphere, which it concentrates, and subsequently pours it forth from its leaves and branches in such quantities that in many cases the surrounding soil is converted into a bog, and it seems to possess this power to a greater degree during the dry, hot weather, when water is most scarce. The culture of these trees in arid wastes is recommended to the Peruvian Government.

"The Man with the Branded Hand," whom Whittier immortalized in his poem, Capt. Jonathan Walker, is living in a tumble-down shanty on the shore of Black lake, in Michigan. He is 70 years of age, has a large family, and is in extreme poverty. He lately rehearsed the once familiar story of the branding of the letters S. S.—for slave stealer—in the palm of his right hand. He had lived at Pensacola, and, going there in 1844 with his own vessel, he undertook to assist some discontented slaves to escape to the Bahamas. He was captured in the Gulf Stream, and taken back, and after trial and conviction was condemned to stand in the pillory for one hour, to be branded in the hand, to be imprisoned for fifteen days, then to be fined $150, and kept in jail till it was paid. The sentence was rigorously carried out.

The Restitution.

A. A. GRAVLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCT. 3, 1877.

SOME of our subscribers ask why they do not receive a paper with an article on the Great Pyramid. Bro. Russell has encouraged us that he would, if possible, write an article expressly adapted for a newspaper, and we await it from his pen. We will try to give a paper some time in the future with considerable space devoted to this topic. Those that have paid extra for such paper will not be forgotten.

WE have received a pamphlet from Bro. Wm. H. Wilson, compiled from the larger works of Prof. Piazza Smith, entitled, "The Scientific and Religious Discoveries in the Great Pyramid." It is accompanied with several illustrations and diagrams designed to explain the interior of this most remarkable structure. For our own part we are constrained to believe that this mighty monument embodies a peculiar symbolization of events that were all future when it was erected, but which have since become records on the historian's page. In any point of view the subject is one of no ordinary interest, and we commend the pamphlet to our readers. Address Wm. H. Wilson, 152 South Clark St., Room 21, Chicago, Ill. The price is not given though we think it would be about twenty-five cents.

Sheol.

We give below a tabulated arrangement of the English translation of every occurrence of the Hebrew word שְׁאוֹל sheol. It will be seen that it occurs sixty-five times, and is rendered grave thirty-one times, hell thirty-one times, and pit three times, with the marginal rendering grave in some places where hell is found in the text.

Gesenius derives it from שָׁאַל shaal, to excavate, to hollow out, and says, "as to the etymology, sheol is a cavity, a hollow subterranean place; just as the German Hölle, hell, is originally the same with Höhle, a hollow, cavern." The English words hell, hole, and hollow have one common Saxon derivation, which denoted a cavity, or excavated place. Some, however, derive hell from a Saxon word that signifies to hide or conceal. The words representing the original are in italics, and our readers can judge for themselves as to what the word means by reading all these passages in their connection. [EDITOR.

One Way to Get Rich.

Nothing is more easy than to grow rich. It is only to trust nobody—to befriend none—to get all you can, and save all you get—to stint yourself and everybody belonging to you—to be the friend of no man, and have no man for your friend—to heap interest upon interest, cent upon cent—to be mean, miserable and despised for some twenty or thirty years—and riches will come as sure as disease and disappointment. And when pretty nearly enough wealth is collected, by a disregard of all the charities of the human heart, and at the expense of every enjoyment, death comes to finish the work—the body is buried in a hole, the heirs dance over it, and the spirit goes—where?—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Exegetical.

And I John saw these things and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which showed me these things. Then said he unto me, See thou do it not: for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: worship God. Rev. xxii. 8, 9.

By some the word angel, as used here, is understood in the subordinate sense of messenger, and the construction placed upon fellow-servant is explained, from a misapprehension of its grammatical connection, as meaning one of the prophets in the disembodied condition during the intermediate state. To obtain this meaning the sentence is thus constructed: "I am the fellow-servant and (I am one) of thy brethren the prophets." Paraphrased thus, the text is claimed as proof of the consciousness and activity of the soul or spirit between death and the resurrection. We will now give a more literal translation of the Greek by David N. Lord.

"I am a fellow-servant of thee, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of those who keep the words of this book." The language of the original shows distinctly that the angel claims not only to be a fellow-servant of John, but also a fellow-servant of the prophets, and a fellow-servant of all those who should keep the words of this book. The Greek σύνδουλός σου εἰμι, καὶ τῶν ἀδελφῶν σου, sundoulos sou eimi, kai ton adelphoon sou—is literally in a word for word translation, fellow-servant of thee I am, and of the brethren of thee. An appeal to the manner of prophetic communication, as well as to the positive statements of this book, must satisfy every candid mind that our exegete, in which we endeavor, to show that a celestial messenger is intended, must be accepted. In Dan. viii. 16, we are informed that Gabriel was sent to explain to the prophet the import of his vision. Again in ch. ix. 21, the same angel was caused to fly swiftly to give Daniel skill and understanding. From Zech. i. 9-15; iv 1; v. 5, 10; and vi. 5, it may also be learned that angels were employed to make known future events. The law itself was communicated through this medium. Says Stephen, Acts vii. 53, "Who have received the law through the disposition of angels, and have not kept it." See also Gal. iii. 19, and Heb. ii. 2. On account of this, and other important ministrations, the Jews paid a subordinate worship to angels, as may be seen from Col. ii, 18; a practice against which the apostle warns Christians. On the paralleled expression in ch. xix. 10, Bloomfield says the apostle was "intending merely an act of civil honor, or homage. But the angel declined it with humility, and with a wise and prophetic precaution." Neither saints nor angels are our mediators; and all acts of worship toward them are contrary to the teachings of the word of God. We must approach God in the name that is above every name—the name of his Son, Christ Jesus.—[EDITOR.

The Name of the Whole Family in Heaven and Upon the Earth.

In Ephesians iii. the Apostle says; "I bow my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, from whom the whole family in heaven and upon the earth is named."

In any earthly family the name of the father in the family, is named upon the family. This is illustrated in what Moses says in Genesis v. 2: "Male and female created he them, and called their name Adam." In Gen. vi. 2, "The sons of God saw the daughters of men;" the word translated man, is Adam. This word Adam is the family name. But this first family has been greatly divided and subdivided. There have long been many families. When a man is married, his family name is named upon his wife and upon all their children. Say his family name is Smith; then this is the name of his wife and all the children. So, in order to distinguish them, it is necessary to give a different name to each one of them; one of the children may be called John, another James, etc., Smith.

So it is in the divine family; the Divine Father has several names; he was not known to Abraham, by his name Jehovah, so he told Moses. See Exod. vi. 3: "I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them."

Gesenius says: "Jehovah is his proper name; God is an appellation, or name of a class." The Apostle Paul, in almost every epistle of his, speaks of him as God the Father, in saying: "Grace and peace from God the Father." This, according to our common translation, is evidently, his family name. Even those to whom the Word of God comes, are called gods. This word, when heard, and understood, and believed, and loved, and obeyed, makes them sons of God; of course they are called after the family name of their Father. In proof of this, we may address what Jesus says in John x.: "If they to whom the word of God came (and the Scripture cannot be broken) were called gods," etc.; see the chapter; see also Psa. lxxxii.

In the dictionary of Gesenius, the word God is said to carry the idea of every excellency. Now, the Father is called God very many times in our common translation; in many places he is called Lord, which very often represents his name, Jehovah. Now, apply this family name, God, to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, or Spirit, and to every child of God, and we can understand the formula of baptism Matthew gives us, as meaning but one name. A word to the wise is sufficient; much more can be said upon this subject; let us read it in the Bible.

ALBERT ANDERSON.

August 18, 1877.

P. S.—Some say that the word baptizo means to dip repeatedly. Carson in his able work on baptism, says that it is never a frequentative nor a diminutive; and he proves it by many passages in different Greek authors. Some are deluded on this subject. The Son of God is called Immanuel, that is, God with us; the Holy Spirit is called the Spirit of God. See Gen. i. A. A.

Conference Report.

The brethren of the Abrahamic faith in southeastern Kansas came together near Walnut Station, in Crawford county, on Friday before the second Sunday in September, and continued through four days. The meeting was opened by reading a portion of God's word by A. J. Smith, of the Advent Church, and prayer by the same. Bro. Smith then addressed a large audience from Dan. ii. 44, in which he ably showed that the kingdom of God is yet future. After a short exhortation by the writer, adjourned till next day. Saturday morning 9 a. m., meeting opened by reading the Scripture by A. J. Smith, and prayer by the writer. We then proceeded to organize, and not one of us knew how to go about it except A. J. Smith. We spent the time till eleven o'clock, the hour for preaching, and then seemed to know less about organization than when we began. Bro. B. French preached at 11 a. m., from Rev. xx. in which he clearly showed that the saints were to reign with Christ a thousand years, and that [illegible] do this, there must be subjects, differing from A. J. Smith who had tried to show that the immortal saints would to emselves be the subjects, and reign over one another. It was made clear that there would be mortal nations for subjects and that the saints were to reign over them. At 2 p. m. met again and talked upon organization. We could see the church in the wilderness with Moses; we could see where Christ said, "On this rock will I build my church;" we could see where many were added to the church; but could not see where Foore, Pickett, or Smith should build one. We finally came to the conclusion that when one had heard the good news of the kingdom, or the gospel, reformed his life, and been baptized into Christ, that he belonged to Christ's church. Preaching at candle light by Bro. Smith from Dan. vii, continuing on the same chart as before on ch. ii. and followed by the writer. On Sunday at 10 a. m., social meeting, after which A. J. Smith preached on the nature of man from Gen. ii. 7. who was followed by the writer on the nature of the second Adam from 1 Cor. xv. 45. 46. After refreshments met at 3 p. m., when the writer lectured on the restitution of all things. He did not harmonize with some ideas that had been advanced relative to the burning up of the world at the coming of Christ. At candle light Bro. Smith spoke on the parables endeavoring to show that Christ would burn up the world and all its inmates except the saints whom he would take up to stand upon the sea of glass. I guess if ever he put forth his best efforts it was then and there; and I must say to his honor that he is able to defend the Advent cause as any one. He was followed by the writer who showed him and all others present, that when the saints are on the sea of glass would be the time when the nations would learn righteousness. Rev. xv. 4; Zeph. iii. 8, 9; Psa. lxxxvi. 9; Psa. xxii. 27; and Psa. lxxii. 1-17. He also showed that in that age the nations needed healing. Rev. xxii. 2. At the close an invitation was given, and four came forward for baptism. The meeting was closed with the hymn—"We shall meet beyond the river." Thus ended one of the best meetings I ever attended. Bro. Pickett baptized the four candidates next day. I learned that thirteen wagon loads of persons went to the water, but I could not attend with them being otherwise engaged. May the good Lord bless the brethren and sisters at that place and keep them faithful in my prayer. By order of the Church of God in southeastern Kansas.

JOHN FOORE.

Meaning of the Word "Sheol."

SELECTED BY W. KELLAWAY.

The proper signification of sheol is the grave, as all that be learned in the Hebrew do know. Sheol hath its signification of shaal, to crave or require: therefore it is one of the four that is never satisfied. Prov. xxx. 15. We learn the propriety of the Hebrew word from the learned Rabbis. Saith Dr. Fulk (Def. Trans. Bib., p. 89): "The Hebrew doctors and Jewish rabbis are for signification of words faithful interpreters. They say sheol is the grave. Rabbi Levi, according to the opinion of the learned, expounds sheol to be the lowest region of the world opposite to heaven. 'If I descend into sheol, thou art present.' So Rabbi Abraham, on Jonah ii. And David Chimchi and R. Solomon read Ps. xix. 16, 17, 'Let the wicked be turned into sheol'; that is, death's estate, or deadly bed. Jonah calls the belly of the whale sheol. Jonah ii. 2, 3. Rabbi Solomon Jarchi, on Gen. xxxvii. 35, saith, that the true and proper interpretation of sheol is keber, which is the grave; the hoary head is said to go down to sheol. Gen. xlii. 38. In Numbers it is said,—they, their substance and cattle, went alive to sheolah; that is, the pit, or grave. 'Our bones are scattered at the very brink, or mouth of sheol.' Ps. xii. 7. Jacob said, 'I will go down to my son Joseph to sheol.' The Protestant writers say sheol properly signifies the grave." (Dr. Fulk, answer to the preface Remist., p. 22; so also in his Defence, p. 91.)

Mr. Beza saith, that sheol properly signifies nothing but the grave, or pit. Fulk saith, the best of the Hebrews that either interpreted scripture or made dictionaries, Jews or Christians, say sheol properly signifies the grave (p. 89); and that deliverance from the lowest hell is deliverance from the greatest danger of death. So Fulk (ans. Remist., pp. 13, 30, 135), and so the late Annotation of the Bible interprets it; and Augustine, on Psa. xvi. 13,—for lowest hell read lowest grave; and so also Dr. Willet, Synop., p. 1049.

The Chaldee Paraphrast retaineth the word sheol, and translates it the house of the grave (pp. 11, 15); they interpret sheol, Keburata, the grave; Job xxi. 5, 13, 14, be ith' Keburata, the house of the grave (pp. 17, 12). Rabbi Abraham Peristaol joins sheol and keber together, both signifying the grave. And so doth Dr. Fulk in his Defence, p. 91. And so Mr. Cartwright on Acts ii. 27. Mr. Gaddock saith, hell is not mentioned in the Old Testament except as it is taken for the grave (in his Good News, p. 43).

Sheol enforces not any place of punishment because it signifieth not any place of punishment; so says Dr. Willet, Synop., page 1055. Also he saith, the word sheol cannot be translated but for the grave. There are four words in the Psalms expressing the same thing in effect that sheol doth, yet none of them applicable to signify any place of torment. The first is shacath, fovea, the pit (Psa. xxxvi, 9). The second is shor, the lake. The third is chebet, the grave; both these words used for the same thing (Psa. lxxxviii. 3); the word is sheol, v. 46; the other word used as expressing the former; and all these three do contain a description of death and the grave. The fourth is tehemoth—Abyssus Terræ—Thou wilt take me from the depth of the earth (Psa. lxxi. 20); in all which there is no mention of a place of torment (Willet, Synop., p. 1050).

The Greek translates sheol into halden, or halides, of Adam, because Adam tasted death and went to the grave (Gen. iii. 19). The gates of sheol is death; sheol and haides are said to have gates (Isa. xxxviii. 10; Psa. ix. 14; Matt. xvi. 8).

The Septuagint expresses a place generally to receive the dead; the word used in the Greek, instead of the Hebrew word sheol, signifies a dark place, such as the grave, or pit, in which the dead are laid. Dr. Fulk saith, some take the Greek word for hell, but it signifies the grave; hell it cannot signify in their speech that believe in no hell; the Greeks say plainly that their souls shall vanish like light smoke, or light air (Fulk Def., p. 93). Also he saith, If the Greek and Latin interpreters had before us translated amiss, which gave occasion to divers errors, must we (knowing the true signification of the word) follow them?

The word "hell" is not in the Greek. The Greek word for which they put the English word "hell" is Gehenna. Ge, in Greek, is the earth, or ground; and henna is borrowed from the Hebrew, from the valley of Hinnom. Dr. Lightfoot, in his epistle of his Harmony, saith, It is well known, the judgment of Gehenna is taken from the valley of Gehenna, Tophet, or Gehinnom, which are names of the places of idolatry; there was the idol Moloch.—S. Richardson, Discourse on the Torments of Hell, the foundations and pillars thereof discovered, searched, shaken and removed, 1650 (pp. 8-13).—World's Crisis.

What a Glass of Wine Did.

The Duke of Orleans was the eldest son of King Louis Philippe, and the inheritor of whatever rights his father could transmit. He was a very noble young man—physically noble. His generous qualities had made him universally popular. One morning he invited a few of his companions to breakfast, as he was about to depart from Paris to join his regiment. In the conviviality of the hour he drank a little too much wine. He did not become intoxicated, he was not in any respect a dissipated man; his character was lofty and noble; but in that joyous hour he drank just one glass too much. In taking the parting glass he slightly lost the balance of his body and mind. Bidding adieu to his companions, he entered his carriage; but for the one glass of wine he would have kept his seat. He leaped from his carriage; but for that one glass of wine he would have kept his seat. He leaped from his carriage; but for that one glass of wine he would have alighted on his feet. His head struck the pavement. Senseless and bleeding he was taken into a beer-shop near by, and died. That extra glass of wine overthrew the Orleans' dynasty, confiscated their property of one hundred millions of dollars, and sent the whole family into exile.—London Primitive Methodist.

Eastern News.

LONDON, Sept. 28.—A correspondent at Bucharest writes: A day or two of rain has made the roads almost impassable. The mud is ankle deep. Horses have eaten almost all the forage, and hay is very scarce at any price. Communications are daily more difficult.

The Russian staff officers in front of Plevna express the utmost confidence that the place will fall into their hands. There is an abundance of wheat and barley in Bulgaria, and a very large crop of Indian corn. If the Russians can surmount the difficulty of obtaining fuel, they can winter in Bulgaria very comfortably.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Sept. 28.—Snow has been falling in Schipka Pass since Monday, and is now ten centimetres deep at the foot of the Balkans.

SHUMLA, Sept. 28.—The Russian outposts have advanced from Corkoona to Popoki, and there begun a skirmish with the Turks.

BUCHAREST, Sept. 30.—Gen. Todleben's opinion on the situation at Plevna has been laid before the Grand Duke Nicholas. It is understood to declare that seige operations on the most extended scale are requisite for the capture of the place.

A second Turkish convoy for Plevna has returned to Orkani, Roumanian cavalry having captured eight wagons of grain.

The Grand Duke Nicholas is suffering from liver complaint.

LONDON, Oct. 1.—A correspondent with the Turkish army telegraphs from Plevna that Osman Pasha's losses from the Russian cannonade were exceedingly light, but on the day when he took the redoubt on Loftcha road he lost 3,000 men. There are now (September 28,) only 1,900 wounded Turks at Plevna.

A dispatch from Schipka says: "Suleiman Pasha is fortifying his camp, and apparently intends to winter here."

Snow has ceased in the Balkans, but heavy rains have flooded the plains of Sofia and Orchanie.

The Servian Minister of War has concluded a contract with some large Servian firms for victualing the four army corps which Servia intends to form.

Greece has sent a fresh dispatch to her representative at London, pointing out that neither intimidation nor a coup de main against Greece can suppress Hellenism. An unjust attack against Greece by the Porte would infallibly cause an insurrection of the entire Hellenic people.

The design of Turkish sympathizers in Transylvania was the formation of a Hungarian legion numbering 5,000 men, who, acting in conjunction with the Turkish corps, were to destroy Roumanian Railways. It is rumored that the Hungarian General Klapka was one of the leaders.

The American Embassador at Constantinople having been instructed to ascertain the number and condition of the Hebrews in the Ottoman Empire, reports the number at 500,000. Two hundred and fifty thousand are assigned to Roumania, and the balance to European and Asiatic Turkey. Their general treatment is not equal to that of the Mussulman population, but it is far better than that imposed upon the Christians.

Correspondence.

Editor Restitution:—Our dear brethren in various parts of the States, are not unmindful of the dues and duty that belong to the household of faith. I have been highly favored of late with valuable reading matter sent to me, in response to my letter in THE RESTITUTION, Aug. 1st.

You will please allow me the privilege of acknowledging the same through the columns of THE RESTITUTION. Many thinks to our good editor for his kindness in sending me THE RESTITUTION and the continuation of the same. Next in order comes the Good Tidings from Canton, Ohio, a very nice, clean, and well printed sixteen-page tract-form pamphlet. It is composed of a variety of subjects—of sound, substantial matter,—just the thing for those who are honestly seeking for the truth.

Our good Brother, Abel Larkin, of Mount Sterling, Ill., sent me his work on the "Closing Scenes of Jerusalem's Warfare," and also a postal card. This work furnished us with many a thought. But we cannot, at this time, endorse the sentiment set forth as a whole, until we have further developments in this line of prophecy. But we none the less accept these favors in good faith. As we have not time nor space to criticise here, we will give the contents of the card for the special benefit of others to approve, or protest against, as the case may demand. It is desirable that we should have some comments on the following:

"I read, with much interest, your letter in THE RESTITUTION of Aug. 1st, 1877, in which you say, 'you believe that the war now in the east will result in the coming of Christ.' But let me say to you, as a prophetic student among the brethren, that I conceive the idea radically false, and time will prove it such. There is not the first prophetic element in that war requisite for its culmination in the great Armageddon battle. Rev. xvi. 16. This time of trouble belongs to the seven last plagues, the seven trumpets, the seven seals, and the seven vials, which are literal days; and all of which belong to the last, or covenant week (Dan. ix. 27), yet in the future, for the covenanters have not come upon the stage of action. The drying up of the Euphrates, the decline of the Ottoman Empire—how shameful!"

I shall have to strain my imagination far from the reading of the Bible to get the idea that this great battle comes under the head of number seven. Leaving this part of the subject for future developments, we return to more important matter at this time.

In receiving the first copy of THE RESTITUTION July 25th, 1877, I was very much disappointed in not finding a harmony of sentiment on this war question, from the fact, my natural conclusion was that, as a body of believers, we were a unit on this question, and the soon coming of our King. After reading the several articles in reply to A. B. Magruder's "Metal Image," I was at a loss to know what kind of an argument Brother Magruder had advanced, it being the first time I had ever heard of the idea. I anticipated the argument, as I thought correctly, but still I might be mistaken. As fortune would have it, our good Brother, Wm. S. Burns, way down in the state of Vermont, sent me a package of RESTITUTIONS and also Our Rest. In looking over the RESTITUTION I found just what I wanted, and what I had not got, viz: Brother Magruder's articles on the Image. I said, God bless Brother Burns for anticipating my desire, and forwarding the same. The natural inquiry is, what does all this prove? It proves just what Daniel says—the wise shall understand. It demonstrates that our people are digging out the truth, and as fast as they get the truth they wish to impart the same to the one faith. It shows conclusively a united effort for sentiment, a democratic principle to tolerate free speech, and catholic spirit, which is universal.

In regard to Brother Magruder's Metal Image, I can join with J. M. Stephenson, and say I agree in the main. I have found nothing in the argument, protesting against the theory, that will mitigate in the least the main positions. Truth crushed to earth will rise again. Let us be cautious how we deal with God's word, and the facts that surround us.

The closing scenes of Gentile rule demand our special attention here. It must be obvious to all thinking minds that there must be some event in the movements of the nations to mark the time of Gentile rule. The signs of the times, as foretold by Christ and his apostles, are all in the past, and are no more prophecy, but have become history. If Russia and Turkey are the representatives of Daniel's king of the south and king of the north, then it naturally follows that Russia will overthrow the Ottoman Empire to fill the bill of prophecy, and, by so doing, it will close up Gentile rule. From the fact it is the last link in the chain of prophecy that marks any further note of the movements of the nations—only their destruction on the mountains of Israel.

As a topic to fill out this sheet, there is one thought connected with the foregoing that is of vital interest to the question at issue, which we will briefly notice. In what relation does God manifest himself to the world, under Gentile rule? Is it in a special manner, or are his power and will made manifest on primary and general principles? I find many productions from our brethren that are tinctured with the former. We have many valid objections to a special ruling power over Gentile rule. If the objector says it is merely a matter of opinion, would it not be far better to found an opinion on something that we can demonstrate, and have no guess work in the matter? What say you, brethren, on this question?

Respectfully submitted,
G. F. MITCHELL.

Editor Restitution:—I have endeavored to be a subscriber to our publications for the last eleven years;—ever since I embraced the faith. I commenced with the Gospel Banner, and, with the exception of a short time, I am glad to say my name has been among those who are striving hard to present the truth to those who know it not, and, with the help of our Father, I expect to hold on to the faith and trust God's promises. He has never failed me yet; I can trust him to the end. We have had no preaching here for several years, (I think twelve), with the exception of one or two sermons preached by a brother who was visiting some friends here. I would love dearly to hear the truth proclaimed again, but as we cannot have this, we must be content and thankful for the RESTITUTION, and the Blessed Book to keep us strong in the faith.

Yours in hope of an inhabitation in the kingdom.

MRS. WALLACE HUNT.

Editor Restitution:—Perhaps a few lines of Christian greeting may be acceptable to some of your readers, and with that impression, I will proceed to say the conference met at Volga on the 14th, according to their previous arrangement. We were very glad to see all who came, but much regretted the absence of Brother Reed, whom we confidently expected until the reception of his last card telling of your illness and other hindrances. All were anxious to see and hear him preach. Also, we expected some messenger or at least a letter from your conference as a response to the one sent by us during the past year. We had, as usual, some able preaching by our brethren Dr. N. Field and G. W. Green, which gave comfort to the church and instruction to all. The delegates left us on Monday morning with the blessed hope of meeting again in our Father's house where there is no parting. Doctor and Sister Field remained with us two days, and did good work in the Lord; our hearts were made to rejoice while sitting together in heavenly places, and listening to the many spiritual testimonies of brethren and sisters as they spoke forth their love for their blessed Savior. And, as a result of our united labors for Christ, two dear young ladies, the daughters of our brethren, were baptized by Elder T. V. Porter, on last Lord's day in the presence of a large and attentive audience. The people have turned out in large numbers, and we trust, the Word so ably spoken by our ministering brethren, will yet bring forth fruit to the honor and glory of our Divine Master. But while my heart is comforted over any progress of our blessed Advent truth, I am pained that some in our ranks are reaching forth after questions that do not minister grace to the hearers.

Dear brethren and sisters, one and all, do not let division and strife enter our midst because all do not see alike. If any seem to get new light, let them pleasantly hold the truth in the love of it and not wish to separate from those who do not see it as they do. There are extreme minds in all organizations ready to put forth their peculiar views, setting the precise day when Jesus will come, saying the resurrection is now going on, the tares bound together, etc.; but as we have not seen "the graves opened" as was the case when Christ arose from the dead, nor any of the tares burned, as Jesus says they shall be when he comes and sends his angels to gather them according to Matt. xiii. 30, 41, and as we can not fully know the order of all God's plan in the great redemption he has through his Son provided for all who will accept it on the conditions of the gospel, let us rejoice that enough of it has been made so plain to us as to give us a place in his house, that of sons and daughters, and if faithful to the end, will make us "kings and priests unto God, and we shall reign on the earth." May the grace of God unite us all together and bring us into his glorious kingdom at his coming, is the prayer of your waiting sister in Jesus.

MARY A. TIBBETS.

Editor Restitution:—For the amount enclosed, please send me one copy "Duration and Nature of Future Punishment," by Rev. H. Constable, also one copy of "God's Plan of Salvation," by J. M. Stephenson, and appropriate the balance towards the running expenses of THE RESTITUTION.

Very feeble health, and limited means of support prevents a larger contribution towards the support of that weekly messenger in its unremitting efforts to carry spiritual food and comfort to the many weary and foot-sore pilgrims who are inquiring the [illegible] ward. I miss its society to-day, as it has failed to put in its appearance the past week. Will the editor please accept my thanks for his remarks on "Revelations" in RESTITUTION of Aug. 22. I have some time since come to similar conclusions, that is that the events spoken of (Revelations) will not transpire in consecutive order, as they are therein recorded. Neither do I believe the contents, or predictions contained in the book should be treated as a hidden mystery by any of God's children, nor that a large share of the events therein foretold have had their fulfillment in the past—but remain to be witnessed in the near future—just in the closing scenes of Gentile times.

The opening of the seals, sounding of trumpets, and the pouring out of the contents of the seven vials, are all separate events recorded in different parts of the book, yet they will all transpire at the same time, that is, when the first seal is opened, the first trumpet will sound, and the first golden vial will be emptied of its contents and the man which have the mark of the beast and worship his image will be plagued with a noisome and grievous sore; and so on until all the seals have been opened, the trumpets sounded and the last vial poured out; or so it appears to me. I am aware that very few Bible readers will agree with me on this subject. Yet I have from a careful and prayerful investigation of the subject been forced to the conclusion that the tyrannical power described by the Revelator as "The Beast," and spoken of and referred to by him, directly or indirectly more than twenty times—has never yet appeared on the stage of action, for "when he cometh, he must continue a short space." "He will cause all" of every degree in life to receive a mark—and all will suffer death who do not submit to his decree—all whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life will receive the mark and worship the image. This same organized body (with the united power of the ten kings which have received no power to reign as kings when the beast makes his appearance, but will receive power to reign one hour with the beast) will destroy the prostitute female which he has been carrying for a time. He is also to make war with the Lamb at his public manifestation to be then and there overcome and come to his end.

It is worthy of notice that the beast that is so often spoken of in the book of Revelations is described in the masculine gender which almost universally in Scripture language denotes political power, when governments are spoken of—while the reverse is true when mention is made of ecclesiastical governments—the opposite terms being used.

Although the lewd woman of the Apocalypse is seen sitting on the beast, yet he (the political power) does not lose his identity; neither does the woman merge into the beast or become one of his horns; which must be the case if she acts the part assigned to him.

If I have a correct understanding of the Scriptures on this subject—the true church—the members of Christ's body, those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life, are yet to pass through a fiery ordeal, which will test them, that they may know what material they are composed of—whether of gold, precious stones, or of hay, wood and stubble.

Whether that persecuting power should be political or ecclesiastical matters but little to us, so we are ready to meet it.

The danger is, if we are led to believe that all these things are in the past, and the reverse should prove to be the truth, we are more liable to be found unprepared for such a trial of our faith.

May the God of all grace help each of his waiting ones to exercise a spirit of prayer, and watchfulness, and that faith in Christ that shall enable us to overcome the world and constitute us worthy to escape the "seven plagues," (which are soon to be seen and felt by the unbelieving and disobedient) and that we may stand before the Son of Man.

Yours waiting for the consolation of Israel. J. D. SHERIDAN.

Editor Restitution:—Perhaps it would interest some of my old brethren and sisters to know what I am doing. I have baptized eight in the last two months, and I am still preaching and expect to continue till death or till Christ comes. I still get THE RESTITUTION, and like it very much; but should like it much better if it could be opened for the advanced views—such as the blessing of all nations and all kindreds in the age to come.

Divine Self-Existence.

I know how many are puzzled to prove the Divine self-existence. Paley's argument from the watch, we are told by [illegible] misunderstand it, proves too much. A design proves a designer? Yes. But must not God himself then have had a designer, and his designer a designer, and his designer a designer, and so on for ever? This inquiry is familiar to religious science under the questions as to the Infinite Series. Lyman Beecher once had some theological students who preached in a skeptical locality, and who heard that objection, and who came to him to obtain a reply. He did not know the best reply, or, at least, did not give it, but he was of awful wit, and yet possessed perfect reverence,—a mixture of traits rather incomprehensible to persons not gifted with both. He said: "Your skeptical friends say that there may be twenty Gods?" "Yes." "Then you may tell them that if there is one God it will go hard with them, and, if there are twenty it will go harder yet!"

The serious reply to all that tantalizing objection is, that intuitive truth guarantees the existence of a dependent being, and that there cannot be a dependent without an independent Being. There cannot be a here without there being a there, can there? There cannot be a before without there being an after, can there? There cannot be an upper without there being an under, can there? If, therefore, I can prove there is a here, I can prove there is a there; if I can prove there is a before, I can prove there is an after; if I can prove there is an upper, I can prove there is an under. Just so, by logical necessity, there cannot be a dependent being without an independent; I am a dependent being, and therefore there is an independent or self-existent Being.—Joseph Cook.

DIED.

BACKUS—Elijah Backus died at his residence three miles south-east of Fruitcville, Mich., Sept. 23, 1877, with the inflammation of the bowels, aged about fifty-six years.

Brother Backus, like the most of us, was trained in early life under the teaching of the so-called Orthodoxy, but some few years ago, under the preaching of Elds. Servis, he was led to see the sandy foundations on which the sky kingdom was founded, and to behold the beauty of the Gospel kingdom, which he then embraced and obeyed. Brother Backus was a man very much esteemed by his neighbors and brethren, was a kind husband, an affectionate parent, and leaves a wife, and two children grown up, to grieve over his departure. His health had been poor for some years, but his last sickness was brief and painful, which he bore with calmness and Christian resignation.

The writer was called on by the family to preach the funeral sermon, but being confined to his room at the time by a severely sprained ankle, was unable to do so. They laid him away in the Fruitcville graveyard, to wait just a little while, till the Life-giver comes, and the last trump will sound, and the dead in Christ shall rise first to be clothed with immortality and eternal life.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NOTICE.

Our next conference will be held in November, to begin on Friday before the second Sunday in the month, or Nov. 9, 1877. This is a special call to all, as we want to see if we can put an evangelist in the field to travel all the time. In this way we believe much good can be done. The call is to brethren at South Branch school house, Bailey county; Lightning Creek, Wilcox county; to those in Coffee Co., Elbert Co., Cherokee Co., Neosho C., Montgomery Co., and Labette Co. Let all the preaching brethren come, as we need their counsel. Hicklin, Kinney, Greer, Lawrey, Pogue, Hayden Stringer, Bell, Wood, Hastings, Pine, and if I have overlooked any let them be sure to come, as it will be a free meeting for all. I do think it will pay for you to come, if not in greenbacks, as Brother Stringer says, yet in encouragement to go on. So, come one, come all; let us have a good time once more. I would not have missed the two last conference meetings for any consideration. Remember, Nov. 9, 10, 11, 1877.

By order of the Church,
JOHN FOORE.

UNION CONFERENCE AT GALESBURG, MICH.

By invitation of the Church at Galesburg, Mich., a Union Conference is called to meet at that place Thursday, October 25, 1877, at 7 o'clock p. m., and continue over Sunday.

Come, all who love the Lord and his appearing. Let us worship and work together in the fellowship of the Spirit. The Church at Galesburg will gladly entertain all who come. Let others be ready to pay the money expenses.

O. B. L. CROSBY,
Chairman Committee of Elders.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF IOWA.

To the brethren scattered throughout Iowa, and others interested, we will say that our annual conference convenes here at Irving, Tama county, Iowa, October 19th. We desire to see you all here, that we may make our meeting one of spirit and interest. We would be glad to have a representative from Northern Illinois, Southern Missouri, and other localities interested in the rebuilding and spread of the gospel of the kingdom.

We have arranged with Brother H. V. Reed, of Plymouth, Ind., to return and be with us two weeks commencing on Saturday evening, October 13th. We also expect Brethren R. J. Hill, C. C. Ramsey, and others here.

Brethren, if you can come prepared to remain and to socialize, come prepared to enjoy the meeting, to make and renew acquaintances, to cultivate friendship, and to better love, and to be strengthened in faith, hope and charity.

O. M. MYERS.

Early in November I shall start on a tour through Ohio and the Province. Will give notice of my appointments in the RESTITUTION, as soon as I hear from brethren. Address me at 35 Johnson Place, Chicago, Ill.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Bradshaw, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 85c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 35c; postage 5c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A., late Secretary of Cork, Ireland. 279 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly rich in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 10c.

"We hail this book with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has laid hold of the minds of many of the most thoughful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance.....We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will speedily be much more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this painfully misunderstood department of Christian theology.—The Rainbow.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 2d edition. Price $1.25; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the fourth of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, a keen logic, and a vigorous and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrine propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and firmness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I., December to December, edited by W. Kelloway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the news concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $1.75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II., January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III., July to September, 1875 (this completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 3 months of last year, is $3 00.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Exquisite Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the scientist, the gardener, and the household pet. 328 pp. Price 50c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Sacred Words for Sacred Scenes. Nearly 200 pp. Well printed on heavy toned paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 50c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written. Indeed we know of none, either in every way so pleasing to those who see the necessity of ministering the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be more than content, we would be proud, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so original, so forcible, so convincing, it would be hard to figure where its success will end. Everybody should possess a copy."—Ed. Bible Echo.

Bible Triumphant. A new supply is expected. Price paper cover, 50c; cloth 70c.

PUBLICATIONS FOR SALE AT THE "RESTITUTION" OFFICE.

BOOKS.

God's Plan of Salvation.—For a long time our brethren have desired a work which would embody the leading points and arguments of our faith and hope. Brother Stephenson's book is a terse, comprehensive and able statement of the leading phases of Bible theology. Our brethren will find this just the thing to read and circulate. The nature of man, the kingdom of God, and the obedience of faith, are ably and clearly set forth. We bespeak for this book a wide circulation. Price $1, M. V. REED.

Cruden's Concordance to the Bible. Of course no student of God's Word can do without it. Cloth bind. lag, $2, sheep, $2 25, half calf $3 75.

Greek Concordance. A Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament, by C. F. Hudson. This is a work of 508 pages, sufficiently small to be made a constant companion by one in traveling. Every minister and Bible student ought to possess a copy. Price, cloth, $2 50.

English Bibles, with marginal readings and references between the verses. They are printed on clear, strong paper, and well bound. Plain Roan binding, gilt edge, $2 50. Full Turkey Morocco, gilt edges, $3. Another one, with larger type, beautifully printed and easily read by failing eyes. Roan binding, $3 75. Turkey Morocco, $4 00.

The Doctrine of Immortality. By James H. Whitmore. This is a work that has been in market several years. But it is an exhaustive treatise upon the subject of immortality, and sets forth the Bible view in a masterly manner. Every student should have it in his library for reference as well as use in laboring to those who are feeling after truth. It contains 300 pages. Paper covers, 40 cents.

Emphatic Diaglott contains, on the original Greek Text of what is commonly styled the New Testament, according to the Recension of Dr. B. F. Griesbach, with interlineary word for word, English translation; a new Emphatic Version, based on the latter literary translation, on the readership of critics of criticisms, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscript, No. 1209 in the Vatican Library; together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references, to the whole of which is added a valuable alphabetical appendix. 583 pages, 18 mo leather, neatly flexible. Price $ Extra bind lag, $6.

The Conference.

Our annual meeting did take place,
It surely was a sweet foretaste,
Of that faithful happy time,
When we in righteous robes shall shine.

Our brethren and our sisters dear,
Come here our lonely hearts to cheer;
While we in sweet communion joined,
All of one heart and of one mind.

O, while we pleased to our eyes
Do see one fairest other arrived,
All reaching for each others' hands,
While gathering on to Canaan's land.

It points us in that happy day
When we'll be clad in bright array;
We those shall come from east and west,
And with the Lord be ever blessed.

Those soldiers from a militant land,
United with our little band:
In Jesus' name there were baptized,
And thus set out to win the prize.

Oh, may they act to Christ prove true,
In everything they say or do;
And may they let their light so shine,
To prove their calling all divine.

When shall we meet to part no more?
Not till we reach fair Canaan's shore;
We then shall hear no parting sigh,
No parting tear bedew the eye.

Oh, happy day, may it soon come,
When every saint will be brought home;
We there shall see our Savior's face,
Saved by his love and matchless grace.

SARAH F. MORGAN.

Correspondence.

G. M. MYERS TO J. M. HENRY.—THIRD LETTER.

My Dear Brother:—Your second letter is at hand, and I now reply. You call in question my quotation from Webster, and say that it is not found there, but only a definition of the Welch word "Hon." If you will be so kind as to take up Webster editions of 1850-1862—and turn to page 71, as I first cited you, under the head of etymology you will find just exactly my definition, and more fully than you have quoted. Then, Gen. ii. 7, tells of what he was formed into the image of his creator, Gen. vi. 3, and 1. Cor. xv. 48, tells of his nature and Gen. iii. 19 tells what became of him after death. Further, when Adam was formed in the image of his creator God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life (not an immortal soul or spirit) and as a result he (the man formed) became a living soul. Where then the necessity of your never dying soul or spirit. Where does man come in possession of it? Where did Adam get his? Please give chapter and verse, will you?

You seem to desire to meet some of my arguments with burlesque. This I hardly expected from one of your age, and as I have supposed, christian candor.

You introduce the subject of embryology and talk of its bordering upon Materialism, Atheism, etc. Be this as it may, it is one of your own selections. Yet you aim to make a point by its introduction, and as you have propounded the questions, where does it derive its life? and, what kind of life has it? I will attempt an answer which all physiologists in the land will sustain. When traced back to the cellular system the protoplasm in the cell is derived from the father parent; it is then after conception sustained and developed as a dependent being through the oxygenated and electrified blood of the mother parent (a breath-breathing animal) which flows to it through the umbilical cord until it is ready to become an independent being, and capable of doing its own breathing. Therefore no life without the breath of life.

A question.—According to your system, at what period between conception and birth does God slip an immortal soul or spirit into the embryo?

You ask, does my system admit of a difference between life and immortality? As to my system, I reply as the preachers of the Disciple church often do when asked about your church, I have no system but the Bible. Most assuredly life and immortality are different. Immortality is only one of the necessary conditions to eternal life. A man must possess that incorruptible—imperishable—immortal nature to live eternally, otherwise death will eventually overtake him.

You asked me to state my position upon the case of the Rich man and Lazarus. In reply, this is your quotation, you introduced it to prove your point, therefore unless I choose to do so, I am under no obligations whatever to explain it. My purpose now is to see that it does not teach what you claim—disembodied consciousness. In this, as a rule, I am sustained by disputants in the Christian church. That this text does not teach what you claim, I will suggest, that if it be viewed literal,

1. You nor I can never get to Abraham's bosom, for there will be no room for us as Lazarus will fill the space.

2. The Scripture does not say that Lazarus was ever buried; then he must have been carried soul, spirit, body and all and is there dead yet.

3. The same Dives that died was buried, and the Rhein's Version which I have before me says he was buried in hell, and in the same hell he lifted up his eyes. Now by your method of interpretation were these eyes, ears, tongues, fingers, etc., literal? If so where is your disembodied consciousness? But at this point don't retreat and cry out figure.

But for your satisfaction I will remark this much in reference to an interpretation of the case before us. I believe the key to the text is in Luke xv. 1-2. The one party was the Scribe and Pharisee, and the other was the Publican and Sinner.

1. In the parables of the sheep and lost money Christ justified his own conduct in eating with publicans and sinners.

2. In the parable of the prodigal son the disposition of the Scribe and Pharisee to Christ is shown in the case of the elder son to the father.

3. In the parable of the unjust steward the unfaithfulness of the Scribe and Pharisee toward God is manifested.

4. In the parable of divorcement the relationship sustained to God by the Scribes and Pharisees in departing from the law and teaching traditions, is taught.

5. And the case in hand teaches of the then future condition of the two classes. The one broken off from heirship, and the other made heirs of Abraham, (no reference to condition beyond death).

You say you believe Christ when he says, "A spirit hath not flesh and bones," Luke xxiv. 39. So I do; but do you believe Paul when he says, "The first Adam was made an animal soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit?" Then if Jesus was spirit, and made such from the grave we, must understand the Savior to teach that spirits according to the popular idea, such as the apostles had when they saw him on the water, possessed not flesh and blood.

You remark that I make hades a chemical laboratory for working the dissolution of the body into its chemical elements. If not of the body, what its effects upon the spirit? tell me.

You seem to think that I would have the body resolved back into its primary elements so that a resurrection would be impossible and therefore a new creation. You well know that in the death state the body does moulder back into its primary elements. Then if my view necessitates a new creation, does not yours require as much? Then if the spirit be called back from hades, with what propriety can the work or any part of it be called a resurrection. Your own missile here strikes you square in the face. Just as I have often publicly said "The Christian church virtually disbelieve in a resurrection. Further, if the spirit man pervades all parts of the fleshly man, as you think it does, and comes out of the fleshly man at death with eyes, ears, tongues, fingers, arms—bodies complete, where is the need of a resurrection of the fleshly body? Why the need of giving men two spiritual bodies, one at death and another at the resurrection? Wherein does your system differ from that of Swedenborg, or downright spiritualism? You may talk of a resurrection, but virtually your system admits of none.

You say "young men are sometimes more confident than intelligent." This I am fully aware of; therefore, questions I put to those who are, or ought to be on account of age and experience capable of teaching me. But I have been taught "Hear all things; hold fast that which is good." Therefore the sifting I have to do to separate the dross from the pure metal.

You seem to think that I am following unintelligent and unreliable authorities. Possibly I am; yet I am persuaded that they will stand the test. I will name a few of them, and tell you what they say, and then hear from you more relative to their credibility.

1. Moses Stuart, of Andover College, in his exegetical essays says: pp. 118-119 "Sheol consumes or devours the bodies laid in it." Job xxiv. 19; Psa. xlix. 14. Again, he says: "Sheol is a place of inaction and silence, e. g. Psa. vi. 5; xxxi. 17; 1 Sam. ii. 9; Isa. xxxviii. 18; Eccl. ix. 10. Again he says: "Sheol is a place of utter and perpetual darkness and gloom." Job x. 20-22. Thus a disposition of every text quoted save Job xiv. 13.

2. The next author I will cite is O. S. Halstead, Ex-Chancellor of New Jersey, a member of the English Church. In his work entitled "Theology of the Bible," he says:

On p. 434, on Job xiv. 13: "Hebrew sheol; Septuagint Greek, in hades; Latin Vulgate, in infernus; Douay Bible, in hell; Italian, in sottera—underground; Eng. Ver. in the grave.

On p. 435, on Job xxiv. 19:—Heb. sheol; Gr.—Hades; Lat. V. Infernus; Douay—hell; Ital.—Sepolcro; E. V.—the grave.

On p. 436, on Psa. vi. 5:—Heb.—Sheol; Gr.—Hades; Lat. V.—Infernus; Douay—hell; Ital.—Sepolcro; E. V.—the grave.

On p. 436, on Psa. xlix. 14:—Heb.—Sheol, twice; Gr.—Hades twice; Lat. V.—Infernus twice; Douay—hell twice; Ital.—Sepolcro; E. V.—grave.

On p. 436, on Psa lxix. 15:—Heb.—Sheol Gr.—Hades; Lat. V. Infernus; Douay—Hell; Ital.—Sepolcro; E. V.—grave.

On p. 436, on Psa. xxxi. 17:—Heb.—Sheol; Gr. Hades; Lat. Vul.—Infernus; Douay—hell; Ital.—Sepolcro; E. V. the grave.

On p. 436, on Eccl. ix. 10:—Heb.—in Sheol who to thou goest there; Gr.—in Hades where thou goest there; Lat. Vulgate—Infernus; Douay—in Hell; Ital.—Sottera—underground where thou goest, not there (is); E. V.—in the grave.

3. My third author from which I shall quote is my own old Hebrew Bible—edited by Augustus Hahn, and published in Leipsic in 1839.

On p. 1137—Job xiv, 13, I find not keber but sheol.

On p. 1140—Job xxiv. 19, I find not keber, but sheol.

On p. 905—Psa. vi. 5, I find not keber, but sheol.

On p. 1010—Psa. xxxi. 17, I find not keber, but sheol.

On p. 1024—Psa. xlix. 14, I find not keber, but Sheol.

On same p. Psa xlix. 15, I find not keber, but sheol.

On p. 1188—Ecc. ix. 10, I still fail to find keber, but sheol.

Now, as on these texts, which are here given, and quoted in my last letter to you, you speak positively, and say "the book says keber and not sheol," will you please give me date and place of the publication of your book which thus reads so very different from those I have in hand, also authors. If I am misguided by irresponsible authors, I would be most happy to have you undeceive me and set me free. Will you give me the light and the truth if I have it not, for the truth alone will make me free?

But if my authors are right upon this word sheol, then is your system a perfect wreck; "For there is no work, nor device, (reason, says the Douay which I have before me,) nor knowledge, nor wisdom in sheol—hades, where you put all of your departed or disembodied spirits. Can there be anything more conclusive? Can you still contend? But "I will not pursue this unpleasant task further now," of citing authors. It would be unmerciful to tantalize a man at sea without anchor, helm, or rudder, and bottom all swept away from his vessel.

Lastly, you ask me to remember that you deny that hades is grave. This I distinctly remember to have been stated in your preceding letter; and am truly sorry to find it again so stated, not on my account, but on yours and that of your brethren.

1. Because if true it consigns departed—disembodied spirits to a place of forgetfulness, of inactivity, of darkness and gloom, to where there is no work, to where there is no wisdom.

2. Because there is so much evidence to the contrary of your position. Let me cite you some of the evidence.

1. Out of about sixty-four occurrences of the word sheol, and sixty-five of its equivalent hades in the original of the Old Testament, thirty-one times the King James translators render it grave.

2. Moses Stuart, of Andover College, in his exegetical essays p. 112 says: "The meaning of sheol which lies upon the face of the sacred record (if I may thus speak) is indeed that of grave, sepulchre, under world, or state of the dead, as I have given in the recension of the passages."

3. Gesenius, in his Hebrew Lexicon, p. 1022, says: "Sheol—hades—Orcus, the under world; a vast subterranean place Job xi. 8; Deut. xxxii. 22; full of thickest darkness, Job x. 21-22; a cavity, a hollow subterranean place; just as the German Holle—hell, is originally the same with Hohle—a hollow cavern, and Latin cotum is from Greek kilos—hollow."

You argue that since Jesus used this word hades without stopping to define it, he must then have used it in the sense the Greeks attached to it at that time. I reply by calling your attention to the fact that he used also the word Beelzebub without defining it. Are we therefore to conclude that Jesus by so doing justified all the notions the ancients had about this god of the Buzz-fly? Also our state legislatures authorize the erection of lunatic asylums without ever stopping to define and explain the word lunatic. Are we to conclude therefore that our legislatures believe all that has been taught concerning lunacy? Your mode of reasoning upon hades would lead us inevitably to such a conclusion.

One point further before I close this letter though now lengthy. You conclude that because Paul claimed to be a pharisee therefore he must have believed in angels and spirits just as the sect of the Pharisees generally did. Your argument stated in the strongest terms and form would be,

1. The Pharisees believed in both angels and spirits. Acts xxiii. 8.

2. Paul was a Pharisee. Acts xxiii. 6.

3. Therefore Paul believed in angels and spirits.

Now let us have another array of points in the same form and we will be as de possibly to detect the error.

1. The Pharisees made broad their phylacteries, sat in the uppermost seats, for a pretence made long prayers, devoured widow's houses, shut up the kingdom of heaven against men, were fools and blind, were blind guides, were hypocrites, killed the children of the prophets, etc. See Matt. xxiii.

2. Paul was a Pharisee. Acts xxiii. 6.

3. Therefore Paul was such a man as described in (No. 1) above.

Do you believe it? If not, where is the fallacy? You will readily detect it in the minor premise of the syllogisms, that he was not a Pharisee to the full extent—on every point—but only in those called in question and of which he was accused. What were they? See Acts xxiii. 6. "Of the hope and resurrection of the dead am I called in question." Not a word about spirits disembodied.

Further, as evidence of disembodied consciousness, you quote John x. where Christ says, "I lay down my life that I may take it again." "I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it again." And then you ask, "If there was not disembodied consciousness how could Christ take his life again?

Reply.—Do you not know that the word life in these texts is from the Greek psuche—soul? With this fact before us will you argue that the body remained conscious in order to take the life—soul at resurrection. Your point in this is lost; there is no escape. Christ in resurrection resumed the life—soul, not the life—soul took him. You cannot maintain your doctrine and the atonement at the same time. Your doctrine will not allow you to believe the gospel. Yours truly,

G. M. MYERS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

J. M. HENRY TO G. M. MYERS—THIRD LETTER.

Elder G. M. Myers—DEAR SIR:—(So I address you, because I do not propose to call those who repudiate my confidence in the word of God, brother), I have not replied to you sooner because [illegible] home half of the time since I received your last elaboration. When able, I have been engaged in preaching the gospel as well as I can.

Your reference to Webster's definition of "man" is correct, and I am mistaken from haste.

You say the breath, at death, is given back to God who gave it. Is it the breath that is intelligent, or is it the body? When it returns to him is it absorbed by him? This breath, you say, is called in the resurrection morn from the four winds of heaven. Will you regard it burlesque for me to ask if the four winds are the God to whom the breath returns? If the breath returns to God is it conscious? If it is not, is that to which it returns conscious? If it is, where is your philosophy?

You agree with me that death means separation. You ask, "Where is the necessity for your (my) never dying conscious entity you (I) call spirit?" The reunion of the body and spirit is necessary to the preservation of the body. You seem to me to entertain the idea that their union is necessary to the preservation of the spirit. The body is dead without the spirit. James ii. 26. The body dissolves, separates, after the spirit leaves it. God made man in his image, and after his own likeness. Gen. i, 26. Now, as certain as God is Spirit, John iv. 24, so certain is it that man is a spirit too. I am aware that it is important for you to maintain that spirit and soul are synonymous as well as sheol and grave.

We are told that Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his image. Gen. v. 3. In the way you spoke of God "slipping this conscious spirit into the embryo," there seems an intimation that you are an unbeliever in spirit.

Yes, sir; your system fails to discriminate between life and immortality. "A man must possess that incorruptible, imperishable, immortal nature to live eternally." You do not quote a word for this. Christians are now in possession of eternal life. John x. 24. "He that heareth my word and believeth on him that sent me hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." According to your system he is "incorruptible, imperishable, immortal," for eternal life, you say, depends on all this. See also 1 John v. 11-13.

The rich man and Lazarus. Why is it called a parable? The difficulties of your system makes it sufficiently manifest why you should call it a parable. If you do not know that words are used often in a literal narrative metaphorically, you are less intelligent than I give you credit for. Protestants have been frightened at this passage by Romanists. That it agrees remarkably with Josephus' discourse concerning hades is obvious. If the passage is a parable, please explain it, will you? If it is a true narrative, your objections savor strongly of those who reject the Bible.

A spirit hath not flesh and bones. You say you believe that, but immediately add, "How about 1 Cor. xv. 45?" The man, Adam, was made a living soul, or animal soul; the last Adam was made a living spirit. For your change of the word living, into animal, I cannot find any authority. You believe that a spirit has not flesh and bones. Has it consciousness? Is it not just that which you deny? Had the spirits that Christ cast out of demoniacs consciousness? Do you think a demon is the spirit of a dead person?

You admit then that hades is a chemical laboratory for the body, and why? Because it seems essential to your theory that grave and hades are identical. This vile body shall be changed and fashioned like unto his glorious body. This mortal (body) shall put on immortality, this corruptible (body) shall put on incorruption.

I am neither Swedenborgian, spiritualist, nor a materialist.

You are truly sorry that I persist in denying that hades means grave. You may add to your sorrow, as it may be my persistent denial that its Hebrew equivalent, sheol, ever means grave. My authority for this denial is, 1st, Julius Fuerst, professor at the University of Leipzig, Germany, in his great Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon. He never, in a single instance, renders the word sheol by grave. He defines it, "What is sunk deep, hence under world. The place of the Shades, where the Rephaeem and departed souls abide." This is furnished me by N. S. Bastion, of Winchester, Illinois, who is a Hebrew scholar. He says: "I know no place in the original Hebrew whereby the laws of Hebrew exegesis founded on its grammar and lexicography will necessarily render the idea of the grave. I do think we err when we admit that hades ever means the grave, for there is another word in Greek for grave."

Dr. George Campbell, of Aberdeen, Scotland, says, in his dissertation on gehenna and hades, "I freely acknowledge that by translating sheol the grave, the purport of the sentence is often expressed with sufficient clearness. The example last quoted from Gen. xxxvii. 36, is an evidence: Ye will bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave, undoubtedly gives the meaning of the sentence in the original, notwithstanding that the English word grave does not give the meaning of the Hebrew word sheol. This may at first appear a paradox, but will not be found so when examined. Suppose one, in relating the circumstances of a friend's death, should say, 'This unlucky accident brought him to his shroud;' another should say, 'It brought him to his coffin;' a third, 'It brought him to his grave;' the sentiment is expressed by them all, and these plain words, 'This accident proved the cause of his death,' are equivalent to what was said by every one of them. But can we justly infer thence that the English words shroud, coffin, grave and death are synonymous terms? It will not be pretended by those who know English. Yet I have not had any argument stronger than this, for accounting the Hebrew words sheol and keber synonymous." "Again, let it be observed that keber, the Hebrew word for grave or sepulchre, is never rendered, in the ancient translation, hades, but taphos or mnema, or some equivalent term. Sheol, on the contrary, is never rendered taphos or mnema, but always hades; nor is it ever construed with thapto, nor any verb which signifies to bury, a thing almost inevitable in words so frequently occurring, if it had ever properly signified a grave. This itself might suffice to show that the ideas which the Jews had of these were never confounded. I observe, further, that hades, as well as the corresponding Hebrew word, is always singular in meaning as well as in form; the word for grave is often plural. The former never admits the possessive pronouns, being the receptacle of all the dead, and therefore incapable of an appropriation to individuals; the latter often. When the disposal of the body or corpse is spoken of, taphos, or some equivalent term, is the name of its repository. When mention is made of the spirit after death, its abode is hades."

Now the testimony of these men being true, to go over all the passages of the Old Testament where sheol is used, and of the New Testament where hades occurs, makes the discussion a logomachy. From brother Bastion I have them all marked. Smith, in edition of his dictionary of the Bible, says: "The word sheol is never used of the grave proper, or place of burial of the body. It is always the abode of departed spirits, like the Greek hades. None of those passages (those cited by the author of the article on hell, where the word sheol occurs) necessitates the conclusion that sheol is the place of sepulture."

This statement I believe, and nearly all our controversy is determined to that point. I think that you are bound to show that every place in the Bible where sheol and hades occur means grave, sepulchre, or some equivalent term, as the receptacle of the body. I have before referred to the fact that Christ's soul was in hades, but did not remain there. This was a different place from that where his body was which was not to see corruption. He laid down his life and took it again. This it seems to me he could not do if he was dead in your sense of being dead.

The Bible recognizes man as we see him, as composed of body, soul and spirit. Your theory confounds the latter two, and makes their existence dependent on the former. The word of God discerns between soul and spirit.

I find grave twenty nine times, in the Old Testament, for sheol in the Hebrew. The remaining thirty odd times must be rendered by some equivalent term, or your position is false. Again, after you have so rendered it, there will still remain the meaning of sheol and hades as distinct from keber and mnema, the words used for the reception of the body.

I look upon your task as an impossible one to be performed. Could you succeed, I see no good fruit from it. Which one of the apostles ever undertook a task like yours? Not one of them. The utmost that can be truthfully claimed from them is that they may have incidentally alluded to your idea or notion of the dead. They and the Savior opposed Sadduceeism, which was your theory exactly, as far as it went, or am I mistaken here? But I must close with expressing the desire that you may be restored to brotherhood with those who believe there are angels and spirits as well as resurrection from the dead.

Kindly and affectionately yours,

J. M. HENRY.

P. S.—Do not be uneasy about my having difficulty concerning a general judgment. Get matters right nearer to you, and then, if necessary, we can say something about it. J. M. H.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the dual "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

New Moons and Sabbaths.

BY H. V. REED.

Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days. 2 Col. ii. 16.

This text will ever stand as an insurmountable objection to the observance of the Seventh day by the disciples of Christ, in the present dispensation. Efforts have been made to disentangle the weekly Sabbath from the general wreck indicated by the apostle, but to no purpose. The phraseology is so constructed that the whole Mosaic ritual is included. The Apostle points out three kinds of sacred days.

1. Feast days or holy days.
2. New moons.
3. Sabbaths.

Any one familiar with the use of these different expressions in the Mosaic age, will at once see that the Seventh day is included. Those who pretend to keep the Seventh day unwittingly endorse this position. In proof of this statement we would refer the reader to their comments upon Isaiah lxvi. 22, 23:

"For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain. And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord."

It is claimed, by those believing in the observance of the Seventh day, that the above texts reach forward to the eternal state, and that therefore the Sabbath law must yet remain in full force. But this proves too much. If the position is tenable then it follows that the new-moon days yet remain in force and must be observed along with the Sabbath. It also follows that the new-moon days must be carried over into the eternal state as well as the Sabbath. But those who profess to keep the Seventh day do not now observe the new moons. Why this? If the text is good for the Sabbath, it is good for the new moons also. Either take the whole or abandon the position.

At this point, however, it is claimed that the new moons belonged to the the Jewish law, and not to the law of God, and were nailed to the cross with the other ordinances. This, of course, is a wild assumption. It is directly opposed to the word of God. The new moons were written in the law of God, just as surely as was the Sabbath. That the reader may have the plain testimony upon this point, we will cite the proof. 2 Chron. xxxi. 3: "He appointed also the king's portion of his substance for the burnt offerings, to-wit: for the morning and evening burnt offerings, and the burnt offerings for the Sabbaths, and for the new moons, and for the set feasts, as it is written in the law of the Lord."

In the foregoing text we have the new moons, the Sabbaths and the feast days all couple together, and it is positively said that they were all written in the law of the Lord.

Will the reader please examine the following texts, which uniformly connect the Sabbaths, the new moons and the feast days together. See 2 Chron. ii, 4; 1 Chron. xxiii. 31; 2 Kings iv. 23; Neh. x. 31-33; Isa. lxvi. 22, 23; Ez. xlv. 17,—xlvi. 3; Hos. ii. 11.

The last named text is very forcible: "I also will cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days, her new moons, and her Sabbaths, and all her solemn feasts."

This prophecy came true, and the whole system of day worship has passed away. Paul, therefore, spoke the exact truth when he declared the whole Jewish system of days was nailed to the cross. There is only one way to get rid of this position, and that is an open denial of the testimony. More anon.

Observations on 1 Cor. xv.,

By D. W. Poor, D. D., Pastor of the High Street Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J., Formd in Lange's Com. on I. and II. Cor., p. 340.

"In order to appreciate the force of the Apostle's reasoning throughout this whole chapter, it will be necessary to connect it with that general scheme of historical development in which his great argument moves. In speaking of the 'other world,' or the 'world to come,' it is common to understand by these expressions some mysterious realm existing outside of, or apart from the material world into which we are introduced by death, and where departed spirits are supposed to be now living. Not unfrequently are these terms used interchangeably with 'eternity.' On such an interpretation it is not easy to see why the Apostle should make a future happy existence so contingent upon the resurrection; or, indeed, what necessity there is for a new body, if, in our disembodied state we are so completely introduced into fellowship with Christ and the glories of heaven. Nor can we discover a reason why the resurrection should not take place with every individual immediately after death, according to the theory of Rush and Swedenborgians. To keep the soul, that would 'not be unclothed but be clothed upon,' waiting for centuries before it can assume its new vesture, seems almost like an arbitrary and needless appointment. But the difficulty here presented is all removed when we come to reflect that the term translated 'world' (aion) is not a designation of space denoting any particular realm in which people live, but of time.

"It properly means an age, a distinct cycle of years through which certain great transactions similar in kind are carried on to their consummation, and which is to be followed by another of a different kind. Now, it is through a series of these ages, or aions, that Paul considers the work of the world's redemption to be progressively carried on, all separated by certain great crises. The 'present age' is that period, which, dating from the fall, is to last until the second coming of Christ. At this point the 'future age' will begin to date, and this will be the age of redemption completed—the age of the Messiah's kingdom and glory. And the expression for 'eternity' is generally in the plural—'ages,' or 'ages upon ages,' to signify the ceaseless procession of time, under which conception eternity was ordinarily represented.

"From this exposition will be seen the impropriety of speaking of souls at death passing at once into 'the other' or 'future world' or ages. The future world, or age, has not yet come in; and no one can be said to enter it until Christ appears to set up his kingdom. It is then only that the earth will be in readiness for the reception of the risen saints. And, inasmuch as the glory which they are waiting for is to be found here, it will be seen why a resurrection is necessary,—why they want a body at all, and a glorified body, since it is in this as their organ that they will be fitted to dwell in a glorified earth and enjoy the felicity of that age. According to Paul's theory, man is not to be separated from this lower creation of which he forms a part, and of which he is the lord. The world was viewed by him as one complete whole, termed in Rom. viii., 'the creature' (ktisis) which, as it had been involved in the curse of the fall, was also to be restored in its completeness as the theater of the Redeemer's glory. But the time of its restoration could not occur, until all the redeemed of earth were brought in and the number of the elect completed. It is then that the Redeemer will appear to set up his kingdom and around him the whole church will be glorified together, more 'preventing,' i. e., anticipating the other in the fruition of future glory. On such a scheme we discover a foundation for the Apostle's argument which identifies a blessed immortality with the fact of a future resurrection, and seemingly ignores the possibility of an existence in some purely spiritual state, such as Pagan philosophy dreams of."

"Scott's Com. on 1 Cor. xv. 36, says: 'Many of the philosophers, and afterwards of the heretics, considered the body as the prison and sepulchre of the soul, from which it would, at death, be delivered. Such men, indeed, could not but dislike the doctrine of the resurrection, and be disposed to argue against it.' The same heretics do worse now; they neglect it, and for the same reason."

Good old Matthew Henry says: "It is as certain that we shall have spiritual bodies, as it is now that we have natural or animal ones."

This commentator, whom Adam Clarke calls the "King of Commentators," also says: "If there be no resurrection, they cannot rise, and therefore are lost, even those who have died in the Christian faith, and for it."

So he ignores, or denies the idea that those who have fallen asleep in Christ, are now in glory. And how it is possible, for those who believe in the Bible, to think otherwise, I can't conceive so long as 1 Cor. xv. 18 remains in the Bible. WM. DRYSDALE.

Prophecy.

Editor Restitution:—I have been of late, very much edified and interested by the reading of several articles in THE RESTITUTION, treating of the prophecies contained in the Book of Daniel, but am far from satisfied that the conclusions arrived at, are correct: I am not an adept in the art of reading prophecy, in fact, have only very lately given any attention to that branch of Scriptural study, and, as yet, only as I compare printed articles with the Scriptures; and the conclusion arrived at is, that I am too stupid to see what the learned theological world so clearly understands, or else, they are strangely blinded, not to see, what appears to me, to be so plain. Remember I am not a student of prophecy, and, consequently, although I may be ignorant, yet I have no pet theory to uphold or maintain. Thus far for preliminaries; now for business. I cannot understand or believe the current or popular exposition of Daniel's prophecy of the "seventy weeks;" nor can I adhere to the "year-day" theory. I believe that the words "unto the Messiah the Prince," (Dan. ix. 25,) refer not to Christ's first advent, but to his second. I will give my reasons for so believing after advancing an idea or two All will admit that nearly all of the prophecies in the Book concerning that Christ, relate, not to his coming as "the man of sorrows, the antitypical scapegoat, but to his coming as the King of kings and Lord of lords," and when the prophets spoke sentences, giving glimpses of the "sufferings of Christ," those sentences were generally wedged in between others speaking of the "glory that should follow."

Again, the seventy weeks refer to the duration of the Jews as a nation, a kingdom, and not in a state of captivity, a scattered condition. Again, the Scriptures do not teach that there are yet seven years and seven years only, allotted to the Jews as a nation. Now, I will state my reasons as I promised,—

1. The time given, does not admit of the possibility of a reference to Christ's first advent—because, first, sixty-nine weeks of years are 483 years, whilst "the commandment to build and restore," etc., was given by Artaxerxes to Nehemiah, (by current chronology,) between 420 and 440 years before the birth of Christ; but in the words of the prophecy, 434 years before his crucifixion. From which I conclude, that unless he was crucified forty-nine years before he was born, why then, the prophecy did not refer to his first advent.

Brother B. Wilson, in RESTITUTION of September 12th, overcomes this difficulty by saying that the wall was forty-nine years in rebuilding, and that the second period given to Daniel of 434 years, to the cutting-off of the Messiah, commenced when the wall was finished. I say, well, because it was the sign given. Dan. ix. 26. Brother Wilson's arrangement seems to me to be contrary to the Scriptures, and the facts in the case, as follows:

1. The Book positively teaches that the wall (the work spoken of to Daniel) was only fifty-two days in building. (Neh. vi. 15.) while Nehemiah only staid there twelve years, and it was built while he was there, and the prophecy dates from the commandment given him to go there. No forty-nine years there. The temple was finished in 515 B. C., which is too far back to touch the prophecy; and the city was built and inhabited before Nehemiah went there. The wall was the sign to Daniel.

Again, there is no authority or pretext in the prophecy for two starting points or commencements. The sixty-nine and the sixty-two weeks both begin at the same time; if not, how do the year-day brethren know where to commence their 2300 days? But even grant that the finishing of the wall is one commencement, that only gives, at the outside, twelve years, the period of Nehemiah's stay, and that is far short of forty-nine years.

Again, if the sixty-nine weeks are all consumed by the time of our Lord's passion, what becomes of the thirty-six and one-half years of Israel's nationality, from the crucifixion, A. D. 33½, until the destruction of Jerusalem A. D. 70? The seventy weeks must include all of the period of the Jews' nationality, or they receive more time than God has cut off for them. These thoughts will suffice for the present on this subject. Let us look a moment at the year-day theory:

1. Where do the days date from? the beginning or ending of the wall, or the day Daniel saw the vision? Rather uncertain basis, seems to me.

Again, is the question "how long until the vision?" etc., for to make it agree with the theory, put it in this form: "How long a period, during some portion of which period, the vision?" etc. Is it this way? No, no. It is, "How long shall be the vision concerning?" etc. See Dan. viii. 13. How long a time is to be occupied in the taking place of certain events narrated in verses 10, 11, 12; again, 23, 24, 25? This is 2300 days or about six and a third years.

Now, let us see where the year-day theory will run us to. In Dan. xii. 11, we have, in reference to the same vision or facts in the future, the same term, days, made use of, (meaning, of course, years,) and 1290 are given "from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away," etc.; according to that, and taking for granted that 1880 is the limit, the daily sacrifice was taken away in A. D. 590; and supposing "the midst of the week" to mean the numerical middle, why the covenant was "confirmed with many," B. C. 700, or 160 years before Daniel saw the vision. I think, however, that "midst" does not necessarily mean equal, half, or ratio, but that two years, nine months and ten days, after the treaty or covenant is made, the sacrifice will be taken away, etc. These are my views. Will some brother please criticise? In the future, if acceptable, I will send a few thoughts concerning the "vile personage," etc., for the benefit of Brother J. C. Kimsey.

From your brother in Christ,
GEORGE C. WAID.

Heroism of the Turkish Soldier.

ERZEROUM, Aug. 28.—His patience and uncomplaining fortitude when wounded and left to die untended and uncared for are beyond praise. The Turkish soldier knows full well that for him there is no ambulance, and, practically, no medical store, no surgeon. For him to be wounded, unless he can still crawl unaided from the field, is to die—to die the most miserable lingering death—a slow torture, exposed to the burning rays of an almost tropical sun while suffering the pangs of a raging thirst increasing to madness as the life blood slowly drains away. Yet they continue a service unrewarded for months by any pay—frequently without food—never flinching, never complaining, and utterly unmindful of consequences—supported by the simple conviction that they are doing their duty. Surely there are few soldiers like them in the world, and, perhaps, it is owing to some misapprehension on the part of the Russians as to the real qualities of the Turk that hitherto he has been so frequently unsuccessful.—London Times.

The Great Pyramid.

We give the concluding chapter of Brother Wilson's Pamphlet on the Great Pyramid. The passage-way leading into the antechamber measures 36-1-2 inches. Over this passage, at its extremity, the southern wall impends six inches. If the first number denotes the length of our dispensation, this impending six inches would denote that from 1876 to 1882 would be years of trouble. We are now in these years, and await the unfolding of Heaven's purposes with intense interest. We now give the chapter alluded to above:

"We have suggested to our minds the grand and intensely interesting fact that the passage commencing at the north front of the Great Pyramid, and running south, penetrating to the interior of the structure, represents time. Each inch of space along the floor, which the astronomer measured with conscientious and scientific fidelity, is clearly shown to represent a year.

"As previously stated, the south wall of the grand gallery impends, but what suggested the idea to Robert Menzies that that particular wall should not be perpendicular, is more than we can surmise, in view of the fact that he had never seen the Pyramid. It leans to the north in such a way that a plumb line let down from the top will touch the floor six inches north of the wall's base.

"'The Bible shows,' says Mr. Menzies, 'that God intended this dispensation to last only for a time, which may terminate much sooner than most men expect, and shown by the south wall impending.'

"And this inclination becomes very suggestive in view of the fact that according to the careful measurements of Prof. Smyth, 1876 brings us fully under the shadow and influence of that inclination. How is it to-day? Do not indications already manifest in the political, social, and physical heavens, speak of impending danger? It is a time of perturbation, not only coming, but already begun, and if indeed commenced, then also how impressively impending! Questions startling and perplexing have arisen, and have assumed an aspect that defies the wisest minds (unaided by revelation) to solve. The sea of society heaves with vast internal commotions. The eye of the statesman sees danger. The night cometh! nor does it seem afar off. It never appeared so nigh. The shadows are lengthening out and falling with ominous gloom upon the valleys of earth. The dimness of twilight is beginning to make itself felt. It is settling down drearily upon our cities, and on our solitudes; upon the towers of our strength, and the palaces of our pomp; nor can the noisy rush of eager multitudes, hurrying to and fro for gain or pleasure, wholly stifle the utterance of fear and awe. Men cannot help foreboding evil, for who can tell them what may be in the womb of darkness? The night birds are already on the wing.

"Yet it is written also, 'the day is at hand!' The night, though dark, will be brief, and will soon be succeeded by a glorious day. But still of that day the night will be the forerunner. And this world's night is surely near.

"Even the potentates of Europe are seemingly strongly impressed with the belief that some extraordinary event is 'impending.' Pope Pius IX. says 'there is a conflict impending between the Archangel Michael and the devil;' Disraeli affirms that 'there is to be an overturning of the nations, and a great change in the governmental systems of the world.' And other European statesmen are anticipating some great demonstration hitherto not experienced by the inhabitants of the earth.

"Some thirty years ago, when the skies were brighter, men could with comparative safety fold their hands and take their ease. But all this is over.

"The onward swell of the waters stays not an hour. There is among the nations a spirit of restlessness, anarchy and insubordination, a passionate love of change, a headlong rush to overturn every established system, too furious and united to be ultimately withstood. The storm, long gathering, but resisted by the barriers which the ancients had erected for the stability of kingdoms is condensing, and overstrained at length will give way to the accumulated pressure. At this crisis the inhabitants of the earth will undoubtedly realize the utter weakness of human efforts and crave divine assistance, and then will 'the desire of all nations' appear upon the scene and put in operation a train of events which will center in the Holy City, but radiate all over the world, resulting in bringing harmony out of discord, and subjugating all to his sovereign will. What times we are living in, truly. How important it is that we should constantly watch, lest the Master come to find us unprepared to receive him. God is represented to our minds as a wrathful Being, seeing us at all times, noting the fall of an empire as well as of a sparrow, seeing our evil and our good. Hence Job says, 'For now, thou numberest my steps; dost thou not watch over my sin?' Watching being one of the attributes of the Deity, is certainly for us to follow; hence the frequent command to watch. David prayed, 'Set a watch, O Lord, over my mouth; keep the door of my lips.' How needful to watch words and deeds, lest we fall."

AFTER A WHILE.

After a while—a busy brain
Will rest from all its care and pain.

After a while—earth's rush will cease,
And a wearied heart find sweet release.

After a while—a vanished face—
An empty seat—a vacant place.

After a while—a man forgot—
A crumbled head-stone—unknown spot.

Destroy it not.

"Some years ago," says the Rev. William Jay, "I had a tree in my garden that never bore. One day I was going with my axe in my hand to fell it. My wife met me in the pathway and plead for it, saying, 'Why, the spring is now very near; stay, and see whether there may not be some change, and if not you can deal with it accordingly.' As I never repented following her advice I yielded to it now, and what was the consequence? In a few weeks the tree was covered with blossoms, and in a few weeks more was bending with fruit.

"Ah!" said I, "this should teach me. I will learn a lesson from hence: not to cut down too soon—that is, not to consider persons incorrigible or abandoned too soon, so as to give up hope and the use of the means of prayer in their behalf."

The Restitution.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCT. 10, 1877.

BROTHER WM. H. WILSON informs us that the price of his pamphlet on the Great Pyramid is twenty-five cents. It may be obtained by addressing him at 182 South Clark Street, Room 21, Chicago, Illinois. The Grand Gallery in this stupendous structure measures 1881-2 inches, which, chronologically interpreted, indicates that a crisis in human affairs is imminent. The 1260 years of Mohammedan power, dating from 622, the year commencing their era, extends to the same terminus. And of the 2300 years, that long appointed time given by the "wonderful numberer," 490 were cut off on Daniel's people, commencing about B. C. 420, and ending A. D. 70-2, leaving 1810 for treading the sanctuary and host under foot, and which also terminate in 1880-2. We give the concluding chapter of the tract this week. We hope our readers will send for the work, and peruse it carefully.

WE feel once more under special obligations of praise and thanksgiving to our Heavenly Father for his many mercies. He has afforded us the means to issue THE RESTITUTION with fewer suspensions than we anticipated at the commencement of the year. We are now in the last quarter of the year, and the Lord has blessed our country with a bountiful harvest. We have sent THE RESTITUTION to our patrons, in many instances, beyond the time for which it has been paid, in consequence of hard times and a well known scarcity of money. We now think that these, our brethren, with a little effort, could forward any small amount that might be due for the past, and continue subscriptions for the future. We shall be compelled to revise our mailing list at once. Will every one look at the figures on the directory slip and see just how the account stands? We may send cards to some that forget us, not as duns, but as reminders when the time expired. We will try our best to make the paper an exponent of the One Faith, and at the same time try not to be too exclusive. If all, who now take the paper, will continue their patronage, our prospects would be very encouraging. Our paper is needed to herald the coming of the Holy and Just One. We believe God will sustain it for the little time intervening before he comes to gather his saints, which will not be long.

We thank our dear brethren and sisters from the heart for their kind offerings placed upon the "Altar of Sacrifice." We assure them that it is help in time of need. The current year is a very close one with us in publishing THE RESTITUTION. And we are not alone. Other papers that herald the coming of Christ, and the kingdom of God, are dependent upon extra assistance. We must not complain of this. It is, as it always has been, the ordination of God that his cause shall be sustained by sacrifice. Instead of complaining, we should esteem it an honor and a privilege that God permits us to be co-workers with him. He gave his Son. He gives us richly all things to enjoy. He gives eternal life to the faithful. We are not going to have the opportunity of showing our love to God in this way much longer. The work and sacrifices of the Gospel age are almost done. We may regret our remissness too late. Our Lord is soon coming, and his reward is with him to give to every one as his work shall be. None who give to his cause will lose anything even in this world. He will more than make up for any sacrifice made for his holy cause in this world. We assure our dear brethren and sisters that all they give shall go for the dissemination of the truth. We have as yet no money to place on the altar, but will gladly give our humble services in labors around the altar.

Euphrates.

This remarkable river is perhaps more intimately connected with the history of the human family than any other of the numerous rivers of the world. Under its Hebrew appellation (פְּרָת Phrath) it is named in connection with the Garden of Eden. Its Greek name (Εὐφρατης Euphrates) is said to be probably "a word of Arian origin, the initial element being 'u, which is in Sanscrit su, in Zend hu, and in Greek ev, eu; and the second element being fra, the particle of abundance.

The Euphrates is thus—the good and abounding river. It is not improbable that in common parlance, the name was soon shortened to its modern form of Frat, which is almost exactly what the Hebrew literation expresses. But it is most frequently denoted in the Bible by the term הַנָּהָר hannahar, i. e. "the river,"—the river of Asia—in contrast to the short-lived torrents of Palestine."

It is the largest and longest river in Western Asia. It has two chief sources—the Eastern and Western branches which take their rise in the mountains of Armenia; one of them twenty-five miles north-east of Erzeroum, and not greatly over sixty miles from the Black Sea; the other rises near Mount Ararat, on which the Ark is supposed to have rested after the flood. The former, the more northern and western branch of the two has the name Frat, or the name of the main river from the first, though sometimes also called the Kara-su, or Black River; while the south-eastern branch goes under the name of Murad-Chai.

The main stream at their junction is about 120 yards wide, rapid, and very deep. Its course is at first quite tortuous, and its direction, after forcing its way through the Taurus mountains, is south-westerly toward the Mediterranean, till, turned by the Amanus and Lebanon mountains, it takes a south-easterly direction for about 1,000 miles, till it reaches the Persian Gulf. The next allusion to it, after having been mentioned as one of the four rivers of Eden, (Gen. ii. 14), is in the covenant made with Abraham, (Gen. xv. 18), where the whole country from "the great river, the river Euphrates," to the river of Egypt is promised to the chosen race. The same extent of country as a boundary eastward, is promised to Moses (Deut. i. 7; xi. 24), and to Joshua (ch. i. 4), where the Mediterranean on the west and the Euphrates on the east, are given as the limits of the land of the covenant. It appears that the nation of Israel never came fully into possession of all this extent of country till the times of David. See 2 Sam. viii. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 3. This object was so fully attained by the warrior king that the whole country was inherited by Solomon, his peaceful son, who is said to have "reigned over all kingdoms from the river unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt." (1 K. iv. 21; 2 Chron. ix. 26). Thus during the reigns of these kings the kingdom of Israel attained the full extent of the original promise, "from the river Euphrates to the border of Egypt."

On both sides of this river Babylon was built not very long after the flood. This river, on which this renowned seat of the first universal empire was located, became a symbol of the invasions and conquests of its despolling kings. Isaiah in his prophecy of the subjugation of the land of promise, says: Now, therefore, behold, the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria, and all his glory; and he shall come up over all his channels, and go over all his banks; and he shall pass through Judah; he shall overflow and go over, he shall reach even to the neck; and the stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel." Isa. viii. 7, 8. Here the invasions of great armies is compared to the inundations of a mighty river which carries all before it, and leaves countries waste and desolate. The small strength and forces of the king of Judah are symbolized by the little rivulet Shiloah, which ran through Jerusalem, (Nehem. iii. 15; John ix. 7,) while the power of the Assyrian monarch is figured by the overflowing floods of the great Euphrates. By the Assyrian floods the ten tribes were swept away, and by another inundation of the Great River, at a later date, Judah and Jerusalem were carried to Babylon to mourn and hang their harps on the willows for seventy years of dreary captivity. It is, however, particularly interesting to know that in later history powers on the Euphrates act an important part in the great drama of human affairs, and also that the symbolization of the earlier prophet is strikingly employed by the later seer of Patmos. The inundations of the Euphrates become the subject of prophecy under the imagery of the sixth trumpet, when the four sultanies of Persia, Kerman, Syria, and Roum, situate in countries bordering on the Euphrates, are loosed for their career of conquest.

The history of these conquests is too lengthy for our present purpose. It is sufficient to say that the overspreading of Ottoman dominion in desolation, over not only the glorious land of promise, but the splendid Greek empire of the East, was the result of a dual unification of the more Eastern floods. The establishment of the empire of the Sublime Porte over Western Asia and Eastern Europe has been the result. Once more in our own times the waters of the Euphrates become the symbol of dominion, but it is the symbol of a decaying power. The time has nearly come for Immanuel's land to revert to its rightful owners, and a vial of wrath is poured upon the wide-spread floods of an abominable despotism, and they are rapidly drying up. The 2300 days of Gentile rule over Palestine are nearly accomplished. The mystic Euphrates is not much longer to flood Immanuel's land. In the stage of events now in progress Immanuel is to become the chief actor in the scenes. During the evaporation of these mystic waters he comes as a thief. This coming is to a locality in the deep etherial to which he suddenly and secretly removes his elect church. This is the next grand event of prophecy, and is now imminent. Are we living in a state of preparation for the sudden translation? The door into this heavenly household will soon be closed forever, and to all eternity remain closed. The Gospel will soon win the last heir of a crown of glory, and the princely priesthood is complete. The Coming One "shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth." See Ps. lxii. 8. The Euphrates will not bound his empire, but it will be world-wide. He says, "Behold, I come quickly: hold fast that thou hast, that no man take thy crown." Rev. iii. 11. And again, "Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments." This is the warning of current events. Shall we so live as to share a part in his universal reign?

Exegetical.

And to you who are troubled, rest with us; when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. 2 Thess. i. 7-9.

The common mistake in the interpretation of this passage is in taking the preposition ἀπο—from—to denote separation, and not the origin or source of the destruction named. The parallel expression in Acts iii. 19, "The times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord"—ἀπο προσωπου του κυριου and others describing the destruction of God's enemies (Lev. x. 2; 2 K. i. 10, 12, 14; Rev. xx. 9,) suggest the true sense, which is thus given by Macknight: "These wicked men, being raised from the dead, shall suffer punishment, even everlasting destruction, by fire issuing from the presence of the Lord." And by Conybeare and Howson: "Then shall go forth against them, from the presence of the Lord, and from the brightness of his glorious majesty, their righteous doom, even an everlasting destruction." This view is supported by Grotius, Coccelus, Pellicanus, Castalio, LeClerc, Poole, Hammond, Benson, Henry, Bergel, Pelt, Bautngarten-Crusius, and DeWette.

Angel Greetings.

BY H. V. REED.

How glorious is the ministry of angels. They have hallowed earth's plains and cities by their presence, the mountains and oceans have bowed before them, and the skies above have been resonant with their minstrelsy.

The long night of Israel's captivity was ended by the angels of God. Earth's first morning was made vocal with their songs. The camps of heathen armies were made desolate by their fiery judgments, and the victories of heaven have been made glorious by their loyalty. Under the direction of the Infinite Spirit they have made covenants, revealed laws, executed judgments, made promises, uttered prophecies, and extended consolation under affliction. They are ministering spirits, and are not far away. The temples of the saints have been visited by these messengers of love. Prisons have been shaken down by their power, and the very night has been made luminous by their holy presence. They have ministered to those upon the cross, and held forth the crown of life when death's shadow darkened the vale. The fierce storm has been pushed on by these swift-winged harbingers of desolation, and the bow above the cloud has been held in angel hands. They have watched over the graves of the holy dead, and lighted the lamp of prophecy and promise in the darkest hours of our world's history. Enrobed in white they stood at the empty grave of our blessed Lord, and gave the weeping women the joyous news of his resurrection. On the storm-clad sea a brave knight of the cross was made to rejoice by the presence of the angel of God. On the lone isle of Patmos visions of crowns gleamed beyond the night, bloody seas gave way to living waters, broken sceptres to golden emblems of immortality. In place of death we behold the tree of life bearing its fruits amid the harvests of a world made new. Angels painted the skies, and painted on the canvas of eternity the city of gold set with precious stones. These are the holy watchers who shall greet the pure and good when the cross gives way to the crown, and rivers of life flow over the valleys of death.

Indiana Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting for the state of Indiana convened at Rensselaer on the last Friday, Saturday and Sunday of September, as announced in THE RESTITUTION. There was not a large gathering of brethren from the state, partially because notice of the meeting was not sufficiently circulated, and many were hindered on account of sickness.

The meeting was called to order by the president, Brother R. S. Dwiggins, who was unanimously re-elected for the next year, and Brother Platt Mc Donald, of Plymouth, was elected secretary.

But little business was done. The report of Brother G. M. Myers, State Evangelist for last year, was read and received. It is as follows: Seventeen days were spent in the work at various points—Lincoln, Warsaw, Muxenkuckee, and Plymouth, which services were reckoned at $12.50. Railroad fare $9.75. Receipts from the brethren $8.75. Amount due from the missionary committee $40.25. The additions to the church were three, and baptisms three. No Evangelist was chosen for the ensuing year, but the brethren elected J. H. Willey, Benj. Harris, and A. J. Spinney, a committee to report a plan for the furtherance of the gospel of the kingdom.

At the next business meeting the committee's report was heard, received and adopted without debate or quibble. It was suggested that by present methods too much means donated to the truth is expended in traveling long distances to proclaim the gospel, and that some more efficient plan be adopted. The committee recommended that the state be divided into districts, throwing together such organized societies as were in comparatively close proximity, that each district might act as one body in the employment of some able proclaimer of the truth whom they would sustain by their means, their sympathy, and their prayers. It further recommended that each district elect its own financial committee; that said committee select a person or persons whose business it shall be to solicit and procure means for carrying on the work; that the committee keep an account of all funds so collected, and of the manner in which expended, and make a report to the annual conference at the end of the year.

It was suggested that Northern Indiana be divided into three districts, as follows: No. 1—Plymouth, Argos, and Antioch, comprising Marshall, Kosciusko and Whitley counties; No. 2—Rensselaer, Goodland, Remington and Salem, taking in Jasper, Benton and Newton counties; No. 3—Fulton, Clinton, Howard and Warren counties. The president appointed the following committees:

District No. 1—Richard Railsback, Argos; I. G. Roberts, Antioch; and Platt McDonald, Plymouth.

District No. 2—A. J. Spinney, Goodland; Job McDougal, Remington; Benj. Harris, Salem; and J. H. Willey, Rensselaer.

District No. 3—J. C. Lincoln, West Lebanon; W. L. Winslow, Burget's Corners and Kokomo; Brother Cuffle, Lincoln; and A. M. Legg, Windfall and Hartford.

The preaching was exceptionally instructive and interesting throughout, bearing upon the great questions of life and the kingdom. The people of Rensselaer turned out very liberally, and much interest was manifested in hearing the Word of Life.

Friday evening Brother H. V. Reed showed, by one of his eloquent discourses, how we are "made nigh by the blood of Christ." Saturday morning Brother Hugh Barnhill delivered one of his excellent practical sermons on Col. iii. 1-3. In the evening Brother J. F. Willcox gave us a most earnest and able disquisition on, "Except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe." At 2 o'clock Sunday morning the brethren met for a social meeting, and some time was pleasantly spent in singing, and cheering one another with words of encouragement; after which Brother Reed gave in his irresistible manner "seven reasons why the church should desire the return of Christ." In the afternoon Brother Willcox showed, in his clear and unmistakable way, how Jesus is the Life-giver. At evening Brother Reed spoke from Luke iv. 18, 19, on the mission of Christ, after which the sacred rite of the Lord's supper was celebrated, partings were given, and conference adjourned.

Four persons put on the saving name Sunday afternoon in the waters of the Iroquois. The interest in the meeting was quite marked throughout, and good must result from the effort made.

Climate of the Danube.

A French account states that the Danube was frozen over twenty times during the thirty years previous to 1864, and the probability of the river's freezing over is further illustrated by a statement that in thirty-seven years the Lower Danube remained open only eight times. In January, 1864, the ice in the middle of the river was at least fifteen inches in thickness, and at the sides twenty inches to twenty-five inches, and this frozen condition of the river continued, with occasional and dangerous thaws, until the ninth of March. There was, it is added, nothing at all exceptional in the year 1864, which may be regarded as fairly representative of what may be generally expected. The occasional breaking up of the ice is, of course, a source of great danger to everything upon it or in it, and during this year vessels of the strongest build were seriously imperilled. The mean temperature of the lower valley is said to be twenty-four degrees Fahrenheit during January. An exceptionally cold year was 1861, and then the thermometer fell below zero, and on one occasion exceeded thirty-four degrees of frost.

Converting the Heathen.

The war in Turkey and the famine in India have seriously interfered with operations in the two countries in which the American Board has achieved its best results. The converts in all mission stations are mainly drawn from among the unfortunates who have abundant reason to be dissatisfied with their lot. It cannot be said that there is any prospect that any heathen country of modern times will be Christianized as a whole, through the leaven of missionary effort. India, as a whole, is as devoted to the traditions and faith of the fathers as ever; China has no idea of substituting Jesus for Confucius, and Mohammed has hardly lost a devotee. A few degraded islanders have been brought into the glare of Christian civilization, and Japan may adopt Occidental religion as a part of the civilization it covets, but there is certainly nothing in modern missions to be compared with the melting away of Paganism during the earlier centuries of Christianity. The modern missionaries do not lack zeal and faith. The simple fact seems to be that the conditions are not as favorable. Then the better part of the world was as dissatisfied with the old religions as the Japanese of to-day are with their antique civilization. Now, the heathen seem to be as well content with their religion as we Christians are with ours, and missionaries find it about as hard work to convert them as they would to convert us. It is quite probable that if as many intelligent Brahmins had labored in England and America as long and as faithfully to make converts to their religion as the missionaries have in India during the last seventy years or so to Christianize the Hindoos, their success would have been quite as great. We know that every sort of fanaticism finds followers. The Brahmin's religion is certainly better, and nearer the purity and sweetness of the gospel, than the revolting tenets and practices of Mormonism.

While there is very considerable interest still felt in missionary work, it is obvious that it does not enlist the relative support it once did. The demands of home charities, religious and philanthropic, press upon the public, and the folly and wrong of neglecting the near at hand for the far away has been quite strongly impressed upon the public mind of this generation.—Evening Journal.

The Land of the Pharaohs.

The past lends to Egypt a charm more entrancing than its cloudless skies and delicious climate. Go where you will, antiquity meets you at every turn. Around you lie the ruins of cities whose very names have been obliterated in the silent march of the ages. Before you flows the sacred river upon which floated centuries ago the little ark of the outcast Hebrew infant, and the golden barge of the gorgeous daughter of the Ptolemies. Time was when this old Nile was the highway down which many successive nations rushed to conquest; for the Ethiopian, the Assyrian, the Persian, the Roman, and the Saracen, have all lorded it in turn in this ancient realm of the Pharaohs. Now vexed no longer with the fleets of rival monarchs, the mighty river rocks with slumberous swell the lotus lilies on its lonely banks, which have rung so often in days gone by to the shrill paeans of triumph, the palms in the sultry noontide throw their long shadows athwart ruined temples and colossal statues, grand in execution and faultless in detail, which reveal in every outline the perfection to which the arts of architecture and sculpture were carried in this their earliest cradle. The soil is strewn with fragments of broken columns and defaced colossi. Buried beneath the drifting sand of the desert lie the glorious and yet grotesque masterpieces of the Egyptian chisel. Serene, grave, majestic, inundated with a thread of harmonious light, the calm features of the once inscrutable Sphinx look down upon us, as many centuries ago they looked down in their grand repose upon the wondering Father of History. Time has pressed lightly on these Titanic temples and vast tomb palaces, but from their shadowy portals the worshipers have gone for ever. Desolate and state-fallen, they open now only to admit the curious stranger.—Chambers' Journal.

Eastern Items.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Oct. 8.—A Shumla special says Suleiman Pasha took command of the army of the Lom at Tchernayoda on Saturday.

There is already two feet of snow in Schipka Pass Troops are obliged to sit in frozen trenches, ankle deep in mud.

LONDON, Oct. 6.—An immediate mobilization of another Russian army corps for Bulgaria is ordered.

BELGRADE, Oct. 8.—Negotiations between Servia and Russia are not concluded. Servia requires the guarantee of independence and promise of extension of her territory in the direction of Bosnia. The Russian envoy awaits further instructions.

Achmet Eyoub Pasha will take command of the Turkish forces on the Servian frontier.

A telegram from Orchanie states that twenty-four Turkish battalions escorting a convoy to Plevna defeated a Russian detachment sent to oppose them.

BERLIN, Oct. 8.—The Nord Deutsche Allegemeine-Zeitung confirms the statement that no alliance has been concluded between Italy and Germany. It says: "Any negotiations which may be pending would have no aggressive significance but would tend to secure the cohesion of Germany and Italy should they find themselves after the French election confronted by a clerical, and consequently aggressive, France."

BUCHAREST, Oct. 8.—Frost and storms have rendered the Slatova and Nikopolis bridges impracticable for vehicles the past two days.

PESTH, Oct. 8.—The Pesther-Lloyd states under reserve that the Prince of Reuss, German Ambassador to the Porte, has been instructed to declare the Turkish blockade to the Black Sea ports insufficient, and therefore void.

A Vienna special says: "Constantinople authorities merely intended that Raouf Pasha shall retain enough troops at Schipka to maintain the defensive. All reserves collected in Roumelia have been sent across the Balkans to a new position which the Turks seem to be preparing at Orchanie for Osman Pasha to fall back upon, should he be obliged to leave Plevna. The only question is whether he will be able to do so. The massing of Russian guards in rear of the lines at Plevna looks very much as if the Muscovites were preparing to effectually close the communication of Plevna by sending a large force across the Vid to the rear of the Turkish position."

The Brevity of Life.

To the young it does not seem short; it seems very long. To the boy of fourteen, the man of forty seems a long way off, and he of sixty removed by an age almost illimitable. But as time passes on, the aspect of life changes. The man of forty thinks forty not nearly as old as he thought it when he was fourteen; fifty appears to him but the prime of life; sixty far from aged. When, at length, increasing years admonish him that his life-work is ended, and that he can enter on no new undertakings, and he looks back to reflect upon what he has accomplished, he wonders to see so little, and is amazed to find the road so short in traveling, which appeared so long in prospect. He then understands as he never did before the meaning of the Scripture simile. "Yes," he says to himself, "it is indeed true. Life is as a tale that is told, and as a dream when one awaketh."

The Bible.

Do you know a book that you are willing to put under your head for a pillow when you lie dying? Very well, that is the book you want to study while you are living. There is but one such book in the world. For one, I have not made up my mind to put under my head when I lie dying anything written by Voltaire, or Strauss, or Parker. We are to be scientifically careful when we choose a book for a dying pillow. If you can tell me what you want for a dying pillow, I will tell you what you want for a pillar of fire in life—that is, the Bible spiritually and scientifically understood by being transmuted into deeds. Sentiment is worth nothing until it becomes principle, and principle is worth nothing until it becomes action.—Joseph Cook's Lecture.

One Step More.

What though before me it is dark,
Too dark for me to see?
I ask but light for one step more;
'Tis quite enough for me.

Each little humble step I take,
The gloom clears from the next;
So, though 'tis very dark beyond,
I never am perplexed.

And if sometimes the mist hangs close,
So close I fear to stray,
Patient I wait a little while,
And soon it clears away.

I would not see my further path,
For mercy 'tis not so;
My present steps might harder be
Did I the future know.

It may be that my path is rough,
Thorny and hard and steep;
And, knowing this, my strength might fail,
Through fear and terror deep.

It may be that it winds along
A smooth and flowery way;
But seeing this I might despise
The journey of to-day.

Perhaps an path is very short,
My journey nearly done;
And I might tremble at the thought
Of ending it so soon.

Or, if I see a weary length
Of road that I must wend,
Fainting, I'd think, "My feeble powers
Will fail me ere the end."

And so I do not wish to see
My journey, or its length;
Assured that, through my Father's love,
Each step will bring its strength.

Thus step by step I onward go,
Not looking far before;
Trusting that I shall always have Light for just "one step more."

The Hour of Judgment.

And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come, and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters. Rev. xiv. 6, 7.

In former articles I have endeavored to show that during the time of the end, both Jew and Gentile will pass through a period of trouble of an unparalelled character. In the book of Daniel it is called "a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time;" also "the last end of the indignation which will come upon the Jews." Dan. xii. 1; viii. 19. Jeremiah calls it the time of Jacob's trouble. "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it; it is even the time of Jacob's trouble; but he shall be saved out of it." Jer. xxx. 7. But the Gentiles also will be scourged. Isaiah says, "behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." Isa. xxvi. 20, 21. The reader will observe that this indignation or punishment is short but but fierce, and God's people are called upon to hide themselves for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. The time when this will come to pass is very plainly set forth, as connected with the resurrection of the dead, and the deliverance of the Jew'sh remnant. For proof of this read the whole of Isa. xxvi. in connection with Dan. xii. 1, 2.

The scriptures reveal the solemn truth that there is a judgment to come. Acts xxiv. 25. It is called "the day of judgment," and "the judgment of the great day." 2 Pet. ii. 9; Jude 6. Also "the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God." Rom. ii. 5; Rev. vi. 17. This judgment will take place in the day of the Lord, which day will come upon the world suddenly, as a thief in the night. 1 Thess. v. 2, 3; 2 Pet. iii. 10. Peter intimates that this day will be a period of a thousand years. 2 Pet. iii. 8. Hence it is the day of Christ, when he will reign with his immortal saints. Rev. xx. 4. The day concerning which Paul preached to the Athenians, when God will judge the habitable by Jesus Christ, whom he has ordained the judge of both the living and the dead. Acts xvii. 31; x. 42; Rom. xiv. 9, 10; 2 Tim. iv. 1. All judgment has been given into his hand, to be executed during his reign. John v. 22, 27; Psa. lxxii. 1–4.

The hour of judgment announced by this angelic proclaimer as having come, precedes the day of the Lord. It has its place in the time of the end, and, has a special object. This judgment will not come until both dead and living saints are gathered unto their Lord. Noah was safe in the ark before the flood came upon the world of the ungodly; righteous Lot was warned and had time to escape before the Lord destroyed Sodom; and so this judgment cannot come upon Christendom, so-called, until the Lord's faithful ones are removed. But, oh, what times! When the lampstand is taken away, how great the darkness! When the salt of the earth is removed, how soon will it go to corruption! Evil will be rampant—wickedness and lawlessness the order of the day.

Jesus commenced his ministry on earth by proclaiming "the acceptable year of the Lord," or the kingdom of God. Luke iv. 19–21, 43. When in the synagogue at Nazareth he read the prophecy found in Isa lxi. 1, 2, relative to himself, he only read as far as the end of the sentence, "to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord," and then closing the book said, "this day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears." But he was also anointed to preach "the day of vengeance of our God." That time will have now come, for both proclamations to be united; and this symbolic messenger proclaims the everlasting gospel, and the hour of judgment, thus uniting the two proclamations. The kingdom of heaven will then be really at hand.

John the Baptist preached the kingdom at hand, and called upon the people to repent, and believe on one who was standing in their midst,—the Messiah,—one who would baptize them in Holy Spirit and in fire. But as the nation rejected the king, the kingdom was taken from them, and given to another people—a nation called out from both Jew and Gentile, and styled by the apostle Peter, "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people." 1 Pet. ii. 9. This nation has been forming from the apostles' days to the present, living by faith in the Messiah and his kingdom, and constitutes his little flock, to whom he will give the kingdom.

The time for the saints to possess the kingdom is near even now; but when the little flock is called to meet the Chief Shepherd while on his way to earth, all who are acquainted with the word of truth may know that the kingdom is at hand. I understand that this glorious truth will be embraced in the proclamation of the everlasting gospel, in connection with the declaration that God's hour of judgment had come. Those who heed the admonition and receive the good news will be saved, though it be the eleventh hour.

The hour of judgment is coming especially upon a professedly Christian world. The church has departed from the truth as it is in Jesus. The gospel has been perverted. Another gospel has been preached for salvation. And yet there is only one faith. The gospel which Jesus preached, and which he sent his apostles to preach, was about the kingdom. The power of God for salvation is connected with this gospel only. All other are spurious and cannot save. The glorious and saving truths of the gospel, which bring life and incorruptibility to light, are hid beneath the interpretations of the priesthood of an apostate church. The fear of Jehovah is taught by the precepts of men. Read Isaiah xxix. 10–14, and Matt. xv. 8, 9 as peculiarly applicable now.

The prophecy and its application related primarily to the Jews; but is it not also fulfilled in the Gentiles? Truly the Gentiles who profess Christianity are as far from the truth of God as ever the Jews were. They practically ignore the hope of the primitive church, respecting the coming and reign of Christ over Israel and the nations, and esteem those who believe it as fanatics and heretics. There is a fearful warning given in Rom. xi. 17–25, to Gentiles of this class. "If God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he spare not thee. Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God; on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness; otherwise, thou also shalt be cut off." The goodness of God has been forfeited by the whole professing Gentile world; it has apostatized from the apostolic faith. It has not the faith; therefore its doom is certain—"thou also shalt be cut off." This cutting off of the Gentiles and regrafting of Israel will be accomplished in the midst of judgments of an awful character. These judgments are portrayed in the announcements made by the second and third angels (Rev. xiv. 8–11) concerning the fall of Babylon, and the doom of the worshipers of the beast and his image. The details of this punishment are given in the pouring out of the vials of wrath (Rev. xvi.), the desolation and fall of Babylon (Rev. xvii. and xviii.), and the utter destruction of the beast and false prophet, with their armies. (Rev. xix.) These details show that the hour of judgment will come upon that great ecclesiastical system of iniquity, and its political supporters, described as "Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth." Rev. xvii. 5. Without doubt the Roman church is now at the head of the grand apostacy. She is a mother, and has her daughters. The Greek church, the Protestant State churches, and the various sects which have arisen out of them, are all parts of a great system of religious iniquity, dishonoring to God and injurious to man.

But the end is not yet. We shall have fuller developments. The man of sin—the wicked one—will appear as the head of the religious world. The Jews will receive him as their Messiah and the Gentiles will be equally deluded. God is about to cut off the Gentiles for their rejection of the truth and will give them up to the hardness of their hearts. The apostle Paul states, or rather prophesies, that the coming of that wicked one will be "after the working of satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie, that they all might be condemned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." 2 Thess. ii. 9–12. For the Christian world to be left or abandoned to such a delusion is of itself a dreadful visitation; but it also will be involved in the judgments decreed to fall upon it. What more can be done for such a church? The last pleading call of the Savior is heard in the first angel's message, preaching the everlasting gospel, and giving full warning that the hour of judgment is come; and this call and warning I believe will be attended by signs and evidences of no common character. And another voice calls from heaven, saying, "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." Rev. xviii. 4. If no attention be given to these warnings and calls of the Savior, what more can be done for such a church, but to reject it and leave it to the influence of the strong delusion, that it may perish in the fierce judgment which will fall upon the wicked perverters of the truth, and the bold blasphemers of God and his anointed.

The wicked persecuting power of the time of the end will be politico-ecclesiastical. In Rev. xiii. it is described under the symbol of two wild beasts—one rising out of the sea of troubled and restless nations—the political power; and the other, having two horns like a lamb, coming up out of the land, the professedly Christian portion of the world—being the ecclesiastical power. In chapter xvii. this religious power is described as a woman sitting upon the beast, and she was drunken with the blood of the saints and the martyrs of Jesus. The beast has seven heads and ten horns. The ten horns are ten kings which will receive power one hour with the beast. Verse 12. Under the headship of the beast, they make war with the Lamb, and are overcome. These kings also hate the harlot which rides the beast,—they "shall make her desolate, and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." This is God's will and judgment upon Babylon, that great antichristian system of religion now prevalent, but then under the special patronage of the man of sin.

As the plagues of Egypt were brought upon Pharaoh and his people to induce him to let Israel go, so the vials of wrath will be poured upon the beast and his worshipers, that they may be brought to repentance; but it is written that they repented not to give God the glory, but blasphemed his name. Therefore he gives them over to destruction. Read Rev. xviii. for a graphic description of this judgment. The state or political power which will support this corrupt church, is the last phase of the Roman empire—the feet of the image, composed of iron and clay. This power carries the harlot to judgment, and it also will receive a just retribution. "The judgment shall sit and take away his dominion, to consume and destroy it unto the end." Dan. vii. 26. The stone will smite the image on the feet, and Gentile dominion will come to an end. The stone power, or the kingdom of God, will break in pieces and consume all these human governments. Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44. The kings of the earth and of the whole habitable will be gathered together for a final conflict. They come up against Jerusalem and the remnant of Judah; but "the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Joel iii. 15, 16; Zech. xiv. 1–5; Zeph. iii. 8; Isa. x. 24–27; xiv. 24–27; xvii. 12–14; xxx. 30–33; xxxi. 4–9; Jer. xxv. 20–38.

Thus will man's religion and dominion come to an end in the midst of dreadful judgments, at the glorious appearing of the Lord Jesus and his saints. Then the kingdom of God commences, and increases, until it includes all nations. Then commences the era of peace and blessing, for Israel and the nations. "The whole earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." Amen.

Regard your name as a rich jewel. For credit it is like fire; when once you have kindled it you may easily preserve it; but if you once extinguish it, you will find it an arduous task to rekindle it again.

MARRIED.

McDERMEID—HARDWICK—By Elder H. E. Cooper, at the residence of the bride's father, four miles north-west of Bath, Mr. James A. McDermeid and Miss Lilla J. Hardwick.

Our Letter Drawer.

Editor Restitution:—I inclose my subscription and three dollars for the altar of sacrifice. The kind admonition Brother Wilson gave in an August number respecting THE RESTITUTION and its editor ought to be deeply impressed on the heart of every one of us that reap such precious fruits. O, it is the word of life, and we can all do something. I am old and poor, but thankful to the Lord, who alone has given me the heart and will to support the precious truth. Let us appreciate and pray for both the editor and those kind brethren who can tribute to our valuable RESTITUTION. I think we ought to heed the Apostle's admonition to lay by a little on the first day of the week for the cause of Christ.

Yours in the love of Christ,
MRS. A. S. JONSON.

Galva, Ill.

Editor Restitution:—While some are praying for the Lord to come quickly and take the saints away and burn up the world, I would sooner pray for the salvation of the world. We must pray for our enemies and for those that despitefully use us. We are very much isolated from all the brethren, as I know of no one of the One Faith in this part of the country. We have no one to preach to us and instruct us except Brethren T. Wilson, N. H. Barbour, and THE RESTITUTION, but feel that we are well instructed. We should be happy to have some of our brethren take it in their hearts to come this way and give us a few good lectures. Yours, hoping to meet all in the kingdom.

ELI AND EMMA STUCKER,

Melcroze, Ill.

Editor Restitution:—Brother J. T. Primo was with us a day or two on his return from Marysville, when he gave three discourses and immersed five persons into the Christ body; he had a good hearing and represents there is a great interest awakened at Marysville. They have a congregation there now of thirty members, built up by Brother Prime, under the direction and support, mainly, of our missionary effort. What we need is the co-operation of our brethren in Iowa in keeping Brother Prime, who is a good and efficient worker, in the field. Come up to the conference October 18th, prepared to assist in the good work. A word further; we expect to make our conference a success. Brothers Reed, Ramsey, Hill, Eggleston, Prime and other preaching brethren are under promise to attend. Remember, Brother Reed will be here on Saturday the 13th preceding conference to stay with us two weeks.

G. M. MYERS.

West Irving, Iowa.

Editor Restitution:—I am now here on a visit. My health is poor, but I am thankful to our Heavenly Father that I am able to visit my children and friends, and comfort them with the glorious doctrine of Christ's second coming according to the direction of Paul. 1 Thess. iv. 18. Did I not believe this, I should say, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Modern theology, spiritualism, and Laodiceanism, bind the people with a three-fold cord not easily broken. But the Scriptures can not be broken. There are false teachers among the people—they are turned to fables, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. I am glad the discussions on different subjects are written in love. May it thus continue. We are too near the consummation to fall out by the way now. I would say in regard to the image—let it stand in all its terribleness till smitten on the feet, and there be no more place for it. The iron mixed with miry clay, as well as the non-descript beast, describes the last stage of human government that will exist. But the orators of the day say ours is the best government that ever existed, thus reversing the order of the image as theologians do the precious doctrines of the Bible to make them agree with the teaching—"Thou shalt not surely die." Dear brethren, the times are becoming more and more perilous. Let us speak and write the truth in love—if by any means we may save some. In Christian love,

LEONARD ADAMS.

Escanaba, Mich.

Editor Restitution:—I do sincerely hope the brethren, who can, will assist with their means in keeping the paper going. The brethren have the means, and upon them rests a great responsibility, which, if neglected, may be fraught with fearful consequences. I am trying to do all I can in the way of preaching the word, and some good results have been attained; and I hope still greater are in the near future.

As ever in hope,

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NOTICE.

Our next conference will be held in November, to begin on Friday before the second Sunday in the month, or Nov. 9, 1877. This is a special call to all, as we want to see if we can put an evangelist in the field to travel all the time. In this way we believe much good can be done. The call is to brethren at South Branch school house, Barber county; Lightning Creek, Wilson county; to those in Coffey, Allen Co., Cherokee Co., Neosho Co., Montague Co., and Labette Co. Let all the preaching brethren come, if we need their counsel. Hicklin, Kinsey Otem, Lawver, Bingua, Hayden Stringer, Bast, Ward, Harlan, Pinn, and if I have overlooked any let them be sure to come, as it will be a free meeting for all. I do think it will pay for you to come. If not in greenbacks, as Brother Stringer says, yet in reminiscences to go on. So, come one, come all; let us have a good time once more. I would not have missed the two last conference meetings for any consideration. Reminder, Nov. 9, 10, 11, 1877.

By order of the Church,

JOHN POORE.

UNION CONFERENCE AT GALESBURG, MICH.

By invitation of the Church at Galesburg, Mich., a Union Conference is called to meet at that place Thursday, October 25, 1877, at 7 o'clock p. m., and continue over Sunday.

Come, all who love the Lord and his appearing. Let us worship and work together in the fellowship of the Spirit. The Church at Galesburg will gladly entertain all who come. Let others be ready to pay the money expenses.

O. H. CROSBY,
Chairman Committee of Eight.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF IOWA.

To the brethren scattered throughout Iowa, and others interested, we will say that our annual conference convenes here at Irving, Tama county, Iowa, October 19th. We desire to see you all here, that we may make our meeting one of profit and interest. We would be glad to have a representative from Northern Illinois, Northern Missouri, and other localities interested in the rebuilding and spread of the gospel of the kingdom.

We have arranged with Brother H. V. Reed, of Plymouth, Ind., to return and be with us to-us in commencing on Saturday evening, October 13th. We also expect Brethren R. J. Hill, C. C. Ramsey, and others here.

Brethren, if you don't come prepared to vote and to produce, come prepared to enjoy the meeting, to realize and have acquaintance, to cultivate friendship and brotherly love, and to be strengthened in faith, hope and charity.

G. M. MYERS.

Early in November I shall start on a tour through Ohio and the Provinces. Will give notice of my appointments in the RESTITUTION. Address me at 35 Johnson Place, Hartford, Ill.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Burdman, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, and inhabitant of the Gospel. 8th of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a literal, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 35c; postage 20c. Paper cover, 25c; postage 2c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A. late Prebendary of Cork, Ireland. 230 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly due in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1 75; postage 16c.

"We find this book with fresh satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an admirable combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has held hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its worth, from a perusal of the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the agitation of the question is one of profound importance.....We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessity so they will speedily be left more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in the painfully misunderstood department of Christian theology.—The Rainbow.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 3d edition. Price $1 25; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little reading, a keen logic, and a clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I, May to December, edited by W. Kelloway. The only English weekly that advocates the Restitution, etc. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the most convincing like as read as to scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $3 75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II, January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of none that is more appropriate. Many who see the necessity of substituting the Bible as a text-book from God. We would be more than content, we would be proud, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and talented lady the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so original, so forcible, so convincing, it would be hard to say where its success will end. Everybody should possess a copy."—Bible Triumphant. A new supply is expected. Price paper covers, 25c; cloth 75c.

The Doctrine of Immortality. By James H. Wallis more. This is a work that has been in market several years. Still it is an exhaustive treatise upon the subject of immortality, and sets forth the Bible view in a masterly manner. Every student of the Bible is in his library for reference as well as one to reading at time. We are feeling after truth. It contains 300 pages. Paper cover, 40 cents.

Emphatic Diaglott contains the original Greek text of that to common version of the New Testament, according to the Recension of Dr. B. F. Griesbach, with interlineary word for word English translation; a new Greek-English Lexicon, based on the interlinary translation, on the rendering of each word in the various readings of the Vatican Manuscript, the 1,900 in the Vatican Library, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references to the use of which is added a valuable critical appendix. 1,323 pages, 8vo. Four parts neatly in muslin. Price $ [illegible]

Watching for the Morning.

E. N. Cantell, writing from Havre, Jan. 1, 1860, says: "I received, a few days since, the following beautiful lines from a niece of Lady Bulwer, in her own handwriting. She holds a busy pen, and is ever scattering such come around her, and is distinguished for her humble, active piety, than for her rank and station in life. She does not give the author, but gave me permission to make whatever use of them I please. I shall be pleased to see them grace the columns of the Christian Observer."

The words of the Lord came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree. Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen, for I will hasten my word to perform it. Jer. i. 11, 12.

The almond tree in Hebrew, shekid, signifies "the waker." "My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning."

I am watching for the morning;
The night is long and dreary;
I have waited for the dawning
Till I am sad and weary;
I am watching for the morning,
When the sons of God shall show
All their heart-cheering adornings
So dimly seen below.

I'm a stranger and sojourner,
A pilgrim on the earth;
A sick and lonely mourner,
Few own my noble birth;
But I'm watching for the morning;
Oh when will morning come—
And I change the world's rude scorning
For the fellowship of home?

They call me strange and clumsy,
But, oh! they little dream,
Of the hopes that fill my bosom,
For I am not what I seem—
I am watching for the morning
When He who for me died,
In triumphant state returning,
Shall claim the church his Bride.

They often find me weeping
When I cannot tell them why,
For they know not the deep meaning
Of my spirit's sympathy;
I am watching for the morning
Of the last and glorious day
That shall hush creation's groaning
And wipe her tears away.

The earnest expectation
Of all nature is abroad;
Waiting for annihilation
Of the true sons of God;
And I'm watching for the morning
That shall set the captive free,
And shall change the chains of bondage
Into glorious liberty.

I will get me to the mountain
Till the shadows flee away;
I will ask of all the watchmen
For the tokens of the day,
I'm watching for the morning,
The night is almost gone;
I hear their note of warning,
I will list not to my moan

Reasons for Dissenting from the Opinion that Future Punishment will Consist in Eternal Life in Misery.

1. Because it is a violation of the penalty which God has annexed to the transgression of his holy law. This penalty is plainly and positively revealed to be, not eternal existence in misery, but death. "In the day thou eatest thereof, (i. e. of the forbidden fruit) thou shalt surely die," or "dying, thou shalt die." Gen. ii. 17. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Ezek. xviii. 4. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." James i. 15. "They that do such things are worthy of death." Rom. i. 32. "Why will ye die?" Ezek. xviii. 31. "He that converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death." James v. 20. "There is a sin unto death." 1 John v. 16. "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." Rev. xx. 15. "This is the second death;" v. 14; terminating existence forever, for there is no revelation of any revival therefrom.

The affixing of the term "spiritual" to the term death, as the penalty of the law, is confounding the penalty with the crime. Spiritual death is to be "dead in trespasses and sins." This is the sinner's guilt, and distinct from the penalty. To say that the wages of sin is spiritual death, is to say that the wages of sin is sin. Who ever heard of the penalty of a law being expressed in figurative language?

2. Because God has plainly declared that "all the wicked will he destroy." Psa. cxlv. 20. That they "shall be punished (not with immortal woe, but) with everlasting destruction," etc. 2 Thess. i. 9. That they are "fitted to destruction." Rom. ix. 22. That their way "leadeth to destruction." Matt. vii. 13. That they are "cast down into destruction." Psa. lxxiii. 17; and that "their end is destruction." Phil. iii. 19. For "they shall be destroyed forever." Psa. xcii. 7. See also 1 Cor. iii. 17; Rev. xi. 18; Prov. i. 27, etc.

3. Because Jesus Christ, the faithful Witness of the Truth, plainly defines this destruction to be, not a destruction of happiness merely, but a destruction of soul and body in hell, (gehenna). Matt. x. 28. The passages quoted declare that the wicked themselves (and not merely something pertaining to them) shall be destroyed.

4. Because other terms, relating to this awful subject, harmonize with a literal death and destruction of being; denoting the same, and not eternal existence in torment. Such are the terms perdition, lost, perish, coming to an end. "He will burn up the chaff ('the children of the wicked one,') with unquenchable fire." If the fire is not quenched, the chaff is utterly consumed and destroyed. "Their worm dieth not;" the inevitable consequence of which is, devouring to annihilation. "They shall be as though they had not been." Obadiah 16.

5. Because the sacred Scriptures, in presenting to us, in contrast, the future retributions of man's probationary state, plainly represent them as consisting, not in a happy and miserable immortality, but in life and death; Rom. vi. 22, life and destruction; Matt. vii. 13, 14; life and corruption; Eph. vi. 8; salvation and perdition, or being lost; glory and destruction. Rom. ix. 22, 23.

6. Because the opinion of man's natural immortality (which is the origin and basis of the common sentiment of endless agonizing torment) has no foundation in the word of God. This word of eternal truth declares that man (not an inferior part of man) is mortal. Job iv. 17; 2 Chron. xiv. 11; margin.

There is not a single passage in divine revelation which declares that man, in the general, is immortal, or has an immortal soul. 1 John iii. 15; v. 2, and other passages, declare the contrary.

7. Because the Eternal Spirit of Truth has inseparably connected the immortality of sinful man, condemned to everlasting death, with his vital union to the Son of God, by a divine regeneration. 1 John v. 1: "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life," i. e., eternal life. 1 John v. 2. "And this is the record, that God hath given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." 1 John v. 11. "The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life." John iii. 36. "I (Jesus) am the life." xi. 25; xiv. 6; vi. 33; xxxv. 48; vi. 54; Col. iii. 4, etc. Observe, the term in these passages is not happy life, but life, denoting that none but believers on the Son of God have eternal conscious existence.

8. Because the utter destruction of impenitent sinners, after various degrees of actual suffering, apportioned to their degrees of guilt, is a sufficient manifestation of God's holy opposition to sin; doing ample honor to his justice, and infinitely more compatible with his revealed character as "the Father of mercies." The wages (or true desert) of sin is (not eternal torment, but) death. Rom. vi. 23. Rom. i. 32. Consequently, punishment so vastly greater than death, as endless torment must be, would be more than justice requires. I question, moreover, whether the human intellect can conceive of a greater incongruity and contradiction, than to suppose that a Being who claims the character of "the Father of mercies," will hold his intelligent creatures in ceaseless torment and agonizing misery throughout the revolving and endless ages of eternity! Surely, it is no marvel, that theologians of reputed Orthodoxy, have been compelled to confess themselves shocked and confounded by the serious contemplation of their own faith of a nature so horrible! Nor is it any more wonderful, that men and women who overlook the revealed doctrine of "everlasting destruction," in the second death of the wicked, should seek a refuge from a faith so monstrous, in the error of universal salvation. The ultimate salvation of the entire human race, although an error of deleterious tendency, inducing fatal presumption, must be acknowledged to be an error vastly less irreconcilable with the divine perfections than that of immortality in writhing torture.

9. Because the term, forever and ever, connected in Rev. xiv., xi., xx. 10, with torment, is, in innumerable instances, used in the Sacred Scripture to denote a limited period of duration; e. g., Gen. xvii. 13; Isa. xxx. 8. In Jonah ii. 6, to a period of three days. In Rev. xiv. 11, this torment is connected with "day" and "night."

10. Because, if the fear of being cast into the lake of fire, Rev. xx. 15, to be tormented for a shorter period than eternally, together with the loss of the eternal enjoyment of the blessed God, the infinite good, is not a sufficient motive to deter man from continuing in impenitence and unbelief, the fear of eternal torment itself would be unavailing.

Finally, I reject the popular sentiment of the eternal existence of the sin and misery of a portion of the human race, because it involves a failure of the plainly revealed glorious purpose of Jehovah, in the incarnate manifestation of his beloved Son.

"For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." 1 John iii. 8. "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also, likewise, took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, even the devil." Heb. ii. 14. This counsel of our Father of mercies shall stand.

The devil and all his works shall be destroyed. Sin is to be "finished." James i. 15. If sin and misery are to exist eternally, the works of the devil will never be destroyed. Blessed be the God of salvation, "the triumph of the wicked (whether of men or devils) is short." Its temporary exaltation shall only serve to illustrate the glorious and eternal victory of Zion's King over all the powers of darkness, bringing in a greater revenue of praise to him "who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."

The discerning mind, unbiassed by human tradition, must perceive that in the sacred oracles there is no revelation of immortality as a natural attribute of man. Were this the fact, he could not have been threatened with death. Gen. ii. 17.—An immortal being can not die. When God created man, he suspended his life, or his continued conscious existence, on his obedience to his Creator. Immortality is plainly revealed in the Holy Word: but as an object to be sought after and obtained by faith in the Son of God, (John iii. 36) and "patient continuance in well-doing." Rom. ii. 7. What prophet or Apostle, "moved by the Holy Spirit," ever told men that they have immortal souls or deathless spirits? If we admit the sacred truth that "the wages of sin is death," Rom. vi. 23, how appropriate and forcible is the gracious appeal of our Father in Heaven to transgressors of his law. "Why will ye die?" Ezek. xviii. 31; an appeal which can never, with propriety, be addressed to an immortal being. In harmony with this truth, the terms, happy and miserable, blessed and cursed immortality, required by the popular theory, are never found in the sacred volume.

Are any of us speculating on this awful subject and withholding our hearts from our Maker, and our love from our neighbor? Let us agonize to enter into eternal life. The overwhelming conviction that God and heaven, and immortality with its inconceivable glories, are lost—all forever lost, by voluntarily preferring the world to God, will be the bitterest ingredient of remorse in the cup of agony of the expiring soul.—A Tract by H. Grew.

Readings From an Old Translation.

As that old translation I have in my possession is getting so old and worn that it cannot be kept much longer, I thought I would write out such passages as would give a better view of truth than the common version, for publication, that all might see the difference. Let it be remembered, that it only contains from the second chapter of Corinthians to the second chapter of Revelation. I will give the text from the old translation, and let all who will compare it with the common version:

1 Cor. viii. 6:—"Yet to us Christians there is but one sole supreme God, the Father of the universe, from whom all things originally derived their existence, and for whom we were created—and but one Lord Jesus, the Messiah, whom God employed as his instrument to form all things, and to form us."

1 Cor. ix. 25–27:—"Every one, also, who enters the list as a combatant, submits to a most rigid and severe regimen. They do this to gain a fading crown. But in our view is hung up the unfading crown of immortality. With this in prospect I run the Christian race—not distressed with wretched uncertainty concerning its final issue. I engage as a combatant, but deal not my blows in empty air. But I bring my body under the severest discipline, and bring all its appetites into subjection: lest, when I have proclaimed the glorious prize to others, I should, at last, be rejected, as unworthy to obtain it."

1 Cor. xv. 18, 19:—"And it will follow, also, that those Christians who have died in the belief of their principles, are totally lost out of creation. If all the hopes Christianity really taught us to entertain were circumscribed within the narrow circle of this vain life, we Christians are the wretched of all mankind!"

1 Cor. vi. 2:—"Let every person lay by something from the gains of his occupation, and on the first day of the week deposit it in the hands of the Church's treasurer—that there be no collection when I come."

2 Cor. iii. 3–10:—"For it is apparent to the world that you are Christ's epistles, written by our ministration, not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God. Inscribed, not on tables of stone, but on the tables of the human heart. Such is the firm confidence we repose, through Christ, in the Supreme Being. Not that we are capable by the exertions of our rational powers to plan or continue such a scheme as the Gospel; all our ability to preach and spread it, is solely derived from God: who hath empowered and qualified us to be ministers of the New Covenant; not the Mosaic, but the Christian Covenant, for the Mosaic pronounced an irreversible sentence of death upon the transgressors; but the Christian Covenant holds forth the palm of immortality. But if that dispensation which annexed death to the violation of it, and whose laws were engraven on stones, was ushered in with such splendor, in splendor that was only designed to be transient and temporary, that the eyes of the Israelites could not behold the dazzling beams that darted from the countenance of Moses: how much more effulgent and glorious must be the luster of the Christian dispensation! For if that rigid and implacable dispensation which condemned the offender to death by an irrevocable sentence, was introduced with striking pomp and glory; how infinitely superior must be the strong and ineffable radiance of that dispensation which is replete with love and mercy! But in this respect the glory that was reflected on the former dispensation vanishes into nothing when compared with the superior splendor of the latter, for if that economy which was destined to be superseded and annulled, was delivered with such an ostentatious display of grandeur—how much more glorious must be that economy which is designed to be forever durable and permanent! Animated, therefore, with these hopes, we use great freedom and liberty in our addresses. We are not like Moses, who covered himself with a vail, so that the children of Israel could not clearly see the end and design of a dispensation which was intended to be abrogated, but their mental faculties were involved in the mist of darkness: for to the present day that very vail, which Christ hath removed and forever abolished, continues to enwrap their minds when they read the Old Testament, and still shrouds their understanding in the baleful shades of obscurity and darkness. To this day, when the law of Moses is read by them, the vail remains upon their heart. But when the Jews shall be converted to the Lord, the vail, that now involves and obscures their minds, shall be forever removed."—P. W. Hough.

The Dead Sea.

The Dead Sea is about forty miles long, and about eight in width. On its north and west shores is a pebbly and muddy beach without shell or trace of living creature, far as I have observed; no vegetation surrounds it, and for our usual noonday lunch we could obtain no shade from the sun. I had to use my umbrella, and can now better understand Jonah's complaint over his withered gourd, and the beauty of the prophet's figure—"The shadow of a great rock in a weary land!" On its banks, near its junction with the Jordan, are a number of reeds, but they were perfectly withered and brittle, probably irrigated, however, by some stray streams from that river at the period of its annual overflow. Altogether the scene was the wildest and most deathlike of any I have ever seen, and had an extremely depressing effect on the spirits, for which, no doubt, an unwonted atmosphere was also to blame. So intense was the heat at this level—the lowest spot on the earth's surface, being 1300 feet under the level of the Mediterranean Sea, and more than 3000 under that of Jerusalem—that three of our party who made a tour of the world said that they had never experienced heat so intolerable, not under the equator, nor yet on the Red Sea voyage. It seems obvious that the Dead Sea water surface was, at no very distant era, several hundred feet higher in level. This fact, I think, incidentally indicates the former fertility of Palestine, because a luxurious vegetation would produce more rain, and consequently a larger volume of water supply by the Jordan and its tributaries than in modern times. Some say a miasma arises from the slime beds of the Dead Sea, which induces depression of spirits and excessive fatigue. This is possible, but probably imagination has something to do with the feeling. True it is, however, that neither man nor living thing tarries many hours in its vicinity; nor is a boat seen on its solitary waters, although from their specific gravity everything floatable swims on its surface with remarkable buoyancy. Even the naval officer who undertook to survey its boundaries and sound its depths has done so very imperfectly, driven off, if I remember aright, by sickness. The waters of the Dead Sea contain a fourth part of solid matter, of which one-half is common salt. It is said the bottom or bed of the sea is asphalt, and lumps of bituman are frequently seen on its shores, as also some flakes of sulphur. The sense of solitude is awful, nor can I imagine any punishment more severe than to be left here alone for even a single week. The valley of the Dead Sea is surely the most extraordinary feat of geography. Its waters have been sounded, and found 1320 feet deep, so that its bottom is nearly a mile lower than Jerusalem! Ever filling, and without egress, yet it is never full—assuredly no unfit type of the "valley of the shadow of death!" Bathing our hands in its waters, a disagreeable feeling remained until we had afterwards washed them in the Jordan further on in the afternoon.—Sel.

Men With Wings.

The theory of evolutionists is short at both ends. Man they say has come up from an oyster or a monkey, improving and developing; he wanted to grasp things and from that desire grew a hand; he wanted to see things and that desire caused eyes to develop; and so he is going on in progressive development according to natural laws.

But we find no trace of these changes in man in past ages: no race of long-tailed monkeyes are found growing into men: but if we grant that these changes have occurred, then what about the future? If man has got so many things by wishing for them, he ought not to stop here. As the Pacific sensibly enquires:

"Why should the Evolution process terminate with man in his present form and figure, or in his present stage of development? Admitted, that our race has come up, or gone down, from the humblest forms of animal life, why should it not evolute further on? The human family have occupied this earth, according to the theories of our Evolution brethren, a great many thousands or millions of years. Is it not strange, if these theories are true, that some change has not occurred during this long period? For example:—Why has there not been envolved a man with wings, or some other physical appendage, by which he can navigate the air? The aspiration has been entertained during many ages to soar. Witness the multitude of inventions in the way of balloons and flying machines, by which to penetrate the blue vault above, to say nothing of the starry regions. We confess that, since tails are to be counted out, we shall have to reckon ourselves among the skeptics respecting the Evolution theory, until some scientific brother shall show us some body supplied with wings."

Where Are We?

We stand on the borders of a new era. The present dispensation is almost finished. In a few more years, if prophecy be not thoroughly misinterpreted, we shall enter upon another condition. This poor earth of ours, which has been swathed in darkness, shall put on her garments of light. She hath toiled a long while in travail and sorrow. Soon shall her groanings end. Her surface, which hath been stained with blood, is soon to be purified by love, and a religion of peace is to be established. The hour is coming when storms shall be hushed, when tempests shall be unknown, when whirlwind and hurricane shall stay their mighty force, and when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." But you ask me what sort of kingdom that is to be, and whether I can show you any likeness thereof. I answer, no; "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him," in the next, the millenial dispensation; "but God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit." Sometimes when we climb upwards, there are moments of contemplation when we can understand that verse, "From whence we look for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be revealed from heaven," and can anticipate that thrice-blessed hour when the King of kings shall put on his head the crown of the universe—when he shall gather up sheaves of sceptres, and put them beneath his arm—when he shall take the crowns from the heads of all monarchs, and welding them into one, shall put them on his own head, amidst the shout of ten thousand times ten thousand who shall chant his high praises. But it is little enough that we can guess of its wonders.—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

M. Thiers has left an unpublished work in which he attempts to refute, on the authority of history, the doctrines of Darwin, Comte, Littre, Renan, and Spinoza. M. Thiers was, in his last days, eminently religious in his principles. He is reported to have said, in one of his latest conversations, "The fundamental truths on the existence of God and the soul are not only incontestable from the point of view of reason, but also indispensable in social life;" and he added, "I have abdicated philosophical pride."

The Rev. George Bull baptized forty persons by immersion in twenty-seven minutes in Savannah, and he is eighty years old, too.

The Harrisburg Telegraph reports that a large number of meteoric stones have lately been picked up on a farm in Dauphin county, Pa., and that others yet remain in abundance there.

Rubinstein has been playing the piano in St. Petersburg for the benefit of the Russian wounded in the war against Turkey, and for this generosity has been raised to noble rank by the Czar.

Prof. Max Mueller has returned to Oxford much benefited by his year's sojourn abroad, and will devote himself to the editing of the translations of the sacred books of the world which he has undertaken.

There is on the roll but one Revolutionary War pensioner—Mrs. Eliza Scarritt, the widow of James Scarritt, a private. She must have been married very young, as she is but eighty-nine years old. Her husband died at an old age many years ago. There are about 400 veterans of the war of 1812 on the list.

The latest Prussian census shows a population of 25,742,404. Of this number 16,630,000 are Protestants, 8,025,340 are Roman Catholics, and 330,700 Jewish. All other sects and creeds, including Greek Catholics, Reformed Lutherans, Anglicans, Baptists, Methodists, Quakers, and Mennonites, number about 125,000. The Free Thinkers are estimated at 17,000.

A letter received in Odessa from a cavalry commander in the Russian forces tells how the officers in the army of the south lack the commonest necessaries. They are often without tea, sugar, bread, and salt, and if, occasionally, a sutler presents himself with supplies, they are forced to pay the most exorbitant prices for them.

The Nubians are the finest race in Egypt, and are in every way a peculiar people. They are black, but it is a lustrous sable not unpleasing to the eye. They have handsome, expressive countenances, bright eyes, well-shaped heads and high foreheads. The hair naturally curls in ringlets. They are the best looking specimens of the negro branch of the human family.

The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian gives a vivid description of the scene in Nicsics when the Montenegrin flag fluttered out from the staff of the citadel. Men, women, and children thronged into the streets; the wounded hobbled out on their crutches from the hospitals; everybody who had a gun or pistol fired it off, and those who hadn't relieved their feelings by singing national hymns and embracing one another at the chorus; war dances were danced in the squares, the venerable Metropolitan and his priests looking on, and over all this uproar rose the booming of cannon and the steady clang of the cathedral and monastery bells. "It is the wild, reckless delight of so many children," writes the correspondent, "and is inconceivable in a civilized country." But the Montenegrins have reason for rejoicing. They have been trying to drive the Turks out of Nicsics for centuries, and now, after a half dozen costly and unsuccessful sieges, they have done it.

Temperance Facts.

It is a fact that nine-tenths of the inmates of our poor-houses were brought there, directly or indirectly, by the use of ardent spirits.

It is a fact that three-fourths of all the convicts in prison were hard drinkers previous to the commission of the crimes for which they are imprisoned.

It is a fact that the greatest sufferers from disease and those whose maladies are the most difficult to cure are those who are addicted to the use of ardent spirits.

It is a fact that of all who commit suicide in this country, ninety-nine hundredths are the immediate or remote victims of ardent spirits.

It is a fact that in families where the children are dirty, half naked, and ill fed; the rooms filthy and in disorder; the husbands cross, discontented and peevish, and the wives slattern, ill-tempered and quarrelsome; one, if not both the parents are drinkers of ardent spirits.

It is a fact that those who least frequently attend the worship of God in the sanctuary; most of those who, by their oaths, blasphemies, and horid execrations, shock the ears of modest people, are spirit drinkers.

It is a fact that those who are most easily led to ridicule and profane sacred things, and to join in every kind of dissipation and profligacy, are spirit drinkers.

It is a fact that of all that have died of the cholera in Europe and America, seven-tenths were spirit-drinkers, and one-half decidedly intemperate.—Temperance Advocate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began. It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal translation of the dead; the translation of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked, except life only through Christ; and many other Scriptural truths. It also advocates a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as a prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Christ Tasted Death for Every Man.

Editor Restitution:—My attention has been drawn within the last three or four months to the special consideration of a subject upon which I supposed that it was beyond the power of any one to arrive at a certain and satisfactory conclusion. Having been brought up and educated in the strictest school of the Methodist Church, I believed, as taught by our standard, that all the heathen, and all the race who die in ignorance of God's plan of salvation, and without the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit working in them a living union to Christ by faith, as a personal Savior, would certainly be consigned to eternal torment. I remember asking my minister some questions on the subject some twenty or twenty-five years ago, but found him as unable as myself to give an opinion that shed any light, or that yielded any relief either to my mind or to his own.

I suppose there are but few persons who have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, who have not felt deeply, and, often, painfully, interested in the destiny of the unnumbered millions—the vast majority of the whole race—who have not enjoyed the hopes and privileges enjoyed by themselves. This feeling of sympathy has contributed as much as anything to promote the great missionary enterprises of the Christian world: or, at least, has powerfully co-operated with the command of our Savior, "To go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

Our moral consciousness has revolted at the idea of such a penalty being inflicted upon those who are unavoidably, and from no fault of their own, shut up in total ignorance of their supposed danger, as well as of the only remedy which the love of God has provided for all who accept it and embrace it. Many persons, however, refuse us the exercise of our moral sense in judging what is right. I believe that this moral consciousness in the unprejudiced child of God, and the written word, will not conflict with each other. Yet, after all, the solution of this and similar questions can only be determined by an appeal to the inspired word; and on its teachings I reply to the important question, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" In all inquiries on this subject I shall be governed solely by the Bible, regarding the opinions of great names of the learned theologians, ecclesiastical councils, assemblies, creeds, and every other human device as of no weight when opposed to its plain enunciations, and especially when these are in accord with reason and moral consciousness which God has given us by which to judge of his truth.

The first gleam of light furnished us is in the declaration made in the garden of Eden that "the seed of the woman shall crush the serpent's head," clearly implying what is more plainly expressed in the New Testament, that Christ came to "destroy the works of the devil." We know that this promise has not yet been fulfilled, but that it will be there should be no doubt in the mind of any one who believes God is able to fulfill it.

We come next to God's covenant with Abraham, confirmed by his oath: "In thee, and in thy seed, shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." In reaffirming this covenant, all the generations, all the kindreds, all the families of the earth are specified as embraced in this promised blessing. Now I ask whether this promise has ever been fulfilled. We all know that it has not, but most assuredly will be to the very letter; for Paul tells us it was confirmed by an oath "that by two immutable things, the heirs of promise—the whole race—might have strong consolation," &c., or, in other words, need not fear that there might be any failure on God's part. Now, not one in a thousand of the human race, who are heirs of the promise, have ever heard of Abraham's seed—the Christ. Is this covenant going to prove a failure in the case of all the unnumbered millions?

God tells us that he knew the end from the beginning. This being the case, is it possible that he designed to save only one in a thousand, or even a much smaller proportion, leaving all the rest to perish eternally, whilst they are, by no fault of their own, eternally ignorant of the fact that he has made ample provisions for the salvation of all?

I am not going to quarrel with the doctrine of election, for I believe there is no doctrine more clearly taught in the Bible, but God forbid that I should so dishonor his name as to believe it in the Calvinistic sense. I did believe it for thirty years of my life. I believe it is one of the most precious doctrines revealed for our comfort, and full of blessing for the whole world when understood in its true import. God did not create man at haphazard, but in accordance with a plan devised before the foundation of the world: and, in agreement with this plan, man fell, not from a state of holiness, but from a state of innocence. Love dictated his creation, and love has guided our Heavenly Father in every step that has been taken in the full development of the plan, even in the fall; and when all the arrangements are perfected and carried out to completion, his great love and wisdom will be so manifested that the whole universe of intelligent beings will break forth in loud hallelujahs to him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb forever. O I bless God for his love, that it does not stop in palaces, nor where the gold and silver are; but it extends to the very utmost parts of the earth, and finds its way among the rich and the poor, and all nations of the earth!

When I meditate and think upon my past life, and then think of the goodness of God, and his mercies to his people, I am made to thank and praise his name. Dear brother, let us work for the Lord and for immortality. O I bless God for the glorious promise of eternal life; and may God bless you and all the faithful workers in his cause. Let us go on, dear brother, ever looking forward to the coming kingdom, and the glorious appearing of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, for then it is that we shall receive a rich reward for all our labors.

Yours in the Lord,
JOSEPH DOOLIN.
Murphysborough, Texas.

[As regards the destiny of the multitudes who die in utter ignorance of God and his plan of salvation, it is a relief to every compassionate heart to know that the doctrine of eternal torment forms no part of divine revelation. Still, taking the Bible as a whole it is by no means perfectly clear as to what the ultimate destiny of these untold millions may be. Notwithstanding the love of God, and the redemption in Christ Jesus, many will reject God's counsel and perish. But as to those who have never known of a Savior, several different and quite conflicting opinions are obtaining among those who reject the God-dishonoring dogma of endless torture. Paul merely says that "As many as have sinned without law shall perish without law." Some think their death-sleep will never be broken. Others think they will have their probation in the coming ages. For ourself, we will wait the clearer light of the day of the Lord, for on this and some other questions we see at best "through a glass darkly." The promise and oath of God—the two immutable things—seem to us to guarantee blessings only to the heirs of promise whom the apostle previously addresses as "holy brethren, and partakers of the heavenly calling," that they "might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." Heb. iii. 1, with ch. vi. 17-20. God is taking out an elect church through whom he will bless the nations in the ages yet to come. See Eph. iii. 21. Though some may finally be lost, unnumbered multitudes will ultimately be saved. The Judge of all the earth will do right. We admire our brother's compassionate spirit, and give his communication a place. We try to shun exclusiveness, though we by no means indorse everything furnished by our correspondents. It is enough to say here, in conclusion, that we dissent from some views set forth on baptism in the one name, on some views placing the fulfillment of the book of Revelation mostly in the future, and on the conclusion of some with regard to the resurrection and human destiny in general. Still we are as likely to err as others, and pray that our understanding may be opened, that we may understand the Scriptures. While it is legitimate to give all questions some attention, let us labor and sacrifice to save as many as possible in our own dispensation. May God bless our brother, and the whole household of faith. Let us, like the Apostles, labor that we may save some in the closing scenes of this age. 1 Cor. ix. 22.—EDITOR.]

Correspondence.

O. M. MYERS TO J. M. HENRY—FOURTH LETTER.

Elder J. M. Henry—Dear Sir: For thus I will have to address you, I suppose, as you refuse to any further recognize me as a brother. Be this according to your own selection: it is not I, but you, who draw the line of fellowship. Do you not know that the cry has gone up all over the land, from both individuals and congregations of your brethren, "Entertain these views concerning the nature of man, but don't make them a test of fellowship." But alas! proscription will come. Creed will out. "You must think as I think to be my brother." And finally among your brethren, as to whether one who entertains my views shall remain with them in a congregation, is made a question, not of right, but of might: I know this by a life of fifteen years among them.

I admire your frank admission at last that I was correct in quoting Webster's definition of man. This point, then, is admitted:

Man, according to Webster, means "Form, image, suitable form."

Man, according to Moses, was formed of the dust of the ground.

Man, according to God, "He also is flesh—in nature."

Man, according to Paul, is of the earth, earthy—in nature.

You ask, "Is it the breath or the body that is intelligent?" Answer: Neither one independent of the other, but it requires the union of the two; just as, for illustration, it requires the machinery and the power—steam—water—air—or horse-power—to grind a grist in a mill, or transport goods by land or water. The machinery cannot do it without the power, nor can the power do it without the machinery.

You say: "I say that the breath is at death given back to God." In Eccl. xii. 7 Solomon says "the spirit goes to God who gave it." Gesenius, under the word ruagh, says this is the breath of life, and he couples with this text Eccl. iii. 21; viii. 8; Gen. ii. 7, and says that it is the same principle used in common by both man and beast.

You ask: "When it returns to God, is it observed by him?" I suppose it is, about as much so as one of your disembodied spirits of a wicked man. Your questions along here may all be answered by asking a few others.

With your idea of spirit before us, as a basis to start, quote Eccl. xii. 7, with Psa. xvi., "In thy presence is fullness of joy," how will you escape a universal salvation? When you begin to reason to escape the conclusion, and talk about the literal, approbative and ubiquitous presence of God, you will have no further trouble about this. The spirit—breath of life—is by expiration thrown back into the great field of spirit from which it is taken by inspiration.

I agree with you in the statement that "the union of the body and spirit is necessary to the preservation of the body," and that the body must, without the spirit (margin—breath), is dead," James ii. 26; also Gen. ii. 7; iii. 18, 19; Job xxxiv. 13, 14.

Your argument relative to man being spirit because of his likeness to God, put in the strongest possible form would be:

1. Man was created in the image of God. Gen. i. 26.

2. God is spirit—in nature. John iv. 24.

3. Therefore man must be spirit.

Let us have another syllogism of the same form.

1. The monument standing in the streets of New Orleans was made in the image and likeness of General Jackson.

2. General Jackson was flesh and blood and bone—in nature.

3. Therefore the monument must be flesh, blood, and bone.

What say you? Do you not know that the image made to General Jackson is—in nature—granite stone? Do you not know that it is silly to argue that an image must necessarily be composed of the same kind of material as that of the object represented? But further, you argue that the language of Gen. i. 26, has reference to the formation of the spirit man and not the fleshly man. A few questions: Out of what did God form—make this spirit? If formed and made up of component parts, is it not susceptible of decomposition? Did this spirit when formed possess consciousness? Will you please give me book, chapter and verse where and when God stripped this spirit into the man made of the dust? One more point you then concede, that when "God breathed the breath of life into man, and he became a living soul," was written of the body man. Further, this body or dust man he called Adam. To which family do you belong? And last, why did Paul say the first man was of the earth, earthy, and was made a living soul, and the second man was the Lord from heaven and made a living spirit? Where will your theory drive you next?

You fail to answer my question in reference to when the (immortal) spirit enters the embryo, and say you gather from my question that I am an unbeliever in spirit. Not at all. I am a strong believer in spirit and in spiritual intelligence, and spiritual birth, and spiritual life afterward; but do not believe in disembodied consciousness, or that it does now, ever did, or ever will possess intelligence independent of organism. Now do not turn around and charge me with the idea, therefore, that God is not intelligent because he is spirit, for the Bible holds out the view that God is a personal being, and has body, parts and passions. This you admit when you quote that God is immortal, and then take the position that immortality is only predicated of body.

You insist that I fail to discriminate between eternal life and immortality. Not at all. As I said before, the one is dependent upon the other, and cannot exist without the other. Dare you take any other position? Give me a text where we may learn that any one may or will live on eternally, who does not or will not possess immortality as a basis. I will agree with you that immortality is predicated of the physical man; but do not construe my language when I say "physical man," that I will admit of one who is not physical.

You say that certain persons in this life already have eternal life. Like many with whom I have talked upon this point, you base your position upon the present tense of the verb. Is this safe? Let us for information see Psa. ix. 6: "Unto us a child is born; unto us a son is given." Here the present tense of the verb is used, whereas the child was not born for seven hundred and forty years afterward. Again, Matthew xxvi., Christ says, "This is my body, broken for you; this is my blood, shed for you, whereas his body was not broken nor his blood shed till the subsequent afternoon. Now, with the text you cite before you, connect Rom. ii. 6, 7. The order there is:

1. A commencement in well-doing.

2. A patient continuance in well doing, and while thus continuing, a seeking for (a) glory, (b) honor, (c) immortality, all of which things sought are obtained at the resurrection. 1 Cor. xv. 52-54); and this seeking and obtaining is in order to have eternal life rendered.

Also, Gal. vi. 7-9, presents: 1. The order of sowing to the spirit.

2. The growth of the crop.

3. The harvest, which is eternal life.

No man ever reaped the crop before the seed was sown.

Further, Luke xviii. 18-20, presents:

1. The reward in this world for service done; and

2. Eternal life in the world to come.

It is frequently the case where the strong purposes of God are referred to concerning a future act or event that the present, or even the past tense is used for the future. Therefore eternal life to any one now can only be in prospect or promise. What say you to these texts?

That you understand the language of your own text as only prospective is evident from the fact that you teach that no one is saved by faith alone, but that he must be baptized, after faith, for the remission of sins—that he must be born of the water and of the spirit, to get into the kingdom. But why this quotation from you? To the point—disembodied consciousness. Admit your position, and if the text will prove disembodied consciousness for those who believe, it will prove the reverse for those who do not believe.

To the case of the rich man and Lazarus again. You ask: "Why call it a parable?" I have given you your choice, either to give it a literal or a figurative application. I care not which side you take as to its teaching disembodied consciousness. Let us try the case again in every conceivable shape. With a parabolical application you will readily concede that the base of the parable is not the one to be brought out prominently, but is only seized upon to illustrate the condition of other parties aside from Dives and Lazarus, and in other conditions than the death state; hence the great fear you and Orthodoxy have of the parabolical application. With a literal application—the one upon which you so much insist—let me, for your benefit, enumerate a few points:

1. Literal Lazarus died.

2. The same Lazarus was carried by angels.

3. The same Lazarus was deposited in Abraham's bosom.

4. The rich man died.

5. The same rich man was buried (the Rhsims version says in hell).

6. The same rich man in hell lifted up his (literal) eyes, talked with his (literal) tongue, heard with his (literal) ears, and felt with his (literal) sensory system.

Can you get any disembodied consciousness out of the case? Further, yes, I am aware that metaphors are frequently introduced into narratives. But question—Which are the metaphorical words in the text? Suppose you metaphorize the phrase Abraham's bosom, and make it represent Paradise, you yet simply have literal Lazarus there, and still no disembodied consciousness. Do you desire to metaphorize Lazarus, and look at him as a figure? If so, whom does he represent? Does he represent Gentile, or publican, or sinner, which? Further, is the rich man in hell a mere metaphor? If so, whom does he represent? Does he represent the Jew, or the priesthood, or the Scribes and Pharisee? Will you please carry out some of the metaphors—supposed comparison, and show me disembodied consciousness? But be careful you do not make a parable of it before you end with your metaphors.

You ask the question, "Has spirit consciousness?" Answer: Primarily it has not; secondarily, by metonomy it is said to have. Again, independent of organism it has not; in connection with organism there is consciousness. Primarily, spirit has not flesh and bones; but when it acts upon a human organism, and deposits in his heart the incorruptible word, the seed of the kingdom, and causes it there to germinate, and then through—or during—the life of that organism fosters the germ, and leads it on, and in the morning of the resurrection raises up that organism, and renders it a spiritual being, as Christ was when raised to the power of endless life, it then in that organism has flesh and bone.

You ask, "Had the spirits that Christ cast out of demoniacs consciousness?" Answer: Independent of the organisms of the demoniacs there was no consciousness.

You ask, do I think a demon is the spirit of a dead person? Answer: In the absence of any testimony whatever to that effect, I do not.

Question. Do you, my friend, believe that there is such a character as Beelzebub, and that he is the god of the green or beezly, as the Egyptians claimed? Do you believe that as a god Pluto ever reigned in hell? Do you believe that as a god over the forest Pan ever ruled and uttered his voice to scare persons, and thus caused panics to armies? Do you believe that Astaroth of the Zidonians, Astarte of Babylon, Luther of Nineveh, Queen Ceres, of the Egyptians—the queen of the heavens—the moon—ever affected any one with lunacy, as all claimed anciently, which disease Christ so often healed? If so, indeed your credulity is strong enough to be a spiritualist. I wonder not, then, that you believe in disembodied consciousness. You might yet be induced to believe that the moon is made of green cheese, provided you could see a disembodied spirit in it.

The Mediterranean coast has been terribly in need of rain. At the end of August not a drop of rain had fallen for more than one hundred days.

During the last fifty years eight-five theaters have been entirely destroyed by fire. During the last twenty-five years five theaters have been burned in London.

Oswego county, New York, has two centenarians, Hannah Fry, born September 10, 1760, aged 103 years, and Mrs. Clark, of Oswego, born October, 1770, aged 107.

Megunat Ali Mirzakhan, a nephew of the Shah of Persia, has joined the Russian army as a Lieutenant-Colonel. There are now five Sheesh princes serving under the Russian flag.

A Madrid professor has published a book defending the Inquisition and pleading for its restoration in Spain, which is pronounced a brilliant defence of "the bulwark of our holy religion."

A Moscow newspaper says that out of the wealthy families of that city not a single member has gone to fight the Turks. They get medical certificates of unfitness for military service, and often have to pay well for them.

Since the recent Russian reverses St. Petersburg is as a city gone into mourning. Nearly every one is in sorrow; nearly every one wears black; the places of amusement remain unfrequented, and the capital, like Moscow, tells only a tale of keen anxiety.

A letter from Rome to the Paris Gaulois, states that the Pope eats and digests well, but he has a constant tendency to sleep, through weakness. He has running sores on his legs, and a painful tumor. He no longer walks, and says mass seated. He is evidently near his end. His physicians doubt his living two months.

A correspondent from the seat of war, on the Russian side, writes to a London paper: "Put a Turk in a ditch, give him a gun, a sackful of cartridges, a loaf of bread and a jug of water, and he will remain there a week or a month under the most dreadful artillery fire that can be directed against him, without flinching."

Shocks of earthquakes are continuously felt in some of the southern parts of Peru. One of a most alarming nature was felt at Cobija, Bolivia, at one o'clock and forty minutes on the twenty-third ultimo, and a similar shock at Iquique at five P. M. the same day. A few days before, at Copiapo, there was a similar visitation, and the inhabitants left their dwelling places almost terror-stricken.

The Bedouins in Syria have entered upon a life of brigandage. A recent letter from Acre reports that two months ago they pounced down upon Tiberias and got $1,500 from the people. The Pasha of Acre went out with every man he could muster, but was forced to retreat, the Bedouins numbering 2,000 horsemen. The people of Nazareth are in a panic, as the Arabs are stealing everything in and about the city. Owing to the war there are scarcely any Turkish troops in the country and the marauders are masters of the place.

The Restitution.

E. J. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCT. 17, 1877.

DO NOT forget the "Altar of Sacrifice." Although serving round it without pecuniary reward, we hope to place one of the smaller offerings upon it. Those unable to bring a costly offering could bring a "pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons." When our Savior was presented to the Lord, this sacrifice was all that was offered. We hope to do a little.

"GOD is a Spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." So teaches our Savior. In looking over the entire Scriptures we find the word form applied to him a single time; the word shape only a single time; the word image refers to him perhaps three or four times; but the word body never. While we utterly repudiate the miserably blinding statements of human creeds, our reverence for the character of the Divine Father is such that we have conscientiously felt bound to use the most exactly precise ("ipsissima verba") words of the Spirit's dictation, when speaking of him who is the "High and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity." While we most scrupulously evade using the unauthorized language of the creeds, we as scrupulously adhere to the form of sound words taught us in the Scriptures relative to the "Eternal God." Israel was taught the most reverential awe of the "Glorious and fearful name of the Lord his God." We have been pained many a time to hear how lightly professed Christians could use this name.

THERE is quite a diversity of views entertained by different brethren who write for THE RESTITUTION on prophecy, the times and the seasons, and on the momentous subject of human destiny. We hope a spirit of forbearance will be exercised. Although endeavoring to evade exclusiveness, we fear there is a tendency to lose sight of a "judgment to come" in its solemn bearings on our future as proclaimed by the Apostles. Let us not forget that there is such a thing as "treasuring up wrath against a day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God." The doom of those who know not God and who obey not the Gospel, is too solemnly and fearfully pronounced in God's Word to be ignored or set aside by any special pleading. There is scope enough, too, in the times and the seasons yet in the future for the accomplishment of all minutia of prophecy, although God's elect church should soon be taken. Gentile supremacy over Palestine will be broken for Israel's return some time before the "seven times" allotted to the Great Image are completed. The final overthrow of Gentile dominion in the earth is after Israel's restoration, and quite a period of time after the rapture of the saints. We will submit some thoughts on the periods and correlated themes for consideration hereafter. We have read what has been presented by our beloved and talented brethren, Magruder, Weethee, Wilson, Cook, and others, with interest. Our readers express their satisfaction in this investigation, and we hope our brethren will give all the information possible on these themes. We are emphatically in "the beginning of the end."

Exegetical.

Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God, 1 Thes. i. 4.

This passage is susceptible to two renderings according to different connections of the word God: from—with either γινωσκω, beloved, or with εν υμιν τον—the election of you, i. e., your election. Macknight translates according to the former connection, and renders:—"Knowing, brethren, beloved of God, your election." Conybeare and Howson adopt the same connection, and translate:—"Brethren beloved by God, I know how God has chosen you." Murdock, from the Syriac, gives in English:—"For we know your election, my brethren, beloved by God." The Latin Vulgate agrees perfectly with the Syriac as it renders:—"Scientes, fratres, dilecti a Deo, electionem vestram," which, literally, is "Knowing, brethren, beloved by God, your election." This latter is the exact word for word translation of the American Bible Union. Accordto this rendering the Thessalonian brethren are represented as the direct objects of God's love, and more remotely as elected. By referring to 2 Thess. ii. 13, where ηγαπημενοι απο κυριου is employed and rendered "beloved of the Lord," we have a confirmation of the propriety of the rendering "beloved of God," in the passage under consideration. This latter verse, in full, reads: "But we are bound to give thanks always unto God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the spirit and belief of the truth." While Judaizing teachers denied the election of any outside the pale of Israel, founding this opinion on such declarations as Deut. vii. 6, "For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth," the Apostle shows that God's love extends to the Gentiles and that, through the gospel, they are the objects, not only of this love, but are chosen to both salvation and honor, through compliance with its conditions, without performing the works of the law. A distinguished author in commenting on the word εξελετο—elelo—hath chosen—in 2 Thess. ii. 13, says "that the word denotes such a choice of a person to an office of honor as puts it in his power to accept that office or honor, but leaves him at liberty to refuse it if he pleases." The salvation offered to us Gentiles, and the proffer of a "crown of glory that fadeth not away," may be treated by us as Esau did his birthright. Let us prize our privileges before they forever pass beyond our reach. The door to the royal honors of the elect church will soon be closed forever. The royal blessing once lost cannot be regained though "sought carefully with tears."

Judgment on the Little Horn.

J. P. WESTBLE.

Era of Signs and Extraordinary Messengers, During the Delay to Sound the Seventh Trumpet—Space of Time Called Quickly.

Let those, who are not satisfied with my expositions, take the Apocalypse and investigate every passage connected with the four judgments defining each of the four classes of agents. Let the following questions be answered, relative to each of the four judgments:

1. What agent is here judged?
2. Who is the judge?
3. Who are the executioners?
4. When does it take place?
5. What events are associated?
6. What improvement does God require?

These questions apply more especially to the first two judgments.

The proclamation of this judgment is called "everlasting glad tidings." On the supposition which we have introduced, that it is God's judgment on the great enemy of the saints, there is sufficient reason for its name—glad tidings. It was joyful news to learn that God had commenced to execute judgment on their persecutor, and that the series of events had then begun, which would soon usher in the advent of Christ and the reign of his people. Thus we hear them, after the execution of the second judgment of the series, saying: "Alleluia; salvation and glory, and honor, and power, to the Lord our God; for true and righteous are his judgments; for he hath judged the great harlot, who corrupted the earth with her lewdness, and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand." Rev. xix. 1, 2.

We have now explained the event, and also the reason why it is called glad tidings, so far as the terms of the commission will afford light. If we are correct in the event brought to notice, we have not mistaken the nature of this agent's message. He acts the part of a herald and an expositor. He proclaims that God's judgment on the little horn has come, calls it glad tidings, and urges upon all to give their fear, worship, and glory, not to the created, but to the Creator. The duties which are urged by this agent are fear, worship, and glory to the Maker of all things, implying that they had been giving adoration, fear, and glory, to some other objects.

At this point in my argument, allow me to say to the readers of THE RESTITUTION, since my articles, on the session of the Ancient of Days, and God's judgment of the little horn, have been in the course of publication, in THE RESTITUTION, for some months, they may have shared the fate of many lengthy productions, and have been thrown aside, without any particular notice, as having no practical bearing on our times. To such I would say, "Collect those numbers and study the articles (for they may require study) till you fully understand my subject and proof," then you will be prepared to appreciate what follows, as well as what I shall say relative to the Euphrates, Russia, Turkey, western nations of Europe, the unclean spirits, the final struggle, the reign of subjugation, etc.

My arguments are public property, I am not. Criticise my arguments, not me. In one sense I may be said to be their parent in the true light, (if they are Scripture truths fully established). I do not claim any nearer relationship to them than the reader. If true, the reader has the same interest with myself. If false, you can see the defects in the reasoning better than myself. It will soon be seen that the subjects on which I am writing, are the subjects of the times. A body, now in existence, claims to be the third angel of Rev. xiv. 9. I wrote on that message (published in my "Armageddon") before that body had an existence, (in 1848). I show what that message is, and hence the mistake they have made in that proclamation.

With these cautionary thoughts in view I will continue my subject.

As the event, here proclaimed, has been in process of execution for the last half century; and as John saw a messenger, who uttered the glad tidings of said event, and as it is generally agreed that this messenger symbolizes a class of men, our application of this Scripture requires that we now produce a body of persons whose character, proclamation, and exhortations agree with those of this symbol messenger, and that our proposition is true, "That God has raised up and commissioned said persons to proclaim to the world this event, together with the connected events, and to urge upon mankind those peculiar duties growing out of said events."

That the position may be made plain, allow us to introduce the judge, the Ancient of Days, in using something like the following language (time, near the close of the last century): "My course of treatment of the nations of the earth has ever been, first, to suffer them to fill up the cups of their iniquity, and then to judge, condemn, and execute upon them their just deserts. Thus have I done with the old world, the cities of the plain, with Egypt, with Israel and Judah, with Jerusalem, with Babylon, Tyre, with all nations near and remote.

"Here is a nation whose wickedness has been exceedingly great. His words and deeds have been stout against me. My holy ones he has scattered, persecuted and slain. Their blood has been long demanding retribution. I have called a court, cited both parties to my bar; have heard the charges, weighed the testimony, and have decided in favor of my saints (Dan. vii. 22), have passed sentence upon the criminal, and have sent forth my executioners. My signs and my judgments have commenced. My Son is about to receive a kingdom and to return. Whom shall I send to wake up the church, and to sound an alarm among the corrupted nations; to go into all the world, and say, 'The hour of his (my) judgment is come?' The associated events must be declared. The coronation of the King of kings, his return and reign, the events of the seventh trumpet. Exhort all to fear, worship and give glory to me.

The qualifications which I require are zeal, energy, self-denial, and great activity. My custom has ever been, to proclaim my judgments to all who will hear. As this is the first of a series of judgments which will usher in the reign of my Son, it is important that these events be proclaimed to the world. Who will enter upon the work of this mission? 'Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?'" A class of agents have responded, 'Here are we send us." Isa. vi. 8.

Who constitute the body thus responding to the call of Jehovah? Their origin, character, and mission will be considered.

1. Their origin.—Previous to the French Revolution, the attention of learned, pious men, was directed to the investigation of those Scriptures which presented the character and fate of the little horn of Dan. vii., and they had identified the power therein symbolized.

They had also learned that the duration of its power would be twelve hundred and sixty years, when, by the infliction of a series of judgments, it would finally become extinct.

In 1798, when they saw that dominion broken, and its civil head, as well as ecclesiastical, carried into captivity, the events were so striking, that the hour of God's judgment on that power, had at length arrived, and that God had arisen to number its days, that a few of that class felt it their duty to proclaim to the world the event and its bearings on the destiny of the human race.

The position taken led them into an extended and critical investigation of prophetic Scriptures, and especially of those parts which describe the features and events of the last days.

As they searched, new light began to dawn, until the entire series of events, of which this was the introduction, began to be seen in the obscure distance. At first, they saw "men as trees, walking." After further investigation, objects became distinct.

Though there were some few able expositors of prophecy in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and early part of the eighteenth centuries, much obscurity rests upon their interpretations of the closing visions of the Apocalypse. The time had not then arrived when the seal on the closing chapters of the Book of Daniel was to be broken. "The time of the end," had not come.

The events of the French Revolution seemed to open a new era in prophetic exposition. Of the time of the end Sir Isaac Newton thus remarks: "If the last age, the age of opening these things, be now approaching, (as by the great success of the late interpreters it seems to be,) we have more encouragement than ever to look into these things. If the general preaching of the gospel be approaching, it is to us and our posterity that those words mainly belong: 'In the time of the end, the wise shall understand.'" Dan. xii. 9, 10. This was written more than one hundred years since.

That great revolution—the preaching of the gospel as anticipated by Newton—has now taken place. In the "time of the end," "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." Dan. xii. 4. The list of prophetic expositors for the last half century will show the dawn of that period, and it has given birth to orders of men whose duty is made plain in Rev. xiv. 6, 7, a class symbolized by a messenger, who flies through mid heaven with an everlasting gospel, (glad tidings).

We shall now call your attention to the origin of that body, by noticing some of its most distinguished expositors; after which we shall endeavor to show that said body has fulfilled every feature of the symbol agent.

Those whose names follow, wrote on the prophecies which are connected with the leading features of the last days. The particular titles of their works we omit, for want of space.

Names of authors.—Edward King, Thos. Zorch, George Richards, J. Dobbs, John Brown, Henry Kett, Robert Nares, Alexander Firle, J. Bicheno, W. Etrick, E. Winchester, David Simpson, J. H. Frere, Wm. Cuninghame, Wm. Hales, John Dawson, Granville Penn, Edward Cooper, S. R. Maitland, Edward Irving, Dr. Towers, W. Marse, J. W. Cole, Dr. Hamilton, H. Drummond, Prof. Lee, G. S. Faber, John Whitely, Bishop Van Mildert, Wm. Digby, Wm. Thorp, G. H. Wood, Wm. Anderson, W. Vint, T. P. Platt, Sir George Rose, J. P. Smith, W. A. Holmes, Alexander Keith, Thos. Myers, Matthew Habershon, B. D. Pogle, C. N. Davies, J. W. Brooks, W. Snell, Chauncy, Leon de Laborde, Joseph Tyso, N. Nesbett, John Fry, J. E. Jones, J. J. Ben Ezra, J. H. Stewart, Lewis Way, Ger. Noel, E. T. Vaughan, Samuel Madden, James A. Begg, F. Nolan, J. E. Sabin, Wm. Burgh, Andrew Reed, F. Sargent, J. L. Brown, Hugh N. Neil, Hugh White, W. Dodsworth, W. Urwick, P. Allwood, J. Fletcher, John Riland, Geo. Bingham, S. Hopkins, Thos. Taylor, David Begue.

In addition to these, a mass of commentaries have appeared on every book of the prophetic Scriptures.

It will be seen from this list, that more prophetic knowledge has been circulated within the last fifty years than during the seventeen centuries previous.

Edward King we place first on the list of those who have entered upon the work of announcing to the world one of its last warnings. It is a pleasing entertainment to trace the rapid increase of light from his day, and the voluntary enlisting of noble minds in this glorious cause.

Many whose names are found in the above list, are men whose piety, intelligence, and zeal would do honor to any age. In this enumeration it will be seen that we have given the names of European laborers only. The American agents have done, and are still doing a noble work. Among the great mass of European writers, the majority are from the English Established Church. The ministers of that establishment, being required to deliver a series of discourses on the second advent of Christ, have been called, in the Providence of God, to turn their attention to that with all its kindred subjects.

Great light has thus been elicited, and they have collected and circulated a vast variety of information relative to the mission now under consideration. Among the most brilliant authors of the English school of proclaimers, we shall name Wm. Thorp, Wm. Anderson, Wm. Cuninghame, Keith, Habershon, J. W. Brooks, H. M. Neil, E. Bickersteth, E. Irving, G. Croly, D. Woodhouse, M. Brock, and E. B. Elliott and Dr. Cummings.

These men have rendered essential service in carrying on the work of the great proclamation. Their writings are full of the fruits of deep piety, profound research and operative zeal. The points in the commission, by them especially elucidated, are:—

1. That the vials which have been poured out upon those nations connected with the Roman hierarchy are judgment vials, and that God has commenced to execute judgment on the little horn-power.

2. That Christ is about to receive a kingdom and make his personal advent.

3. They have shown the nature of that kingdom.

4. In view of these facts they have exhorted all to holiness of life. With them the light has been progressive, yet many points have not been clearly brought out, owing to their popular church relationship.

To those who desire to learn more of the early history of this proclamation, we recommend a perusal of those works whose authors we have named. They will then be prepared to trace its progressive development in America.

The proclamation in this country dates back about fifty years, only. It found the churches unacquainted with prophetic Scriptures, at least, so far as it relates to the near advent of our Savior. They were destitute of the training of the English churches.

The doctrines of the resurrection and judgment were seldom heard, and the future abode of the saints obscured by mists of the grossest errors. They had become, in a high degree, formal, worldly, and pleasure-loving. So long had the Bridegroom been absent, that the professed bride had ceased to rest after him her former prayer, "Come Lord Jesus."

So immersed in worldly cares were the masses of professors, that it required no ordinary skill to draw a division line between the church and the world. Indeed, we may safely declare that each class engaged in all worldly pursuits with equal avidity.

At such a time, the cry of the coming Bridegroom was new, unexpected, and quite distasteful. The bride was satisfied, without her Lord and Master.

Such was the aspect of the American heavens when the first notes of the flying angel were heard.

For What Are We Looking?

Some are indeed looking for the coming of the Lord, while others are expecting a great revolution among the nations of earth, and through them, Jerusalem to be rebuilt, Israel to return to it under the protection of Gentile nations, to live in safety and peace for a time, at least.

But what saith the word of God? In Luke xxi. 24, Our Savior says, "They shall fall by the sword and be led captive into all nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.

Again, when he comes they will be in a scattered condition (Matt. xxiv. 31,) and he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds from one end of heaven to the other, &c.

Also Isaiah xxvii. 13: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the great trumpet shall be blown, and they shall come which were ready to perish in the land of Assyria, and the outcasts in the land of Egypt, and shall worship the Lord in the holy mount at Jerusalem."

Again, Isaiah xi. 11: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea."

Jeremiah xxi. 8-11: After declaring in the eighth and ninth verses how he will bring Israel into their own land, he says in the tenth verse: "Hear the word of the Lord, O ye nations, and declare it to the isles afar off, and say, He that scattered Israel will gather him, and keep him, as a shepherd doth his flock."

Jeremiah xxiii. 6-9: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely....They shall no more say, The Lord liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of the Land of Egypt; but, The Lord liveth which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land."

The Lord says, Jeremiah xxxi. 38-40, Jerusalem shall be rebuilt, and gives its boundaries, and when thus rebuilt "it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more forever."

In Daniel xii. 21, 22, we read that the little horn made war with the saints and prevailed against them; until the Ancient of Days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom."

"Now, there is one thing clear to my mind—that the beast and the kings of the earth do not gather together for the dual great battle until Christ comes. It is expressly said that John saw the beast and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war with him that sat on the horse, and against his army. Rev. xix. 19.

Again, the woman on the scarlet-colored beast, having seven heads and ten horns. In explaining these horns he says, they are ten kings which have received no kingdoms as yet, but receive power as kings one hour with the beast. It says these shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings.

Now, these powers cannot make war with Christ until he is here, and has set up his kingdom, for they make war with his saints at the same time. They have no faith in his coming; then how can they gather together for that express purpose? There is no work for Gog and Magog in that line until the King of kings comes.

It would take years to accomplish what some are teaching is going to be done before Christ comes. What was it caused Herod to be so troubled, and all Jerusalem with him? Was it because a Savior of the world was born? No, no; it was because the inquiry was, Where is he that was born King of the Jews? That was what troubled Herod. And when that King comes and takes the throne of his father David, truly the woman will array herself and take her seat on the scarlet beast, and unite with the kings of the earth. Then will the image whose form was terrible stand upon its feet to receive its final blow.

C. R. ISHAM.

[There are two distinct stages in the second coming of Christ—one, the preliminary coming, is for his saints, which is now near, and may be imminent; and the other stage, the actual coming to earth, may be years subsequent to the translation of the "first fruits"—the church. Christ will gather his elect, and organize his kingdom, so far as a reigning to each heir his crown of glory is concerned, before Gentile times close. There are many preliminaries before the grand crisis in human affairs results in the establishment of God's everlasting kingdom.—EDITOR.]

Eastern Items.

GORNY STUDEN, October 12.—The Czarowitz has declared it impossible to winter his army in Bulgaria unless Rustchuk or some other fortress previously surrenders.

LONDON, October 12.—A correspondent with the Czarowitz's headquarters at Dolmy-Monastero telegraphs, under date of Wednesday, as follows: "The severe storm of cold wind and rain which began a week ago still continues. The camps are literally lakes of mud. All roads are impracticable, except the highway between Biela and Rustchuk. The suffering of the soldiers is indescribable. No preparation has been made for winter weather, and those who lost their tents and overcoats in the retreat from the Lom a month since have not yet been supplied with others."

BELGRADE, October 12.—Prince Milan has received a note in conciliatory terms from the Porte, pointing out that the armaments of Servia are prejudicial to the maintenance of good relations, which the Porte greatly desires to preserve.

LONDON, October 12.—A Shumla dispatch says: "It is stated that Prince Hassan and the Egyptians are to be sent to Varna to relieve the Turkish garrison, who will advance immediately. This is in consequence of the uselessness of the Egyptians in action."

CONSTANTINOPLE, October 12.—Intelligence has been received at the British embassy that Mukhtar Pasha is pursuing the retreating Russians.

BUCHAREST, October 12.—There can be no doubt that a number of Hungarians really crossed the frontier, but, so far, nothing is known of their further movements. They appear to be nearly all infantry, and should they advance far they will undoubtedly be captured, and if they resist be killed or executed as brigands. The Roumanian prefect of the Methedintzi district, having gone to Orsova to remonstrate with the authorities, was informed that the greatest service Roumania could do the Austrian government would be to shoot the intruders. The raiders are former Hungarian Republicans.

ST. PETERSBURG, October 13.—An official dispatch says: "On the 9th instant there was a naval engagement in the Sulina mouth of the Danube, during which a Turkish three-masted steamer crossed the line of torpedoes laid the previous night. An explosion followed, and the steamer sank, a Russian cutter hauling down her flag. It is supposed that all on board the steamer perished."

The Righteous Reign.

It will be order then,
Under the sceptre of a holy King.
Each creature, low and high, angels and men,
To the great concord sweetly ministering.
Self-will unknown, true harmony restored,
Happy obedience to the righteous Lord:
The multitude of wills all lost in one—
The will that rules from the celestial throne.
Disorders, strifes, confusions, groans, and cries,
Then ended in the endless harmonies;
Reign of order, how we long for thee,
In these chaotic days of dark perplexity!

It will be freedom then!
True freedom such as nations never saw,
Even at their freest, in the days of old—
The freedom of submission to save law;
Freedom from self and sin, and lust and gold;
Subjection to the truth, which maketh free;
Surrender of the intellect and soul
To a divine and sweet captivity.
Reign of freedom! how we long for thee,
In these proud, self-willed days of spurious liberty.

It will be morning then!
Morn of the long, long look-out for golden day;
Pure summer sunlight, dropping only health
And never-hailed joy, without one ray
Of poisonous bitterness to scorch or sear;
But calling up creation's boundless wealth
And beauty bright through all the eternal year,
The old sad night forever passed away.
O morn of love, when, when will thou appear?

Correspondence.

Editor Restitution:—As some of my brethren are anxious to know if I have given up the faith and become a follower of Thomas Paine—the infidel—therefore I write.

I am at my own, plain, sweet, quiet home, where I am laboring with my hands in order to minister to my necessities, but I expect to attend the conference at Auburn next week.

I have spent my time, except some three weeks, since the first of last May, in Canada, preaching the kingdom of God, and the things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ; also our whereabouts in this world's history, with all confidence, though some who profess to believe in the soon coming of Jesus our Life-giver, have joined with the nominal church in opposing the truth.

I held a barn meeting in Gainsboro. I had a large turnout and good attention given to my message. I immersed one.

Held a meeting in Moulton—new ground. The house was full, though it was quite large, and the best of attention given to my message.

Held a grove meeting in Norwich. Some 2000 out who gave good attention. Subjects discussed: a. m., Russia and her work, and Daniel's time of trouble; p. m., The Gospel that St. Paul preached. This was the eighteenth meeting of the kind I have held in this neighborhood. Immersed two. Have an appointment for the 4th Sunday in June, 1878

Held a grove meeting in Sweaburg. From a thousand to twelve hundred out, and good order and good attention. Three decided to obey the Gospel. This was the tenth meeting of the kind I have held here. Have an appointment for one on the first Sunday in July, 1878.

Have visited the churches in Clark, Darlington and Port Perry. Had a good time preaching the word and visiting all the members at their own homes. Meetings were well attended. Immersed two, husband and wife, daughter of brother D. Hogarth, which makes ten of that family that I have had the honor of assisting in putting on Christ.

In all of these places I have preached a part of the time for about nineteen years.

Have visited the churches in South Gower, Ventnor and North Williamsburg where I commenced to labor twenty-six years ago. It was in this neighborhood that the Cane family cut down my tent and carried it off, and sought my own life. Never did I have a more pleasant time among the brethren. Meetings were excellent and well attended. Brethren came in from a distance, some eighteen miles. All were blessed and gained a more perfect knowledge of the plan of human redemption, so they said. At Ventnor one decided to be immersed. At South Gower I immersed four lovely souls into the name of the Anointed One for the remission of sins.

At North Williamsburg I held a grove meeting; some four hundred out, who were as quiet as people are in any of the popular meeting houses. Immersed one young man in the pure waters of the St. Lawrence river.

I gave two discourses in the town hall at Oxford Mills, also two in Pompyville, where satan dwells, to large and attentive congregations. This is new ground, but I shall take it into my field of labor.

Visited the brethren at North Augusta.

I visited the church at Chateaugay, this state, where I commenced to labor twenty-six years ago. Gave nine discourses to large congregations, who gave the best of attention to my message, which is thought by some to be unprofitable. I also visited all the members, as I have done in all the other places, expounding the word in their own dwellings. Three decided to obey the Gospel. But I was made sad as I visited the graves of some thirty with whom I had formed an intimate acquaintance in their life time, and also had the honor of immersing most of them into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. However, it dries up the tear, to know that they have left the evidence behind, that they sleep in the plan of human redemption—Jesus.

I leave home next week for the purpose of preaching the word in all the above named places.

In conclusion, I will say for the comfort of my brethren, that my views of the plan of human redemption are as they have been for many years, only more clear from the fact that my knowledge of the plan has increased. On some portions of holy writ my views are changed. As to the resurrection, I believe that none but the woman's seed, or the family of God, will ever be raised, and they will live eternally. That the mission of Jesus our Life-giver, is to save this family—remove the effect of the sin of the world from the universe of God, and usher in the day when the earth shall be peopled only with the woman's seed—the family of God. Then His glory will fill the earth. The sky will be clear and the soil free, the victor's song will float over the plains of Eden and the anthems of seraphs blend with its strains; the sun will roll down its brilliant flood, and shine on a world that is fair and good! This is my hope, and when I give it up I will let you know. None others need undertake the job. Fraternally yours,

R. V. LYON.

Saquoin Valley, N. W. Ont.

P. S. My confidence in the Scriptures of Israel, is a hundred fold stronger to-day than it was ten years ago. And when I find anything in the New Testament that clashes with the Old Testament, I know that the apostasy has placed it there.

Editor Restitution:—I am still isolated from all those of the "Abrahamic faith." I am not aware of any living nearer than Eureka, which is about twenty-two miles, and now but few reside even there; a number have removed—some have died—Christadelphianism and other of kindred isms have divided the remainder, and the few that are left, are "like sheep without a shepherd." But I trust that a few names over in Eureka, (like those in Sardis of old) will be permitted to walk with the Savior, for they, (I trust are worthy). But being without an "under Shepherd," their progress must necessarily be slow like those travelling on an "up-hill grade." The preaching which I hear sometimes, is almost invariably of the sky kingdom type, and in league with the great enemy, (death), which, to me, is not "meat in due season." THE RESTITUTION, in a good degree, supplies the place of the living preacher, or expounder of the Word.

The times are ominous; the day-star of hope has now arisen; the last scene in the great drama of Gentile rule is now being acted on the eastern stage. The coarse, harsh notes of the war bugle, will ere long be exchanged for those of the silver trumpet of peace. Oh! happy day, may it soon come!

Brethren and sisters, we who have a rich father, who are heirs to so rich an inheritance—an inheritance in the earth made new; we can well afford to bear the scoffs and the frowns of those who are wedded to the institutions pertaining to the earth under its blighting curse, and which, of course, must terminate when "the curtain shall drop," and "time shall merge in the ocean of eternity."

I love to read the weekly correspondence of the brethren and sisters of the "One Faith," it greatly strengthens, invigorates and mutually cheers, enlightens and encourages each other to battle for the right during our pilgrimage in this vale of tears. The essays, also, are instructive, and without speaking disparagingly of correspondents of other papers, they bring up from the great mine of truth—the Word—more of the gold-dust, or to drop the figures, they are, by far, the best expositions of Bible truths or doctrines extant. I was greatly edified and pleased in reading Brother B. Wilson's articles, headed, "The Time of the End." In the main, I could heartily endorse his views on this subject as well as the others of which he has heretofore elaborated; but there is one item, however, to my mind, which is not very clear. I do not wish to institute a criticism, but I would request Brother Wilson to show his warrant from the Scriptures to take the last half of the week, and detach it from the seventy weeks, of which Daniel makes mention in chapter ix. 24. I do not know how others view this interpretation, but to me, it seems that it is a regular consecutive prophecy, and its terminus the destruction of their city and sanctuary, (Jerusalem) by Titus, the Roman general. Any other view, according to all the standpoints which I have been able to take, seems rather loose and arbitrary; but I know that you, Brother Wilson, are more skillful in the Word than I am, and I trust that if the subject is susceptible of demonstrations, either from analogy or plain Scripture, you are the man to do it. If you will do this, through the columns of THE RESTITUTION, or through any other medium you may think best, you will much oblige, as I feel a deep interest in a right understanding of this subject. A key to this subject, or a right understanding of it, will, I think, help to unlock or give a correct understanding of many other subjects also.

Your brother in the "One Faith, one hope, and one baptism."

M. I. LEWIS.

Boundale, Wis.

Our Letter Drawer.

Ed. Restitution:—We are in our infancy here in the noble cause of truth. There is much honest inquiry in relation to the doctrine we believe and teach. We hope to set in order several churches, and gather a goodly number into the fold of Christ that shall be saved in the day of his coming. I urge the claims of THE RESTITUTION as far as it is prudent. The people are mostly poor, but we will do all we can. It is indeed gratifying to me to read the able articles of Brethren Wesbee and Wilson. They both know how many urgent letters I have written them both during the last three years—that now is the time to come to the front—that what is to be done must be done quickly. Brother Wesbee is particularly well posted on the prophecies of Daniel and John. We have nothing to fear with an open Bible—a complete and perfect whole gospel. For a short answer, when asked what we believe and teach, we reply: All things written in God's blessed book—the Bible. Remember us in your prayers while in the solitary fastnesses of these mountains—a clime unsurpassed for health and sublime scenery on the continent, if not in the world. I have been here six years, and have had but one cold, which I brought from Lake Erie. Should like to visit your part of the country, but dare not even flatter myself of doing so, as I am getting advanced in life—shall be eighty in April, and have been a cripple with rheumatism for thirteen years. The gospel must be preached, the world must be warned, and the church admonished and comforted. We must act well our parts; soon the curtain will drop; these paralyzed limbs will be still in the death-state, or put on immortal youth and beauty. May grace sustain us till deliverance shall come. Yours in the blessed hope.

NEWELL BOND.

Flat Rock, N. C.

Ed. Restitution:—You will find inclosed my subscription for the paper. I do not know how to do without it as it is all the preaching I have. I have not heard a gospel sermon in eighteen years, nor seen a person of the one faith, and I am alone. I was awakened by reading Miller's Lectures. I took brother Marsh's paper and have followed it through all its changes to the present time. I love the brethren and sisters; although I have not seen them, still they are dear to me. THE RESTITUTION has not come regularly for the last six or eight months. I feel the loss of them badly. I am old and childish; if I live till February next I shall have seen seventy-nine winters. I lost my companion seventeen years ago, who died in the faith of a speedy resurrection.

J. S. ABEE.

Galt Lake, Mich.

Editor Restitution:—Greeting in Christ, as waiting and watching for that day when the church shall be for the praise of his glory to the nations of the earth.

I am a minister of the word of God ("not of man, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ and God the Father who raised him from the dead.") I have been laboring the last three years among that body of believers who profess to be looking for the second coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ without a sin-offering unto salvation. I do love them as brethren and sisters in this glorious hope, partakers of the heavenly calling. At the same time, to my mind's discernment of God's word, I have held views as truth, advocated by your publication, THE RESTITUTION, and, as a necessity in me, I have proclaimed, and, as a servant of Jesus Christ, must proclaim them spiritual things being compared with spiritual.

At the conference at Chelsea you as well as I know of the lines drawn, the resolutions adopted, thereby prohibiting a free mind from proclaiming it thus saith the Lord in their denomination. I have had my mind exercised for a year or more as to a field of labor in the West. Now, after due consideration, in the Lord, though having an opening South, we are deeply impressed Westward. My wife and self, comprising the family, are both entirely in the work of saving souls. She is well known this way as a bible canary among the poor and needy. She was South just after the war for two years, laboring among the freedmen in the Lord.

We are willing to go any where the Lord guides. We do not set up pretense on our labor, although we have nothing, yet possessing all things in Christ, we have the promise of food and raiment.

Now, brother, we would like to go to some open door where there is one brother or more in Christ, where the good news of the kingdom is acknowledged, to use our liberty in the Lord, taking the Bible, the blessed word, as our creed. We would like to communicate with some humble follower of Jesus, and, after prayer as to the Lord's will, we are ready to start—devoting time, talents, and all our forces to the glorious labor of love among our fellow-men. I have written this, dear brother, knowing the time is short. O the glorious news, the all-absorbing subject, the only hope—Jesus is soon coming.

In faith, hope, and charity, your brother worker,

E. N. R.

[As this was a private letter we withhold the name. We trust our devoted brother and sister will find a field of labor where they can "preach the kingdom of God, and teach those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding them." Acts xxviii. 31. There are many who rejoice in the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. Truth is mighty and will prevail. If crushed to the ground she will rise again. The eternal years of God are hers. For ourself, we are willing to preach in the school house, the grove, or the private dwelling. As Jesus suffered without the gate, we are willing, as we have been for the last thirty-five years, to go forth without the camp bearing his reproach—and the reproach of his truth. We will neither repine nor complain of our lot or treatment, for the truth's sake. We fear God will not be well pleased with some things, but we will not censure.—EDITOR.]

Editor Restitution:—A word in commendation of your labors and paper is due, for I know in such work discouragement from the things of this age are more plentiful than encouragements.

I believe in "ages to come," and in the restoration of Israel in the flesh to their own land and to their proper position as head of the nations. I strongly incline to believe the Anglo-Saxons are "lost" Israel. I believe Daniel's seventieth week is future; as is also the proper day-day fulfillment of the Apocalypse. I agree almost entirely with the late articles of Brother Benjamin Wilson on the "Time of the End." I ought to say that the "Exegetical" articles of THE RESTITUTION are to me most valuable. I hope you will continue to be at the trouble to put in all the Hebrew and Greek type you can.

Yours in hope of the promise.

In Hell.

The battle rages, and as the fight just now is fierce, though bloodless, in relation to "sheol, hades, soul, body," etc., we join in the fray, and furnish our "quota" of testimony, as drawn from an old Scotch divine of the eighteenth century, Alexander Pirie, of Newberg, Scotland. He says:

"It has been argued by Dr. Whitby and his numerous followers, that a proper and literal resurrection is never in the whole New Testament expressed or represented by the living of the soul, but by the living, raising and resuscitation of the dead—the raising of the bodies of the saints—of them that slept in the dust or in their graves. A very confident assertion, this! Let us see whether it be just or not. In Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 27-31, we find the resurrection of Christ expressed in the very words employed by David for that purpose: 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither will thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.' This, says Peter, David as a prophet 'Spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither did his flesh see corruption.' Now, it will be allowed that the clauses of this verse or distich of David are parallel and synonymous, expressing the same thing in different words. Consequently the hell in the first line is the same as the place of corruption in the second, and the soul in the one corresponds with the flesh in the other. Here, then, it is evident that the soul of our Lord is said to live again, or to be raised from the dead, and also that the resurrection of the soul includes the resurrection of the body; so that it is a matter of indifference whether you say the soul or the body rose, since the one can neither die nor rise again without the other, only to die and to live again are more immediately and properly applied to the soul or life than to the body, for reasons previously given. Two consequences necessarily follow. 1. The above remark of Dr. Whitby is unfounded in truth. Here is a proper and literal resurrection expressed in the New Testament by the living again of the soul, and as the resurrection of the dead here from the dead is an expressed, was it not proper to express the resurrection of his younger brethren in the same terms? Yea, might we not have expected that John as a prophet would use the language common to all the ancient prophets? 2. When we hear John saying, "I saw the souls of them that were beheaded, &c., and they lived with Christ," we must necessarily understand this as spoken of their reanimated and risen bodies, because Peter has taught us so to explain the resurrection of the soul of Christ, the Lord and Head of the resurrection."—Voice of the Church, By D. T. T., p. 252.

There, that's a "two-edged blade," and cuts "ugn in the past," as well as "soul in hades, an entity."

G. W. STETSON.

Edinboro, Pa.

Gorny Studen is a wretched village of a few hundred inhabitants, the Turk's quarter being on one hill and the Bulgarian on an opposite height. The former is deserted by its proprietors and houses have been unroofed by soldiers to get at the wooden rafters, fuel being scarce in northern Bulgaria. The only building remaining in this part of the village is occupied by the Emperor of all the Russias. It is built of unburnt clay bricks, and its low roof covered with rough tiles. Here in this hovel the Autocrat passes his days and nights, anxiously awaiting news from his various armies in the field. There is no pomp surrounding this humble Imperial residence; two Circassians of the Guard with drawn sabres were when I first saw it all that stood between the Czar and the outside world. A short distance from the house is a large tent, where the Emperor dines at six with his staff and invited guests. On the opposite side of the little street or road is the tent of Gen. Ignatieff.

Every man stands surrounded by innumerable mysteries; and in the middle of them all, none are more mysterious than himself. Life is a mystery. Sun, moon and stars are mysteries. What wonder then that there should be mysteries in God?

The Altar of Sacrifice.

We, the undersigned, having the good of the cause of truth at heart, and feeling that it is our duty to sustain the gospel with our means as well as our tongues, and believing that God will bless us for all the sacrifice we make in behalf of the truth, agree to pay the amount opposite our names for the purpose of freeing the RESTITUTION from debt, and sending it out as a messenger of truth to those sitting in darkness, and to comfort those who are walking in the light of life:

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NOTICE.

Our next conference will be held in November, to begin on Friday before the second Sunday in the month, or Nov. 9, 1877. This is a day distant to suit us we want to see if we can put an evangelist in the field to travel all the time. In this way we believe much good can be done. The call is for brethren at South Branch of Lost Creek, Barber county; Elbow Creek, Wilson county; Coffee Co. Fellow Co. Linn, Shelby Co., Neosho Co., Harrison Co. and Labette Co. Let all the preaching brethren come, and we need their counsel. Hicklin, Kinsey, Quest, Lawver, Dingee, Hayden, Metzger, Ruff, Wm. Hadley, Flora, and if I have omitted any let them be considered as if I will be a free meeting for all. I do think it will pay for you to come, if not to preach here, to Pleasant valley, yet in reconnoitering to go to. So, come one, come all; let us have a good time once more. I would not have missed the two last conference as others for any consideration. Remember, Nov. 9, 10, 11, 1877.

The above conference will be held at the Grange School House on Big Creek, ten miles north-west of Erie, Neosho Co. only. Kansas.

By order of the Church,

JOHN FOSTER.

UNION CONFERENCE AT GALESBURG, MICH.

By institution of the Church at Galesburg, Mich., a Union Conference is called to meet at that place Thursday, October 25, 1877, at 2 o'clock p. m. and continue over Sunday.

Come all who love the Lord and his appearing, let us worship and work together in the fellowship of the spirit. The Church at Galesburg will kindly entertain all who come. Let others be ready to pay the necessary expenses.

H. E. PARKHURST,
CHARLES CORNELIUS, } Committee of Arrangements.

Early in November I shall visit the churches in Wisconsin, if there be any there who desire a visit from me. Please write me at Jefferson, Jefferson Co., Wis. Yours in the hope,

J. M. STEPHENSON.

Diglott, in one large 12mo. Price $ [illegible] Extra bind [illegible]

The Jewish Pilgrim.

Is to these the ancient holy hills,
Where angels walked of old?
Is this the land our story fills
With glory not yet cold?
For I have paced by many a shrine,
O'er many a land and sea;
But still, oh! promised Palestine,
My dreams have been o' thee.

I see thy mountain cedars green,
Thy valleys fresh and fair;
With summer's brightness they have been,
When Israel's home was there;
Though o'er thee world and time have passed,
And cross and crescent shone,
And hardly the Czar has pressed,
O thou art still our own.

Thine are the wandering race that go
Unblest through every land;
Whose blood has stained the polar snow,
And drunk of the desert sand;
And thine the home for hearts that turn
From all earth's shrines to thee,
With their one faith, for goo home
In prophet memory.

For thrones have fallen, and nations gone
Before the march of time;
And, where the cross o'ertopped stone,
Are forests in their prime;
Since Gentile ploughshares marred the brow
Of Zion's holy hill,
Where are the Roman eagles now?
Yet Judah wanders still.

And he who wandered there in vain,
A pilgrim of the past?
No, long ere Israel's hope has been,
But it shall come at last;
For in her wastes a voice I hear,
As from a people's grave,
It bids the nations build not there
For Jacob shall return.

Oh, lost and loved Jerusalem!
Thy pilgrim may not stay,
To see the glad earth's harvest home,
In thy redeeming day.
But now resigned in faith and trust,
I seek a nameless tomb;
At least beneath thy hallowed dust,
Oh! give the wanderer room.

Selections.

The Present Russo-Turkish War in Prophecy.

BY DR. E. H. NOLAN, PH. D., LL. D.

Author of "History of the Crimean War," "History of India," "Continuation of Hume's History of England," etc.

One of the most disturbing elements of power ever felt in the ecclesiastical and political world appeared in connection with the rise, growth, and conquests of Mohammedanism. The incursion upon Eastern Europe of the Saracens, and their successors the Turks, spread consternation throughout the civilized world, until literally men trembled at the sound of the Ottoman drum.

Various sections of the Christian Church suffered much by the subjugation of the territories seized by the Turks, such as the Greek, Syrian, Coptic, Nestorian, and other Eastern churches, and, to a certain extent, the Western Latin Church; but it is remarkable that Protestant Christendom, although sometimes sharing the common alarm, partook but little of the sufferings so generally inflicted. The Ottoman scourge appears to have had for its mission the chastisement of the relentless bigotry and the degrading superstition and idolatry of Oriental Christendom, until the full measure of God's judgment was accomplished, and then the instrument of punishment was itself destined to pass away.

Even in its decay the sword of Mohammed has smitten the Greek Christians of the Russian Church of European Turkey, and of Asia Minor with destructive violence, not much less than in the acme of its power.

At present the eyes of all nations are turned in the direction of the Turkish Empire, either in sympathy, hostility, or observant wonder. The great Powers of Europe await with anxiety and suspense the issue of the war which now turns the fairest lands of Europe and Asia into a vast Aceldama; and all men, with deep forebodings, ask when will this havoc end, and to what issue will it tend?

Here we turn to Scripture prophecy, and find some clearly prescribed data upon which to form ground for some definite conclusions.

1. We think it is manifest, taking prophecy as our guide, that the final overthrow of Turkey will not result from this war. It is acknowledged by all historical interpreters of prophecy that the invading torrent of Ottoman cavalry, about 1063 A. D., is symbolized in the year-day fulfilment of the sixth trumpet by the vast hosts of Euphratean horsemen; for the banks of the river Euphrates were the original home of the Turkish people.

And it is also agreed that the ultimate drying-up of the rushing torrent of Turko-Mohammedan power is predicted under the sixth vial in Rev. xvi., in the sixth vial being poured out upon the river Euphrates, and the water thereof being dried up. Now, the process of "drying up" implies internal decay and wasting away of the Turkish Empire; and therefore Turko-Mohammedan supremacy over the Ottoman Empire may be expected to pass away quite as much by internal democratic revolutions and innate weakness as by attacks from without.

It is therefore obvious, from a prophetic point of view, that the doom of Turkey is internal decay. The Russian war conduces to this; but it is far more expensive to the Czar than the Sultan. The Russian Empire is deeply in debt, and the social, industrial, and economical effect of conscription in it is most severe. Russia, to conquer Turkey, must conquer allied Europe. Not only is England determined against a Russian occupation of Constantinople, but the Austro-Hungarian Empire is opposed to it, and the Ultramontane party in France are energetically striving to create an anti-Russian feeling.

So far as this war is concerned, the light which prophecy sheds upon it shows that, whatever remoter consequences may ensue, this war will not close with the Russian eagles being planted on St. Sophia, in Constantinople; for Russia, being outside the Roman Empire, can never hold permanent possession of territory within the Roman Empire, that is to say, south of the Danube, such as Bulgarian or Servian territory.

2. As one of the outgrowths of the present war, the restoration of the Jews to Palestine is indicated in prophecy.

The object of the drying up of the Euphrates is thus stated in Rev. xvi. 12: "And the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared." That the Turkish Empire in Europe shall vanish, making way for new interests and influences and peoples, is in this passage clearly implied. Hence the question arises, "Who are the kings of the East?"

Some few interpreters have thought that the kings of (or from, in the Greek) the East will be potentates whose armies will subdue Turkish territory, such as the Empress of India, the Czar, as dominating Central Asia, the Shah of Persia, British tributaries from India, etc.

Some consider the kings from the East will be the ten tribes, led by their chiefs and princes, who shall emerge from their obscurity in North Asia, and march to the promised land, and that this will be the occasion of inciting the Antichrist and the False Prophet to perpetrate their dreadful persecutions and atrocities (Dan. xi. 43-4).

Closely allied to this opinion is the view of the best critics, that the Jewish people in general, whether the two or the ten tribes, are pointed out; designated kings, because of the royal dignity God has conferred upon them, and with which at the time of their return they shall again be honored. That the Jews will again occupy their own land is a truth which fills many pages of prophecy; and that the decay of the Parthian and the separation and independence of Syria would promote that, all observers of the signs of the times will admit.

This is very fully predicted in Ezek. xxxviii., where, at a period of prophetic fulfillment yet future, Israel is described as gathered out of the nations and dwelling securely in their own land under the auspices of "Turbish"—England—the nation emblemized by lions. Isaiah and other prophets portray the future sanctity and glory of Jerusalem in glowing terms. "The mountain of the house of the Lord shall be exalted above the hills; the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

3. Syria and Egypt will be fully separated from Turkey, as a result of this Russo-Turkish war. The ruler of the former is prophetically entitled king of the North, and of the latter king of the South (Dan. xi. 36-45). This also appears from Dan. viii. 23, where the four horns, or kingdoms into which Greece was originally broken up, are represented as re-existent in the latter times.

It is plainly apparent from Dan. viii., that the four kingdoms into which the notable horn, Alexander's Macedonian Empire, was divided were Greece, Syria, Egypt, and Thrace or Turkey (now so called); and that in the latter time of their kingdom, when they shall be re-existent at the time of the end, the future Napoleonic Antichrist—a king of fierce countenance, understanding dark sentences, and by his policy causing craft to prosper in his hand—shall stand up and enact his desolating career, and at last be "broken without hand."

4. Contemporaneous with the pouring out of the sixth vial upon Turkey, the revival of French Napoleonic power is indicated. In Revelation xvi. 13, the Apostle John records a certain phenomenon as his vision. He sees three unclean spirits, like frogs, go out of the mouth of the Dragon, the beast, and the False Prophet; and their mission is to gather the nations to the great day of the war (battle) of God Almighty. Fleming proved in 1693 that three frogs were the ancient device of the French kings, and pointed out that approximately, at the present period, France would exercise vast influence over the policy of nations, and for the most pernicious purposes—the Dragon, the Beast, and the False Prophet promoting French ends, which Fleming expressed as the devil diffusing infidelity—the tyrannical power of despotism—and the imposture of the False Prophet working lying miracles, putting forth false representations and persecuting power. We see in fulfillment of all this that there is already a revival of infidelity, and Ultramontanism, and, on the part of the Roman clergy, of pseudo-miracles, although only a slight installment of what is yet to come.

The Rev. E. B. Elliott, in his voluminous Commentary, goes very minutely into the apparition of the frogs, showing that three frogs were emblazoned on the banner, shield, and crest of the French under Clovis, as commemorative of the marshy country of Westphalia, whence they came.

A revival of the Napoleon dynasty is politically probable; and there appears to be, prophetically, a certainty of it. At present the French Ultramontanes, of their own will, and by instruction from the Vatican, have given up all thoughts of the restoration of the Bourbon family; the Comte de Chambord is impracticable, the Duc D'Orleans unreliable. The Episcopate is Bonapartist, Pius IX. has set his heart upon the overthrow of the Conservative Republic and the restoration of the Napoleon dynasty. The death of M. Thiers last week is a sad blow to the prospects of the Conservative Republic, of which he was the mainstay, and a corresponding advantage to the Bonapartists and Ultramontanes.

The seventh and last head of the Apocalyptic wild beast must be a Napoleon; for six forms of government passed away previous to Napoleon Bonaparte's conquest of Italy; the Holy Roman Empire closed in 1806, when the Austrian Kaiser had to abdicate the title by command of Napoleon, who made himself King of Rome—a title afterwards borne by his son until his death. The Napoleonic head of the beast was predicted, in Rev. xiii. 3, to receive a deadly wound, and afterwards to become healed of its deadly wound. Accordingly it was wounded to death at Waterloo in 1815, and at Sedan in 1870. Its predestined resuscitation is only a question of time. The coming Napoleon will assume a power and dominion co-extensive with Cæsar's ancient Roman Empire.

The predicted number of the Antichrist's name, which is to be "the number of a man," is 666 (Rev. xiii. 18), and Napoleon's name in its Greek inscriptive form contains exactly 666. In Rev. ix. 11 it is stated that in Greek his name is to be Apollyon. Several exegetical writers have shown that this word is radically identical with Napoleon. The Italians prefix the letter "N" to words adopted from the Greek, thus Abassos (Greek for Abyss); is Nabassos in Italian; and as the Bonapartes originally migrated from Greece to Italy, the name Apoleon would thus be styled Napoleon.

Every prophetic indication points to the fact that French diplomacy and force will again become predominant under a Napoleon, and culminate in the development of the final Napoleonic Antichrist.

According to the theory of the twofold application fulfillment—year-day and literal-day—of the 1,260 days in Rev. xi. 3, xii. 6, it is to be expected that for three and a half years, or 1,260 literal days, a personal Napoleonic Antichrist will fill the world with woe, and persecute the Christian Church, just as for 1,260 years the Popish and Mohammedan Antichrists have persecuted the Church.

By the common verdict of exegetical scholars the time is at hand for these things. The latter end is hastening on apace. The present war, conducing to the wasting away of Turkey, is a necessary preliminary to the grand conclusive chapters of "the Times of the Gentiles" and of the present dispensation. And as the whirlwind of war spreads waste and desolation and woe, and the exhaustion of the Euphratean power proceeds, God's ancient people will prepare for the occupation of their beloved Jerusalem, and a new Syrian kingdom will be founded. Ultimately Christ will descend, and reign personally over the nations of this earth for 1,000 years (Rev. xx).

What we have to look for is the development of a confederation of ten kingdoms coinciding with the ten horns and ten toes (Daniel vii. 24; ii. 42-4); then the inchoate rise of the Bonapartist Antichrist, the little horn (Daniel vii. 8, 20); then his seven years' covenant with the Jews (Daniel ix. 27), and in the midst of those seven years, his violation of that covenant and the erection of his image, the abomination of desolation, inside the Jewish temple, which event will initiate the final three and a half years' great tribulation and persecution, which terminates by Christ's descent and destruction of Antichrist (2 Thess. ii. 8; Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 20). There will probably be a coming of Christ before those three and a half years, to raise the deceased saints and translate some watchful Christians to meet him in the air (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17).—Signs of the Times.

Importance of Scripture Prophecy.

BY MR. R. S. MAHONEY.

A great part of Scripture consists of prophecy; yet but few Christians make prophecy their study, while the doctrinal and hortatory parts of Scripture form the subject of their earnest daily consideration. Nevertheless, they would find that the study of prophetic truth would throw much light on their present path, and would give much practical encouragement to their ministry, while their faith would rest on a broader, deeper comprehension of God's character and ways, and their spiritual horizon take a far wider sweep, and stand out in clearer outlines than before.

In the book of Isaiah God appears challenging the philosophers or sceptics of this world to the test of prophetic proof. Isa. xli. 21-23: "Produce your cause, saith Jehovah; bring forth your strong reasons. Let them bring them forth, and show us what shall happen; let them show the former things, what they be, that we may consider them, and know the latter end of them; or declare us things for to come. Show the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods."

Again, in Isaiah xlii. 9, Jehovah points to the plain accomplishment of events which he had foretold by the mouth of his servants the prophets, and announces fresh predictions: "Behold the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare: before they spring forth I tell you of them." In chapter xliii. 9, 10, 12, he proclaims Israel to be his witnesses to all the nations of the world; and such they are to this day. This weapon alone out of God's armory can cut through all the sophistries and opposition of men. Prophecy is their history. Without a king, without a priest, without a constitution, without the constituent elements of a people, they exist unabsorbed in the countries where they are scattered. They fulfill in every line the picture drawn by the Master's hand in Hosea iii. 4, 5. They are God's witnesses.

Frederick the Great, of Prussia, although he prided himself on his sceptical philosophy, is said to have had a chaplain attached to his household who was a faithful man of God. The king was accustomed to endeavor to amuse himself and his court sometimes at this good man's expense; and on one occasion, coming to dinner in high spirits, he turned to the chaplain, and said, "Doctor, if your religion is a true one, it ought to be capable of a very brief and simple proof. Will you give me an evidence of its truth in one word?" The good man thought for a few moments, and then gravely answered: "It is capable even of such proof. I accept your majesty's challenge, and will give you in one word an unanswerable evidence of the faith I hold: that word is—Israel." The king was silenced, if not convinced, by this use of the divine argument.

Scripture teaches us that the true prosperity of this earth is dependent upon the happiness of Israel. Had Israel been faithful to the trust committed to her in times past, she would have brought blessings to the whole world. The forty glorious years of Solomon's reign should have been only the commencement of an era of peace and prosperity that would have continued to increase and diffuse itself till its unrolled splendor filled and gladdened the whole earth. But Israel failed utterly and miserably in this trust.

Carlyle on Job.

I call the book of Job, apart from all theories about it, one of the grandest things ever written with a pen. One feels, indeed, as if it were not Hebrew—such a noble universality, different from noble patriotism or sectarianism, reigns in it. A noble book! All men's book! It is our first, oldest statement of the never-ending problem, man's destiny, and God's ways with him here on this earth. And all in such free, flowing outlines; grand in its simplicity, and its epic melody, and repose of reconcilement. There is the seeing eye, the mildly understanding heart. So true every way; true eyesight, and vision for all things, material things no less than spiritual; the horse—"hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?"—he laughs at the shaking of the spear! Such living likenesses were never since drawn. Sublime sorrow, sublime reconciliation; oldest choral melody as of the heart of mankind; so soft and great; as the summer night, as the world with its seas and stars! There is nothing written, I think, in the Bible or out of it, of equal literary merit.

RUSSIAN SOLDIERS AND THE BIBLE.

A member of the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society writes: More than 60,000 Bibles and portions of the Scriptures have been bought lately by the soldiers of the Russian armies since they crossed the Pruth. Large editions have been required, and the books were sent from Vienna, Odessa, St. Petersburgh, and London, necessarily at very high rates for carriage and involving an expense of about £5000. The agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, who has conducted the arrangements, reports from Bucharest several interesting particulars as follows:

"As to the Russians, we are one and all of the opinion that their readiness to buy is unparalleled in our experience of the Society's Continental work. It is a strange thing, and yet not less true than strange, when fierce-looking Cossacks, armed to the teeth, thank you ten times over for having brought them the New Testament, and when they can scarce be restrained in the gladness of their hearts from taking you in their bony arms to give you a well-meant, albeit none the less dreaded, hug of gratitude. And not only do the men buy, but they read; for they can read, and that to an extent which has utterly surprised me. All the reports received by me agree in this particular, that there are comparatively few unable to read, and the explanation given by the common men, as well as by some of high rank, of the glad but strange fact is that, since the introduction of general compulsory military service, a few years ago, it has been made obligatory on all the subalterns and on the younger commissioned officers to see to it, as soon as the recruits enter the army, that they acquire the wholesome art of reading. Dr. Obermuller, the Grand Duke's physician, told me that the arrangement gave such satisfaction at the time, that men whose term of service had run out, had asked permission before quitting, to attend the new reading class. In the long Russian winters, with snow all around many feet deep, drilling impossible, and all out-of-door exercises impracticable, spelling and reading were welcomed as pleasant and profitable pastimes. Not only do the Russians buy, not only can they read, but they do read; and through the camp, and along the roadside, they may be seen in their spare hours, book in hand, alone or in small companies. It is a sight to do a man's heart good. It is but repeating what has been told me time after time by different parties in various parts of the country that, speaking generally, the Russian soldier has yet to be discovered who would speak an irreverent word of the Holy Gospel, or who would knowingly venture to treat a Bible colporteur with harshness or contempt. Generally the title page of their New Testament has been to our men a more valuable credential, a more powerful recomendation, than either their passport or their license, and while common hawkers are strictly forbidden, our colporteurs have been joyfully welcomed. It has frequently been the case that the commanding officer has been the first to buy a number of copies, which he himself would distribute at once as a gift to the common soldiers around him."—*N. TWENTY-SIX OLD PEOPLE.

During the months of April, May and June, twenty-six persons died in this city who were over ninety years of age. One of these was 101, two 103, one was 105, and seven were over ninety-five years of age.

Nine of these persons were men and seventeen women. Nine were natives and seventeen were foreign born. All but three were Anglo-Saxons and two were Irish. Sixteen died of old age, and one, who had stood up for 103 years, finally fell down stairs and died of his injuries. One had lived for ninety years in this city, two for fifty years, and most of the others from a quarter to near half a century here. Most of them were persons whose occupation had been laborious and constant, and all had been married.

We might conclude from such a record, that New York was, upon the whole, a good place for old people to live in, that the Anglo-Saxon race had greater vitality than other races which have emigrated to this country, that women were more likely to live than men, and that the married had a far better chance of life than single persons. These conclusions might all be correct, or like other generalizations very erroneous; the last is, we think, well proved. The record, at all events, is a remarkable one.—N. Y. Observer.

PERSECUTION IN AFRICA.

The Journal of Evangelical Missions (a French monthly publication) has an account of the persecution of the Christian natives at Bonny, West Africa, which has been carried on for some time. It says:

"The persecution still reigns. The converts are kept in chains, and have to undergo all kinds of tortures. Their persecutors have recourse to new means to force these poor Christians to deny their faith, or to cause their death in a slow but certain manner,—and this is by starvation. Consequently an edict has been issued, forbidding all communication between the prisoners and their families, and even between their Christian friends. These unhappy sufferers are completely isolated, a prey to anguish and uncertainty, and only receive the smallest amount of nourishment that their gaolers consider necessary to maintain life in bodies emaciated by reason of the lengthened agony. As a climax to their misery these sufferers are chained among the bushes, quite naked, and separated from one another, so that every kind of comfort is denied them. To add to the horror of their position, they are exposed night and day to the stings of mosquitoes, with which this region abounds. We may judge of the degree of courage with which Christianity can inspire heathen souls—for not one of these martyrs has denied the faith, and all persist in their love to Christ with a heroism and patience which astounds even their persecutors."

Restitution of all Things.

When the Lord laid the foundations of the earth and formed the heavens above, he pronounced them very good; and all the changes which have taken place and are yet to take place have been designed for the good of man in redeeming his moral character; so when that shall have been effected, he will restore the physical world to its destined condition of perfection. The unchangeableness of the Lord insures the promised restoration. He changes the condition of things as often as he sees fit for the attainment of his unchangeable purpose, to reconcile all things unto himself. The church of the first-born composed of all true believers from the fall of man until Christ's second advent, being at that time redeemed and glorified, are chosen to be associated with Christ, as a peculiar and suitable agency in effecting the subjection and reconciliation of all things to God under the government, which as kings and priests to God shall be administered by them.—*J. TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy Prophets since the world began. It likewise advocates a return to Bible ground, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King, at its head, and the material elders as joint-heirs with him in the glorious work of the patriarchs; the restoration of Israel; the literal regeneration of the earth; the literal glorification of the right-eous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a purely faithful and thorough reformation in the lives, and hearts, and homes of professed followers of the lowly Nazarene, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

G. M. MYERS TO J. M. HENRY—FOURTH LETTER.

(Concluded from last week.)

As to hades being "a chemical laboratory for the body," this is a phrase of your own making. I simply quoted Job xxiv. 19. Of its contents and bearing upon our issue, you have not yet disposed or attempted.

I am sorry, not for my sake, but for you and the cause you now, and I once espoused, that you still persist in believing that sheol—hades is never properly rendered grave. But a few questions. What about my quotations? Is keber or sheol in the texts? Why this silence upon this point? You admit your haste in one case, why not acknowledge it in this? You charged the young man of being more confident than intelligent. Yet he has not yet been so bold as to assert that certain words were in certain texts without the authority at hand and in hand to bear him out, as the aged man has done. Davy Crocket's adage was "be sure you are right and go ahead." But your go-ahead-itiveness is in advance of your surety, and now you have to retreat in silence. Further, are my authors still unreliable? Why not attack them and impeach their scholarship? But instead of that, you come up and say, which supports them, that friend Bastion has furnished you with twenty-nine occurrences of grave in the King's English for sheol in Hebrew.

But to the definition of sheol as Prof. Fuerst (your—Bastion's) author—"What is sunk deep, hence under world, The place of the shades." Now, my friend—I was about to write brother—all this, with good propriety, can be applied to the grave, as the receptacle of the dead (as you, and not the Bible, call the body,) but not very well to your idea of spirits. Is your place of departed spirits, according to your idea, a place of shades? What is it that casts a shadow over it? May be you would like Job's assistance here? Job x. 22, says: It is "a land of darkness, as darkness itself, and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness." Is your metaphorical Abraham's bosom and Greek Paradise in the shade? Under world—what is the place of departed spirits under? Is it under the ground? Do departed spirits have to go under ground to get to God? Eccl. xii. 7.

Sunk deep—how deep? Into what do they have to be sunk? Now, my friend, is there a world of intelligent characters in the heart of the earth? Will it require anything more than honesty for one to see the Fuerst's whole definition applies to the state of the dead—the grave in the broad acceptation of the term. In the grave they are sunk deep. In the grave they are put in the under world. In the grave they are placed in the shade. I thank you for the definition.

You quote from Smith's Bible Dictionary, but fail to do him justice, as you have omitted the following, from p. 373, large edition: "This word (hell-is generally used by our translators to render the Hebrew sheol. It would, perhaps, have been better to retain the Hebrew word, or else render it always by "the grave" or "the pit."

Friend Bastion, to whom you have appealed, says that, according to the grammar and exegesis of the Hebrew language, he knows of no text where sheol should be rendered grave. This we will not question; perhaps his information is limited. Yet your next author, Dr. Campbell, of Aberdeen, Scotland, according to your extract, does know of one such text. And had you done him justice right upon this point, you would have quoted three such texts from sheol, and a fourth from hades, viz.: Gen. xxxvii. 35; xlii. 38; Psa. xvi. 10; Acts ii. 27. Further, if you will drop only one-half page further back in his essay, which I have at hand, you will find the following extract: "But it appears at present to be the prevailing opinion among critics, that the term, (sheol), at least in the Old Testament, means no more than keber, grave, or sepulchre." Of course, Mr. Campbell opposes this idea, yet the opinion of the critics of his day is worth something.

Now, since we have examined the authors you have cited, and as you say, our discussion has largely turned upon this point, I will introduce others. Indeed, our discussion does not only largely, but altogether turns upon this point—the condition of those who to sheol—hades go.

1. Wakefield.—The universal meaning of hades, is the state of the death.

2. Greenfield.—Ia and cido, literally unseen) the invisible abode or mansion of the dead, orcus, the place of punishment, hell; the grave; the lowest place or condition.

3. Donnegan.—The realm of Pluto, the infernal regions, the shades below, the abode of the dead, generally death.

4. Greeks.—a, a negative and eido to see) a dark, obscure place, a place unseen, or not to be seen by mortals, hades, the receptacle or region of the dead, containing all the fabulous divisions of the heathen ritual.

5. John Brown, of Haddington.—Another author upon your side of the question and from whom you evidently quote, as I find much of your language upon this, verbatim, in his Religious Encyclopedia, says: "Hades (from a, privative, and idein, to see) the invisible world, or place of the departed in the intermediate state, prior to the re-surrection. The corresponding term in Hebrew is sheol, which is derived from the root shae, to demand, inquire, and either signifies the place with respect to which it may be asked: 'Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?' Job xiv. 10, or the insatiable receptacle which crieth give, give, and never saith it is enough. Prov. xxx. 15, 16."

6. Kitto—In his Cyclopedia says: The term hell is represented by the word sheol in the Old Testament, and by hades in the New Testament. But as these words mean also the grave or the condition of the dead, hell, as a place of final punishment for sinners, is more distinctively indicated by the term Gehenna. Under the word hades, he says: "Hades means literally that which is in darkness. In the classical writers it is used to denote orcus, or the infernal regions." Again, "hades is in no wise binding upon us in any classical meaning which may be assigned to it. The real question, therefore is, what is the meaning which sheol bears in the Old Testament, and hades in the New." Again he says: "In the great majority of instances sheol is in the Old Testament, used to signify the grave, and in the most of these cases is so translated in the Authorized Version. It can have no other meaning in such texts as Gen. xxxvii. 35; xlii. 38; 1 Sam. ii. 6; 1 Kings ii. 6; Job xiii. 13; xvii. 13-16, and in numerous other passages in the writings of David, and Solomon, and the prophets. But as the grave is regarded by most persons, and was more especially so by the ancients, with awe and dread, as being the region of gloom and darkness, so the word denoting it soon came to be applied to that more dark and gloomy world which was to be the abiding place of the miserable."

7. Moses Stuart.—In his Exegetical Essays, says on p. 99, "sheol is used sixty-three times in the Old Testament, and is translated hell thirty-one times, grave thirty times, and pit three times."

On p. 112, he says. "The meaning of sheol, which lies upon the face of the Sacred Record (if I may thus speak), is indeed that of grave, sepulchre, under world, or state of the dead, as I have given in the recension of the passages."

On pp. 116, 119, in giving a statement of what the Bible says of sheol, he says:—

1. "Sheol is a place from which none ever return," e. g. Job vii. 9; 2 Sam. xii. 23.

2. "It consumes or devours the bodies laid in it." Job xxiv. 19; Psa. xlix. 14.

3. "It is a place of inaction and silence," e. g., Psa. vi. 5; xxxi. 17; 1 Sam. ii. 9; Isa. xxxviii. 18; Eccl. ix. 10.

4. "Sheol is a place of utter and perpetual darkness and gloom." Job x. 21, 22.

5. "Sheol is sometimes personified and represented as an insatiable monster, always devouring without remorse or distinction," e. g., Isa. v. 14; Prov. xxvii. 20; i. 12.

Hades, he says: "Designates the under world, subterranean regions simply, in opposition to the region above the earth," e. g., Matt xi. 23; Luke x. 15. "Thou Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, i. e., very high (alluding to its site on a hill) shalt be brought down to the under world, i. e., very low." "This is the natural and primary explanation of the word hades here."

2. "Hades signifies the region of the dead, the dominions of death," e. g., Matt. xvi. 18; Rev. i. 18; vi. 8; xx. 13, 14.

3. "Hades means grave, sepulchre, depository of the dead," e. g., 1 Cor. xv. 55; Acts ii. 27-31.

4. Gesenius.—On p. 1022, says:—"Sheol signifies orcus, the under world, a vast subterranean place. Job xi. 8; Deut. xxxii. 22; full of thickest darkness." Job x. 21, 22: He says as to its derivation: "It comes from sha-al—a cavity, a hollow subterranean place; just as the German Holle-hell, is originally the same with hohle a hollow, cavern, and Latin cellum is from the Greek kilos, hollow."

Now, my friend, I hate to call you that, as brother would sound better,) we get in all these definitions our idea of grave in its broad acceptation—the depository of all the dead. But not that of departed or disembodied spirits.

I would have no hesitancy whatever in taking up the text and its context wherever this word occurs, and trying a reconciliation of it to the idea of grave. Indeed, I am satisfied of the harmony. But to the contrary, let me give you a few texts in conclusion, which are entirely incompatible with your idea.

1. And death and hades gave up the dead which were in them. Rev. xx. 13. Your idea is that the dead are not in hades, but that all who are there, live and are conscious.

2. "Where, O hades! is now thy victory?" 1 Cor. xv. 55. Is it possible that the righteous are triumphed over in your metaphorical Abraham's bosom! What of the elysian fields of your Paradise?

3. "On this rock I will build my church and the gates of hades shall not triumph over her." Matt. xvi. 18. Again, how of this? Are your disembodied spirits, even of the righteous, held as prisoners only to be liberated at the resurrection.

4. "Ye shall bring my gray hairs down to sheol"—the place of disembodied spirits. Is it possible, let me ask you again, that spirits wear gray hairs in your Paradise?

5. "Cease then and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little, before I go whence I shall not return, (on the hypothesis that his sins were not forgiven) even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death; a land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness." Job x. 21, 22. How about this? Is this your Paradise? Is this your metaphorical Abraham's bosom, a land of darkness, under the shadow of death, without any order?

6. "Oh that thou wouldst hide me in the grave (sheol), that thou wouldst keep me secret until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldst appoint me a set time and remember me!" Job xiv. 13. Is this your place of departed spirits? Are they to be hid? Are they to be kept secret, and not to be remembered by God till the appointed time?

7. "If I wait, the grave (sheol) is mine house; I have made my bed in the darkness. I have said to corruption, Thou art my father, to the worm, thou art my mother, and my sister." Job xvii. 13, 14. If sheol is the place where your spirits dwell, as you say, what about this darkness? What about the worm preying on them?

8. "Drouth and heat consume the snow waters; so doth the grave (sheol) those which have sinned." Job xxiv. 19. As you claim sheol to be the receptacle, not of the body, but of the spirit, how do you like the effect here brought to view to be performed upon the spirit?

9. "For in death there is no remembrance of thee; in the grave (sheol) who shall give thee thanks?" Psa. vi. 5. You well know that the interrogative here is equal to a negative. This is spoken of all who go to sheol. Is it possible that none of your righteous spirits can give thanks to God while in your Paradise or Abraham's bosom? Will you tell me why they cannot? Is it lowness of their irreverence? Or, because they have forgotten God? And if they have forgotten God, why not all things else? What a forgetful set they are.

10. "Let me not be ashamed, O Lord, for I have called upon thee: let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave, (sheol)." Psa. xxxvii. 17. Inspired men's prayers generally were heard. Then how could such a man as Dives have literally talked there? Your wicked spirits in sheol—hades, have to travel around—if travel at all—in perfect silence. Not very many groans, shrieks, cries, wailings and hideous voices.

11. "Like sheep are laid in sheol) they are laid in the grave (sheol); death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave (sheol) from their dwelling." Psa. xlix. 14. How will you reconcile this with your idea? Do sheep get into your place of departed spirits?

12. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might." Question: Why? Answer: Because death will come. And what of that? Answer: "For there is no work, nor device, (reason,) nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave (sheol) whither thou goest," Eccl. ix. 10. Now, my friend, when all work, reason, knowledge and wisdom are taken away from your disembodied spirits, please tell me what is left? One of two things is inevitable. 1. You will have to abandon disembodied consciousness, or 2. abandon sheol.

I will close this lengthy letter by summing up a few points relative to sheol—hades.

Definitions.—Literally the unseen; the under world; the place of the shades; the grave; sepulchre; the state of the dead; a vast subterranean place; a cavity, a subterranean hollow.

SCRIPTURAL DEDUCTIONS.

1. A place to which gray hairs go. Gen. xxxvii. 35; xlii. 38; xliv. 31.

2. Living men have gone down to sheol. Num. xvi. 32, 33.

3. Horses have gone down to sheol. Num. xvi. 32, 33.

14. Where no one can hope for God's truth. Isa. xxxviii. 18.

15. Where there is no work. Eccl. ix. 10.

16. Where there is no device (reason). Eccl. ix. 10.

17. Where there is no knowledge. Eccl. ix. 10.

18. Where there is no wisdom. Eccl. ix. 10.

19. Where the dead and not the living dwell. Rev. xx. 13.

20. Where, till the resurrection, the righteous are triumphed over. 1 Cor. xv. 55.

21. Where, till the resurrection, the church is held in prison. Matt. xvi. 18.

My friend, would it not be well for you to preserve consciousness, to move your disembodied spirits to another locality?

Your friend, hoping that you may yet come to a knowledge of the truth and be saved. G. M. MYERS.

A Deathless Home.

And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away. And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold I make all things new. Rev. xxi. 3, 5.

Of all the sublime announcements in the Scriptures of truth, concerning the future, none are fraught with more thrilling interest, to those who are seeking "for glory and honor and immortality," than the above words, which "are true and faithful." Verse 5. The history of the past is a history of sin, of suffering, and of death. And the present is but a repetition of the past. When we look around, we behold on every hand, scenes of suffering and the ravages of death. The eyes moisten with tears when we take a retrospective view of the few fleeting years of our brief pilgrimage here, that are now numbered with the things of the past; and recall to mind, the many loved ones, in whose society we once loved to linger, that are now sleeping the dreamless sleep of death. For nearly six thousand years "the clods of the valley," and the waves of the sea, have been concealing from view the forms of loved ones, who have passed from the activity of life to the repose of death. And still the tide of emigration is unabated. The earth's surface is dotted over with the graves of silent sleepers, and she has drunk up the blood of martyred millions. She has been bedewed with the countless tears of suffering humanity, and has witnessed its groans and sighs for weary centuries.

The following lines of poetry (by some unknown author,) upon the past, present, and future history of our home, contrasting its present state with its future "restitution," (Acts iii. 19-21,) when the "curse" shall be removed, (Rev. xxii. 3,) "death" destroyed, (1 Cor. xv. 26,) and "sorrow and sighing" "no more." Isa. xxxv. 10; 1 Pet. iv. 13; Rev. xxi. 4:

"In Eden bowers, a sinless pair
Were placed by God below,
As lords of earth, and sea and air,
Six thousand years ago. Gen. i. 26-28.

"And faultless graves of trilliage fair,
Through Paradise did grow;
The 'tree of life' was blooming there
Six thousand years ago. Gen. iii. 22-24.

"No pestilence at noonday stalked
With poisoned yaunt and bow;
Nor dire disease in darkness walked
Six thousand years ago.

"No whiter frost, no summer blight
Laid withering herbage low;
No lamps beheld obscured the light
Six thousand years ago.

"No sickness, sorrow, death, nor pain,
Caused tears of grief to flow;
No graves were heaped above the slain
Six thousand years ago.

"'Twas in that fatal the skies in gloom,
Made earth a wild of woe;
That op'd for man the grave and tomb
Six thousand years ago. Gen. iii. 17-19.

"But Christ will come—in him we trust
And crowns of life bestow;—2 Tim. iv. 8.
Regain the Eden that we lost (Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 35,)
Six thousand years ago.

"God's Paradise shall bloom once more,
And countless skies shall glow
Our heavenly host receive, as once before,
Six thousand years ago. Rev. ii. 7; Rev. xxi; Rev. xxii.

"That 'Restitution,' Lord, we wait—Acts iii. 19-21.
Though circling years move slow,
Since exiled from our blest estate
Six thousand years ago."

With what joyful anticipations have the people of God looked forward to "the times of restitution," when living men will cease to die, and "dead men" "live again"! Glorious things are in store for earth and her inhabitants. Instead of being hurled—

"A fiery orb through space,"— the earth will "be changed, or made new." Psa. [illegible]-25); Heb. i. 12; Rev. xxi. 1-5. "Behold, I make all things new." Not all new things, but "all things new." God "laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed forever." "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh; but the earth abideth forever;" and God "formed it to be inhabited." Psa. civ. 5, Eccl. i. 4; Isa. xlv. 18. Hence, in view of the earth's perpetuity, and God's design in creating it, it will not be blotted out of existence, or become an uninhabited wilderness, but will be peopled with a race of sinless and deathless beings throughout the ceaseless cycles of eternity! Psa. [illegible]; Isa. xxv. 8; xxvi. 19; xxxiv. 21; Prov. x. 21, 22; x. 30; xii. 31; Isa. ii. 1-4; lv. 21; Matt. v. 5; Rev. v. 9, 10; Luke xx. 34-36. Blessed consummation! God will then "dwell with men," and in his "presence is fullness of joy." Rev. xxi. 3; Psa. xvi. 11.

—O what a mighty change
Shall Jesus' follow'rs know,
When o'er the happy plains they range,
Incapable of woe!

"There all our griefs are passed!
There all our sorrows end;
We gain a peaceful rest at last,
With Jesus Christ our friend.

"No sin, [illegible] touch or pain,
Nor sorrow's bitter alloy,
Can violate our rest, or stain
Our purity of joy.

"In that eternal day
No cloud of tempest rise;
There pleasing tears are wiped away
Forever from our eyes."

Sententious Paragraphs.

Silence never betrayed any one.—Rivarol.

Censure is the tax a man pays to the public for being eminent.

He that pelts every barking dog must pick up a great many stones.

To have our hearts weaned from the world is the way really to enjoy it.

FORGIVENESS.

The condonation of a wrong. What then! Even the wrong-doers are our brethren.

Dr. Johnson used to say, "He who waits to do a great deal of good at once, will never do any."

Let no man trust the first step of guilt; it hangs upon a precipice, whose steep descent in lost perdition ends.—Young.

Have you learned to know you are ignorant? This is God's way of making wise; he bids you ask wisdom, and promises to give.

The surest sign of age is loneliness. While one finds company in himself and his pursuits, he can not grow old whatever his years may be.—Alcott.

First the cadet, and then the man,
Life, and then the story;
First the dark, and then the bright,
Pain, and then the glory.

In youth grief comes with a rush and overflow, but it dries up, too, like the torrent. In the winter of life it remains a miserable pool, resisting all evaporation.—Madame Swetchine.

A saint is not free from sin; that is his burden: a saint is not free to sin; that is his blessing. Sin is on him; that is his lamentation; his heart is not in sin; that is his consolation.

Straws swim upon the surface, but pearls lie at the bottom. Showy parts strike every common eye, but solid ones are only to be discovered by the most accurate observers of the human head and human heart.

Manners are the root, laws only the trunk and branches. Manners are laws in their infancy; laws are manners full grown—or, manners are children, which, when they spring up, become laws.—Horace Mann.

The moment a man gives way to inordinate desires, disquietude and torment take possession of his heart. The proud and the covetous are never at rest; but the poor and the humble possess their souls in the plenitude of peace.

Where a cause is good, an appeal should be directed to the heart rather than the head: the application comes more home, and reaches more forcibly, where it is the most necessary—the natural rather than the improved faculties of the human understanding.

Allowing the performance of an honorable action to be attended with labor, the labor is soon over, but the honor is immortal; whereas, should even pleasure wait on the commission of what is dishonorable, the pleasure is soon gone, but the dishonor is eternal.—John Stewart.

Fear not, trembling believer. The bark which bears thy spiritual destinies is in better hands than thine; a golden chain of covenant love links it to the throne. That chain can never snap asunder. He who holds it in his hand gives thee this as the pledge of thy safety "Because I live, ye shall live also."

The Restitution.

R. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCT. 24, 1877.

As our daily paper for the current year, we made choice of the Chicago Evening Journal. For reliable news we have found it a very carefully prepared paper, and as such can confidently recommend it. Our own news column is usually compiled from its pages. It rarely gives us news to-day what will be flatly contradicted to-morrow.

THE Nursery for November is at hand with its usual treat for the "youngest readers." It is a monthly magazine tastefully illustrated, and replete with poems and stories exactly adapted to the childish taste. Address John L. Storey, 36 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.; who also publishes the Monthly Reader, another pretty and instructive periodical for the little ones. The Nursery, $1,00 a year, in advance; Monthly Reader fifty cents a year.

Harper's Monthly, for November, contains a very complete article on Alaska; also a very interesting one on San Antonio de Bexar, both profusely illustrated. We value this periodical highly for its historical articles elucidating events that have taken place in our own country. In this respect, if not in others, it stands unrivaled as a literary magazine. The Editor's Literary and Scientific Records are valuable features of the work. In these the readers are kept fully posted in most matters pertaining to these departments.

QUITE a goodly number of our old subscribers, whose time has expired, are renewing, and we are also adding new names to our list. The financial affairs of our paper have been very close and pressing all through the current year. For the remainder of the year we shall be entirely dependent on our receipts, as we have no surplus means. If all, whose subscriptions have become due, will renew at once, we hope to get along through the remainder of the year without serious embarrassment. As regards new subscribers the weekly accessions to our list are quite encouraging. We think many more might be obtained if all our friends and brethren would make the necessary effort. Also, let those who are able remember our altar of sacrifice. An unexpected receipt of some means has enabled us to place a pittance among the free-will offerings. These are voluntary donations to meet the immediate necessities of our enterprise, and therefore, not one of those acts of individual charity of which our Savior spoke when he directed his disciples not to let the left hand know what the right hand doeth. The reason of publishing the names is to let brethren know that more than one isolated individual feels an interest in sustaining a periodical devoted to the topics discussed in THE RESTITUTION. For ourself we feel a real pleasure in doing all we can, and have good reason to conclude that this feeling is largely shared by our brethren and friends generally.

IN the East the tide of events is suddenly changing in favor of the Muscovite invaders. The Turks have exhibited indomitable courage all through this struggle from its very commencement. But they have been acting too much on the principle of staking everything on the fortunes of single engagements where to lose is to lose all. Their utmost resources in men and means have already been brought into requisition and every loss on their part is irreparable. It is well remarked in one of our exchanges that the Russians have been growing stronger since some of their early defeats, while the Turks have as constantly been growing weaker. Their last battle was fought with a no greater army than they had four months ago. Every man slain or disabled in battle is by so much an exhaustion of their fighting material. There are no new levies to fill the depleted ranks. Not so with Russia. The loss in rank and file in her wasted battalions can at once be filled, and their numbers indefinitely swelled. Then the winter will enlist the elements on the side of Russia and against the Turks. The very cold that will benumb all the energies of the Turk will exhilarate the frame of his enemy. We think, as we have from the first, that the Turkish power is to be so far broken in this war as to prepare the way for the restoration of Israel, though it be not the Gog invasion of Ezekiel's prophecy. Our own opinion is that the times and seasons of Dan. xii. reach into the future, and give ample space for completing the toes of the Great Image, as well as for the building of the unwalled towns and villages of Palestine. The rapture of the saints is what is near. Let us be ready.

THE CINCINNATI DOLLAR WEEKLY COMMERCIAL,

Is published by M. Halstead & Co., at one dollar a year postage prepaid by the publishers. It is the purpose of the conductors of this journal to make it one of the best weeklies in the country for half the price usually asked for papers containing the same amount of reading matter. To the many, who are desirous of taking a metropolitan weekly in addition to their home weekly, the inducements for taking the Commercial are all that can be asked. The paper is large, conducted with ability, fully discussing the great questions of the times, and so cheap as to be within the reach of all.

Exegetical.

But they have not all obeyed the gospel. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report? So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God. Rom. x. 16, 17.

The Greek word ακοη, akoee, translated report above, in the sixteenth verse, occurs also twice in the seventeenth verse, where it is, in both instances, translated hearing. The quotation from Isaiah has, in the Hebrew, שְׁמוּעָה, Shemoogah, which is defined by Gesenius, report, rumor, tidings, a message, news, instruction, teaching. He says also that it refers specially to a message sent from God. The Analytical Lexicon gives as definitions in English, news, tidings, information, report, teaching, doctrine. In translating the Greek Testament into Hebrew, the above Hebrew word is employed, and rightly, too, to represent the Greek word akoee in each of the three instances. In the Greek language the word akoe may mean—the act or sense of hearing; the instrument of hearing, the ear; a thing heard; instruction, doctrine, report. The word is used by the Apostle in the same sense in all three occurrences in both the verses. It means what is heard, that is, the narrative itself.

Conybeare and Howson, in their translation of St. Paul's Epistles, render these verses "Lord, who hath given faith to our teaching? So, then, faith comes by teaching; and our teaching comes by the Word of God."

The Latin Vulgate uses the same Latin word in each instance, reading, "Domine, quis credidit auditui nostro? Ergo fides ex auditu, auditus autem per Verbum Christi." Here the word auditus means the relation of a fact.

The German translation perhaps best preserves the shades of thought contained in these verses. It runs, "Herr, wer glaubt unserm predigen? So kommt der glaube aus der predigt, das predigen aber durch das Wort Gottes." In English, "Lord, who believes our preaching? So the faith comes out of the sermon (the lecture or subject discoursed upon) preached, but the preaching through (in consequence of) the Word of God." Here predigen denotes the relating or preaching, and predigt denotes what is preached, or the sermon. The difference between the two words in German is much the same as between narrating, as applied to the speaker, and narrative, as applied to the thing spoken.

The Word of the Lord is what is to be preached—and the Word of the Lord, when preached, is what is to be believed. Hence Paul says to Timothy, "Preach the Word." In God's estimation nothing is regarded as faith except a trusting confidence in his inspired Word, or teaching; all else is worthless credulity. The belief of human formularies, however reliant it may be, is not faith in the Bible acceptation of that term. The Hebrew has two very nice expressions that have some connection with our exegete. These are אִישׁ שֹׁמֵעַ, ish shomagn, a man of hearing, meaning a man of attention, and consequently, of understanding; and לֵב שֹׁמֵעַ, lehn shomagn, a hearing heart. A man of hearing is one who sedulously employs all the faculties of his understanding in the investigation of divine truth; who searches for wisdom more than for hidden treasures; and a hearing heart is that loving receptivity of inspired teaching that molds the affections into the divine image itself as a result of the "ministration of the Spirit." Of the listener at Wisdom's temple it is said, "Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors;" while of the unveiled heart it is said, "But we all with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." With both our intellect and affections we must embrace the truth. EDITOR.

Signor Gavazzi says of the extraordinary success of the mission in Italy, "Fifteen years ago there were only five Protestant congregations and about 400 communicants in Italy, while now there are 121 congregations, 5000 communicants, and about 41,000 hearers."

Notes of Travel and Labors.

Four weeks ago this evening I commenced a series of meetings at Lowell, Lake county, Indiana, in the M. E. church, and continued until the following Sunday afternoon, when the meeting was removed to the Christian meeting house. The congregations were large, and the interest very good. Indeed, the congregations increased in numbers and interest to the close. One decided to be immersed, and I trust others will follow her example. I expect to return to Lowell one week from next Saturday, when I hope the same interest may be manifested in the teachings of the Word relative to what we must believe and do to be saved, that was shown in our former visits.

The following Saturday evening I commenced meetings at Ripley, Brown county, Illinois, extending over the following Sunday and week-day evenings, until Wednesday.

On Wednesday evening I preached to a large congregation in the Baptist meeting house, at Cooperstown, where, ever since my week's debate with Mr. Scott, an eminent Baptist minister, large concourses of people have turned out, when due notice has been given, to listen to the proclamation of our views, or rather the teachings of the Word relative to our views as a people. Having been absent more than two years, the community seemed hungry to hear the pure word of life. I was informed that ours were the largest congregations, and manifested the most interest of any meeting which had been held since my last visit. There are about fifty brethren and sisters in this community, who attend meetings when there is preaching. I know of no better locality for an active, efficient teacher of the Word, who shall exemplify his preaching by his daily walk and conversation. I purpose holding meetings over next Sunday, when I shall return to Chicago. Those wishing my labors in Indiana, Ohio, New York, or Canada, will please address letters to 259 West Madison St., Chicago.

The following Sunday afternoon I commenced a course of lectures on Bible subjects, in St. Joseph, Missouri, where Sister Carrie Harris formerly, but now Sisters Rock and Williams reside. There were about two hundred out at the first meeting, but the influence of all the churches being against us, the congregations were small.

The meetings Sunday and Monday were held in Westminster meeting house, but the pastor and his congregation, with one or two exceptions, remained away, and thus turned their entire influence against us. They let their church for $10 per day, doubtless supposing that their need of money would counterbalance the evils growing out of preaching what they denounce as false doctrine. The pastor of the Westminster church agreed to let me occupy his pulpit Sunday evening, but without one word of explanation announced that he would preach as usual. There is no use for any man to announce appointments to preach or lecture in St. Joseph, unless he appears under the prestige of what Mr. Moody calls the Evangelical denomination. The famed Robert Collyer, of Chicago, announced an appointment to lecture in the same church, and to the astonishment of all, there were not to exceed two dozen persons present. The friends of the great Unitarian preacher placarded the city, having changed the place of meeting from the professed house of God to what the reputed saints regard as the synagogue of Satan—the opera house. They succeeded in drawing to that place of popular resort for the pleasure-seeking multitude—Mr. C.'s friends playing to the tune of about seventy-five dollars per night, more than the friends of truth anywhere are able to pay; and perhaps not one in that large assemblage could have been reached by having heard the truth preached. St Joseph is named for the son of the venerable patriarch, Jacob. It was painted, of course, by Catholic priests, who outnumber any other denomination in that city. In numbers and popularity the Baptist and so-called Christian churches lead, unless we may except the Jews, who have a synagogue and Rabbi—signifying master or lord. They are among the most influential and wealthy citizens of St. Joseph. Unitarianism, Congregationalism, and Episcopalianism do not flourish in Southern cities as they do in the New England states.

St. Joseph is a flourishing city of about 2,500 inhabitants, containing a large sprinkling of Eastern people and enterprise. It is located on the eastern slope of the Missouri river, and in thiness, wealth and enterprise, it will compare favorably with most cities of of the same number of inhabitants north or east of it. It does an extensive wholesale business. Indeed, it is the emporium of trade, reaching out its long arms and gathering in commerce from a widely extended country around, and offering lively competition to its great neighbor, St. Louis. It is beautiful for situation, the pride of North-western Missouri. From Prospect Hill I looked with admiration upon a scene of beauty and grandeur that would not suffer by comparison with the more grand but not more lovely scenery encircling San Jose and and Portland, the pride and glory of California and Oregon. The sun hanging like a great ball of fire in the west, throwing a sheen of glory upon the winding river, the massive business blocks, the beautiful residences sprinkled like a constellation of stars over the rounded hills and gentle slopes, while bursting in the gorgeous tints of purple and gold were the towers and steeples, blending in grand panorama with forest trees scattered profusely over the surrounding hills.

The laboring classes are separated from the elite of the city by natural barriers. Low in the valleys, on either side of the city proper, they and their children, poor men's inheritance, live hard and laborious lives, while their more favored brethren roll in affluence and luxury. Natural as well as artificial positions gradate society in that city where almost everything is painted. Like the cemetery near Chicago, far down whose slope may be seen in mournful gradation the graves of the rich and the poor, from the tallest and most costly marble to the cheapest wooden stake; and all intermediate grades, from the richest prince to the meanest beggar. If Jesus of Nazareth should pass that way, he would pass by the rich, the proud, the noble in church and state, and descend into the valleys where the honest laborers earn their bread by the sweat of their face.

When Christ wanted humble, honest men to bear the glad tidings of salvation to a world of lost sinners, he passed by the proud cities of Jerusalem and Damascus,—he passed by the hypocritical Pharisee and the infidel Sadducee, calling at humble Galilee, gathering from among fishermen, tent-makers and tax-gatherers, the honest poor, to be his witnesses. The Christ came not to call the self-righteous, like the proud, rich professors of St. Joseph, but those who realize that they are sinners and need a Savior. Could we have heard the Savior's voice saying, "Let them alone they are blind leaders," how different might have been the result of our visit.

Again, I think that could we have had the splendid prestige of Golden Smith, the world-renowned scholar, to have presided over our meetings as he presided over the meetings in Toronto, Canada, during my discussion with Mr. Marpels, a distinguished Presbyterian clergyman: could the Presbyterians of St. Joseph have seen this grand moral hero rise from his presidential chair, and with his powerful elocution hurl back upon the head of my opponent the false charge of infidelity, reading the written pledge of both parties that the Bible should be the exclusive standard of evidence—or could they have read in the Mail Mr. Smith's summing up of the main positions and issues between the two disputants, they would have covered their faces for shame at their cowardice and misrepresentations. Not only so, but the editors of the leading papers of that city would have followed the example of the Toronto Globe or Mail, in either publishing a fair synopsis of the leading positions of both parties, or like the Globe, to have disgraced his able paper with a tirade of abuse and misrepresentation, either of which would have been preferable to silent contempt.

Having referred to the leading papers in St. Joseph, I would say in justice, that the Herald, the only one whose pages I have perused, is ably edited and is usually high-toned in its advocacy of freedom of tongue, pen and press, but it sometimes gives too much prestige to rich, popular libertines, who should no more be admitted into the society of daughters and wives at home or in excursion parties, or anywhere else, than reeking leprosy. The foul breath of the libertine is infinitely worse than leprosy. It not only pollutes the fountains of purity, but blasts the character of its victims forever. Papers which wend their way into the hearths and hearts of families, ought to be the conservatives of all that is pure, honorable, true and virtuous. But alas! these educators of the millions cater to and gild the popular vices of the day.

Before bidding farewell to St. Joseph I would introduce my old acquaintances and estimable sisters Rock and Williams. Long shall I gratefully remember their kindness, and also the kindness of Mr. Williams, during my sojourn in St. Joseph. Though not with us in the faith, Mr. Williams is a highly respected citizen, kind hearted and courteous gentleman, with whom I consider it an honor to be a friend. I would rejoice to enjoy his society with that of our beloved sisters in the kingdom of God. I would also recommend these sisters as intelligent, consistent advocates of the truth—also as able writers whose productions would be a credit to our paper. I requested Sister Margaret Rock to write a review of Barbour's Three Worlds, not having time to do so myself, which I wish published, because I believe that book teaches grave errors. A. M. S.

The Oriental Question.

There can be but one interpretation of prophecy in truth. In accord with this, the eastern question must be settled by a division of the whole Roman Empire into ten parts answering to the toes of the image. Turkey will be one of them, and Palestine another, under the covenant confirmed with many for one week.

The seventy sevens (weeks) are divided, cut apart, separated into three parts.

From the degree of Cyrus to the restoration seven sevens. From that point to the cutting off of Messiah, sixty and two sevens; all literally fulfilled. One seven remains. Those seventy sevens are exclusively Jewish. They belong to Jewish history and can be fulfilled only under Jewish nationality. When the seventy sevens end, there is an end of sins; and everlasting righteousness is brought in, by, and at the restoration of Jesus Christ, and a restoration of the dead. When the Jews lost their king, they lost their national existence.

The last of the seventy begins by a covenant for one seven, confirmed by the Prince that shall come. He is a Roman prince; he is the vile person; he is the prince of the covenant; he is the little horn; for by each the daily sacrifice is taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up. The little horn is the beast; the beast hath his name, Apollyon; he comes from the bottomless abys; he is the eighth, and is of the seven kings of Rome; his name is numbered and it is the number of a man.

That one week has its beginning, its midst, and its end. Decisive and emphatic are the prophetic events which designate and crown the whole. It has no beginning until the covenant is confirmed; no midst till the daily sacrifice is taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up; no end till the resurrection of the dead.

The vision of the daily sacrifice and the abomination that maketh desolate is for 2300 days. Whoso readeth let him understand. That from the midst of the week to the end of the wonders revealed, the resurrection of the dead included, is 1290 days. Upon this basis locate the midst of the week, and find historic echoes of the voice of God for the fulfillment of events indicated, or abandon all vain theories.

So long as the vision of men is marred by a ghostly papal beast which has no existence, save in the imagination; so long as the legitimate king of Dan. ii. is ignored and supplanted by a futile king of the north who is driven to oblivion by the potentate of prophecy; so long as the drying up of the great river Euphrates is perverted to apply to the wasting of the Turks, so long will many very foolish things be written on these subjects.

Brother B. Wilson's article on the "Time of the End," is fragrant with profound truths of revelation—every sentence in strict harmony with all that is written in the book of God.

England's Danger in the East.

The Turkestan Gazette says that the Khan of Khelat has entered into secret negotiations with the Ameer of Cabul in order "to make a combined attack upon the English," and that the weak English garrison in Khelat is every moment fearing an attack." Major Sande man occupies a strong position in Sealcote. The same paper publishes a telegram from the governor of the district of Semiretchiask, according to which Hakim Khan, who, after the death of Yakoob Beg, had assumed the sovereignty of that part of Kashgaria, in the towns of Akyu and Korle, had entered Russian territory, in the district of Issikul, with a force of 1,000 men. Whether he was forced to do this by the advance of the Chinese from Turfan, or by the arms of Ilek Kuli Beg, the present ruler of Kashgar, is not known, but the country is now the scene of a civil war. The commandant of the Kashgarian fortress at Tchimuuk has also fled to Russian territory with the troops under his orders.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Five sons and seven daughters of the late Mr. and Mrs. Jonathan Parker of Nantucket are now living, whose ages are respectively 75, 76, 70, 70, 68, 59, 57, 56, 53, 51. These children constitute all the children of the family, except one who died in infancy. The father was, at the time of his death, 85, and the mother died at the age of 77.

In preparing to move Cleopatra's needle at Alexandria, two inscriptions were found upon it—one in Latin, the other in Greek. They fix as the year of its erection at Alexandria, by Barbarus, prefect of Egypt, the eighth year of Agustus Cesar's reign: or about thirty-two years before the birth of Christ.

A correspondent of the London Daily News, writing from Rome, says the Ultramontane party of action, in sympathy with events in France, is redoubling its activity throughout the Italian Peninsula. Mr. Cook has lately thrown the following bombshell, into the Boston skeptical camp: "Has it ever printed a book that has gone into a second edition? Theodore Parker's works never went into a second edition. I do not know of a single infidel book over a hundred years old that has not been put on the upper neglected shelf by scholars."

Mr. Gladstone's memory will compare with Macaulay's. Addressing the students of the Hawarden Grammar School the other day, he said: "When I was myself a very small child I went with my mother to visit a person very famous in her day and of known excellence, Mrs. Hannah Moore. I believe I was four years old at the time, and I remember that she presented me with one of her little books—not uninteresting for children—and that she told me she gave it to me because I had just come into the world and she was just going out."

Conference Report.

A number of delegates from the churches of Southern Indiana looking for the second coming of Christ convened in conference at Volga, Jefferson Co. Indiana, on September fourteenth.

Dr. N. Field, President: G. W. Green, Secretary. There were six or seven preachers present, and in most of the business harmony prevailed. During our deliberations, the question of union between our conference and the conference of Northern Indiana, was sprung; and by a hearty vote of the delegates they decided for the secretary to write a union letter, or a letter to be estitution brethren soliciting union between the two bodies. The brethren all are very desirous that the union may be speedily consummated, and that the two bodies may work together harmoniously for the cause of Christ. We are sorry to say that no action was taken by your conference on this subject as we see from your report, in THE RESTITUTION.

This letter ought to have been written some time ago, and I expected it to have been, Bro. Green, ex-secretary, said he would make a report, but has failed to do so from some cause, and I offer this as an apology.

Praying and hoping we may waive our little differences and go to work unitedly in this glorious service, I am

Your Bro. in Christ,

THOMAS PORTER, Secretary.

HENRY BURTON.

Were there no night we could not read the stars,
The heavens would turn into a blinding glare;
Freedom is best seen through the prison bars,
And rough seas make the haven seem more fair.

We wanted meanwhile joy—but by their keen
Which blow us far away, we see them then;
Our richest climbers grow around the cross,
And in the night-time angels sing to men.

The seed must first be buried deep in earth,
Before the lily opens to the sky;
So "light is sown," and gladness has its birth
In the dark deeps where we can only cry.

"Late out of death" is heaven's unwritten law;
Nay, it is written in a mystical hieroglyph;
The victor's palm grows on the fields of war,
An eternity and beauty are the fruit of storms.

Come then, my soul, be brave to do and bear;
Thy life is hunted that it may be more sweet;
The cross will soon be left, the crown we'll wear—
Nay, we will cast it at our Savior's feet.

And up among the glories never told,
Sweeter than bell-je of the harvest bell,
Our hands will strike the vibrant harp of gold
To the glad song, "He doeth all things well."

Correspondence.

Ed. Restitution:—In my last communication I promised that I would write an article concerning a certain vile personage, spoken of by Daniel, and referred to by brother J. C. Kinsey in a late article written by him. Now, while I agree with brother Kinsey, that Russia and Turkey have no place in the field of prophecy, still I cannot understand the prophecy concerning the vile personage as he does. He seems to think that the vile personage is a middle man, between the kings of the north and the south, and that both these kings attack him. I know not where he gets that idea, in Dan. xi. 40; but if he will read it aloud, putting the emphasis on the second repetition of the pronoun him, and then take into consideration that the vile personage is the king of the north, he will then see there is no third person there. How do I know that he is the king of the north? It is clearly taught in Dan. xi. 10–22. Let us see—we have a king of the north to start from verse 10, who stumbles and falls. In his estate—verse 20—or in his stead, in succession to him, shall stand up a raiser of taxes, i. e. a chancellor of exchequer, or minister of finance, &c., in the glory of the kingdom. What kingdom? The kingdom of the north: same kingdom and throne, but another man to occupy. He is destroyed neither in anger nor in battle, and in his estate, stead, succession, stands up a vile personage—same throne, but another occupant—to whom they shall not give the honor of the kingdom. Who are they? Brother Kinsey says the Jews. I say the subjects composing the kingdom of the north. They do not choose this vile personage, but he obtains the throne by diplomacy, deceit and flattery, and the rest of the chapter is a history of his career, together with that of the king of the south. So much for his identity. What are his alliances? The little horn, the prince that shall come, and the king of fierce countenance. Where is his kingdom? It consists of the northern division of one of the four kingdoms, into which Alexander's kingdom or dominion was divided. See Dan. vi. 5–8; viii. 9 12, 20–26. What were the names of these kingdoms? Syria, Egypt, Thrace and Macedonia. Is Russia the northern division and Turkey the southern division of either of these four kingdoms? If so, then they may be the kingdoms of the north and of the south. If not, they have no place in the prophecy. Does the fourth empire change its name or character? No. It is Greece in the book of Daniel, and it is still Greece in the last days, after the restoration of Israel. See Zech. ix. 13. "When I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O, Zion, against thy sons, O, Greece, and made thee as a sword of a mighty man." Read the whole chapters, Zech. ix. and x. It was Greece 2000 years ago, and it will be Greece that will oppress and tread down Israel in the time of the end. Remember, it was the people of the prince that shall come, that destroyed Jerusalem A. D. 70; and it must be the prince of the people that destroyed Jerusalem, that shall confirm the covenant with many for one week, &c., in the time of the end. I am done. These ideas are not advanced in the spirit of dogmatism, but in that of inquiry, with all due consideration and deference for the Scriptural knowledge of Bro. Kinsey. Let us have light. GEO. C. WARD.

Editor Restitution:—The Bloods may be glad to read that the Word was received with joy by the Brethren in Newark, N. J., last First day. Three were baptized, two of whom—Brother Miller and wife, with their two children were soon to leave for Texas. It occurs to me that a notice of this fact may lead to some advantageous acquaintances in their new home, and thus good be done.

Respectfully yours,
J. B. COOK.

Editor Restitution: There is, in this section, a basic block of eight saints who hold their meetings twice a month. The attendance of the people is small, but good attention is paid to what we say. At almost every meeting the members are all present, and take an active part in the exercises. Those who come out to hear, go home in a meditative mood, and search their Bibles to see if these things are so.

Your brother in the One Faith,
C. M. McDONALD.

Marth, Ind.

Editor Restitution: We feel that we could not do without our paper for any consideration whatever, as it is very seldom that we hear any gospel preaching, and we would rather take our paper and our Bible, and sit down and read them, than go to hear the popular theory of these days. Brother H. Butler was here last month, and stayed over two Sundays. He gave us some very good discourses—the best we have had since Brother J. T. Ongley was here a year ago last spring. So, you see, were it not for the paper and our Bible, we should have been well-nigh starved by this time. We are so isolated from the rest of the brethren of the one faith, that, with our limited means, it is impossible to remunerate preachers for coming, as there are only three of us as yet who have been baptized. The opposition to the truth is so bitter that, of course, the burden falls on a very few to sustain it. There are a few who are willin. to hear, and we are praying and hoping they will, ere long, become obedient doers as well as hearers of the Word.

Dear brethren and sisters of the One Faith, our hearts are with you. We read your writings on the prophecies with much interest, and earnestly pray for those who suffer persecution for the truth's sake, as we were just reading Brother Bond's great trials. May the Lord strengthen him and bridle all the designs of his enemies, and soon come to take his ransomed people home.

Yours in hope,
LEVI S. QUIMBY.

The Great Wall of China.

The great wall of China was measured in many places by Mr. Unthank, an American engineer, lately engaged on a survey for a Chinese railroad. His measurements give the height at eighteen feet. Every few hundred yards there is a tower twenty-four feet square, and from twenty to forty-five feet high. The foundation of the wall is of solid granite. Mr. Unthank brought with him a brick from the wall which is supposed to have been made 200 years before the time of Christ. In building this immense stone fence to keep out the Tartar, the builders never attempted to avoid mountains or chasms to save expense. For 1,500 miles the wall goes over plain and mountain, and every foot of the foundation is in solid granite, and the rest of the structure solid masonry. In some places the wall is built smooth up against the bank, or canons, or precipices, where there is a sheer descent of 1,000 feet. Small streams are arched over, but in the large streams the wall runs to the water's edge, and a tower is built on each side. On the top of the wall there are breastworks, or defenses, facing in and out, so the defending force can pass from one tower to another without being exposed to an enemy from either side. To calculate the time of building or cost of this wall is beyond human skill. So far as the magnitude of the work is concerned, it surpasses everything in ancient or modern times of which there is any trace. The pyramids of Egypt are nothing compared to it.—London News.

Reaching the Masses.

Dr. Manning says: "Christians 'reach the masses' every day—in their homes, at public gatherings, in shops and counting-rooms, they reach and impress 'the masses'—for better or for worse. Professed Christians are known and read as such by people they daily meet, who involuntarily commend or condemn them immediately by their spirit and conversation. The world cannot help taking knowledge of them, and people are either drawn by them to Christ or driven from Him. A truly godly man, in his daily life, constantly 'reaches the masses' effectually for good."—Ex.

CONSTANTINOPLE, October 19.—To-day Kars is said to be entirely partially blockaded. It is rumored that the Russians have occupied Batoum.

It is established that within the last five or six weeks the Russians in Asia have received about 7,000 fresh troops. The Turkish forces opposed to Gurko on Monday was estimated at about forty-seven thousand men, which is probably correct.

TIFLIS, October 19.—The Russians moved on Kars yesterday. No material fact Advance reported for Kars.

A column has been sent westward to keep the road open from Kars to Erzeroum. Large reinforcements left last night to join Mouktar Pasha. It is also stated that reinforcements have started from Batoum.

BUCHAREST, October 19.—The Roumanians have approached within twenty meters of the second Grivitza redoubt, which, however, is believed to have been evacuated by the Turks. During the last five days the Russians before Plevna have received a reinforcement of 10,000 infantry.

LONDON, October 19.—A Russian journal reports 39,434 Russian troops killed and wounded to October 11.

ST. PETERSBURG, October 20.—The foot and horse artillery of the reserve are to be put on a war footing.

LONDON, October 20.—A Simnitza dispatch says rain is falling heavily, with every appearance of long continuance. The roads are all but impassible. There was never anything like it at Balaclava.

Forty Turkish soldiers deserted Osman Pasha's camp to-day, and declare there was so little food in Plevna that the men only got a pound of bread in twenty-four hours. There were 120,000 men in Plevna who could only be made to surrender by hunger.

VIENNA, October 19.—It is announced from Varna that Prince Hassan threatens to withdraw the Egyptians in consequence of their ignominious relegation to garrison duty.

ADRIAN, October 19.—The Hungarian Government has ordered the stoppage of money relief hitherto granted to able-bodied Bosnian fugitives. The greatest distress and mortality prevails among them.

RAGUSA, October 19.—Some Bosnian insurgents have proclaimed a Provisional Government, with Vouitz, a brother of the Russian Consul at Cettinje, as President.

ROME, October 20.—Although the Pope likes to receive visitors and is chatty with them, he seems to have ceased to take interest in the affairs of the church, and almost invariably dismisses any one who comes to talk to him on business. The affairs of the Papacy are without any supreme Pontifical guiding, being conducted simply by heads of the various State departments, and by the Presidents of the various congregations. Jealousy reigns among these bodies, and as each does as it suits its chief, the Papal Government is threatened with division and anarchy.

LONDON, October 20.—The Russians have before Kars 70,000 men. Mukhtar Pasha's army at the time of the battle did not comprise more than 40,000 men. Among these were fourteen battalions drawn from the garrison of Kars. The Ottoman field army lost at least one-third of its strength in killed, wounded and captured. A few battalions remain available to retire upon Erzeroum and unite with the troops of the Kurd. Ismail Pasha, and those from Prenek form the nucleus of the new army for the relief of Kars.

The Grand Duke Michael can safely leave 40,000 men in front of Kars, and with the remainder press forward toward Erzeroum.

LONDON, Oct. 22.—Eighteen thousand men and forty cannon were captured by the Russians in their recent victory over Ghazi Mokhtar. The Turkish reports of a part of their army holding out in fortified positions on Aladja Dagh are unfounded. The Russian loss in carrying Aladja Dagh is officially reported at 1,431 killed and wounded. The losses on other parts of the battle-field are not stated.

Our Prospects.

The old Jerusalem was laid waste by war, and the ruins are overlaid with dust and desolation. But the New Jerusalem shall never crumble dow.. The jasper battlements shall stand and shine forever. The golden gates shall never lose their luster nor rust upon their portals. The white robes shall never need cleansing, for they are washed in the blood of the Lamb. The harps of heaven shall always be in tune, and never be swept by dirges. No failing eyesight, no gray hairs, no weary limbs, no wrinkled brows, no hollow cheeks, no sickness, pain, nor any more death—O! blessed prospect! The full glory draweth nigh! Messiah's Herald.

DIED.

CLOSE—Brother Levy H. Close, of Ransom township, Hillsdale county, Mich., died on the 5th of January, 1877, aged seventy-six years, six months and seven days.

Brother Close was born in Otsego county, New York, in the year 1800, and moved with his parents to Ohio in 1817. He was married to Miss Eliza Robinson, of Richland county, Ohio, in the year 1824, and moved with her husband and family to Michigan in 1837, where she resided until the day of her death. They have been many members of the very few where age to excitement from the past to many.

Secretary for the Church.

Cleveland, Ohio, October 14, 1877.

NOTICE.

Our next annual meeting will be held in November, beginning on Friday before the second Sunday in the month, or Nov. 9, 1877. This is a special call to all, and hope that all can put an evangelist in the field to travel all the time. In this way we believe much good can be done. The call is for brethren at South Haven and home, Buffalo county, Mississippi; Rock, Wilkinson county, to Union, Pike, Lincoln, Cherokee Co., Neosho Co., Montague Co., and Labette Co., Kas. All the preaching brethren come, we need the help of each. Elders Kinsey, Jones, Lawver, Bingo, Hazel in Stringer, Ruth, Ward, Harlan, Pine, and if I have overlooked any of the brethren, come, we will be a free meeting for all. I do think it will pay for you to come, if not in groves like, as Brother Stringer says, yet in convenient houses to go to. As some one, name all, let us have a good time once more. I would not have missed the two last conference meetings for any consideration. Remember, Nov. 9, 10, 11, 1877.

The above conference will be held at the Grady School House on Big Creek, ten miles northwest of Erie, Neosho county, Kansas.

By order of the Church,
JOHN POORE.

UNION CONFERENCE AT GALESBURG, MICH.

By invitation of the Church at Galesburg, Mich., a Union Conference is called to meet at that place Thursday, October 25, 1877, at 1 o'clock p. m., and continue over Sunday.

Come all who love the Lord and his appearing, let us take hold and work together in the fellowship of the Spirit. The Church at Galesburg will gladly entertain all who come. Let others be ready to pay the necessary expenses.

The Name in the Sand.

Alone I walked the ocean strand;
A pearly shell was in my hand;
I stooped and wrote upon the sand
My name—the year—the day.
As onward from the spot I passed,
One lingering look behind I cast;
A wave came rolling high and fast,
And washed my lines away.

And so methought 'twill shortly be
With every mark on earth from me;
A wave of dark oblivion's sea
Will sweep across the place
Where I have trod the sandy shore
Of time, and been to be no more;
Of me—my day—the name I bore,
To leave no track nor trace.

And yet, with Him who counts the sands,
And holds the water in His hands,
I know a lasting record stands
Inscribed against my name,
Of all this mortal part hath wrought;
Of all this thinking soul has thought;
And from these fleeting moments caught,
For glory or for shame.

Selections.

The Coming Reign of Christ.

In taking a retrospective review of the past forty years, during which I have been a student of prophecy in conjunction with other portions of God's Word, I may express the result in the well known saying of Sir Isaac Newton, "I feel like a little child picking up a few pebbles upon the seashore," for whatever knowledge of Scripture we may acquire, there always remain greater depths and further heights of knowledge yet to be attained.

Especially is this the case with Scripture Prophecy, which continually receives fresh elucidations from the events of history. It resembles the parables in many instances, as its teachings are imparted through the medium of figurative language so as to require close attention and earnest and prayerful research. And in this as well as in other studies it is found that "the soul of the diligent is made fat;" and "to him that hath is more and more given." If we are persevering, childlike, and prayerful in seeking Divine light in the investigation of the prophetic Scriptures, God will not withhold it; and, as we are told in the words of Daniel, "the wise shall understand."

Now we are all agreed as to one point—that the advent of our Lord Jesus Christ will be personal and premillennial; and also that it will be unexpected and sudden as the lightning, as far as the world in general is concerned. And it appears to me that although certain events are clearly foretold to take place in connection with it, yet we are not necessarily to wait for them first of all to intervene before the Lord's advent, but we ought to live in a state of constant readiness for it, prepared for His coming at any moment to translate from the earth His waiting people to meet Him in the air. (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17.)

But what will take place at His second coming? His millennial kingdom of glory, which will then appear, will be a manifestation which will differ from what we now enjoy in the kingdom of grace. "Now we walk by faith and not by sight; but then shall we know even as we are known;" and it seems to me, the distinction between the present dispensation and that to be introduced at the second advent will be the transition from faith to sight. And, as in the coronation and investiture of an earthly king, so will it be with that of the Lord Jesus; His coming will be the commencement of a series of great and glorious events connected with His personal reign during the Millennium of a thousand years.

Now, in order to obtain a clear understanding of the twentieth chapter of Revelation, which especially describes the future millennial reign of Christ for a thousand years, it is desirable to refer to the previous chapters to see the order in which the enemies of Christ are to reach the climax of their apostasy and then to be altogether cast down. In the Revelation xvii. there is exhibited to us the picture of a woman clothed in purple and scarlet, at the climax of her power and false glory, drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs and riding upon the scarlet-colored beast, without any apparent forebodings of coming misfortune. She is called Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth, and is described as being seated on the seven hills. It is my settled conviction that this woman or ecclesiastical power is the church of Rome. This was the opinion of the reformers; and so deep-seated was it that nothing short of God's teaching on that point would have induced them to come out as they did, for schism was to them the most terrible of sins. But when once their eyes were opened to see the errors and abominations of the church of Rome, they felt they had no other alternative, than to yield obedience to the admonitory cry, "Come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." Nor can I see how anyone of calm and unbiased judgment can fail to identify this woman, Babylon the Great, with the church of Rome. At the same time, it is quite evident that the wild beast upon which the woman is seated as a rider, must be a power altogether distinct from the woman herself, the church of Rome.

Now this wild beast is a different system altogether, and partakes of a civil or political character, being in fact the Roman Empire and the governments and nations which constitute its ten kingdoms. The harlot, Babylon is to be destroyed, not by the personal appearing of Christ, but by the ten horns of the wild beast, or ten kings who are to hate and desolate and destroy her; that is to say, to confiscate her ill-gotten gains and immense wealth, and to put an end to her existence, as an ostensibly Christian church and professing bride of Christ. But after her desolation, there still remain surviving the wild beast, or political powers that overthrew her, and the false prophet—an infidel ecclesiastical system that will arise in her place. Then will be the time when the infidel democratic powers denoted by the wild beast and its ten horns will exercise mighty dominion over the world, and there will be the great tribulation, especially throughout all Christendom. The combination of infidel powers shall for a season wage a fierce warfare with the people of Christ, and gain vast influence and power.

I believe it is somewhere about the time of this great confusion then taking place that we shall have the appearing of our Lord and the ingathering of His saints. The church of the firstborn will then be caught up to meet the Lord. This great tribulation has been typified by various tribulations which at former periods of history have befallen the Lord's people; and their deliverance will correspond with the type of Noah and his family at the flood and of Lot at Sodom. They will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air as predicted in 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17; afterwards, at a considerably later period there will be the conversion of all the Jews that are then remaining upon the earth. The literal restoration of the Jewish nation to Palestine is very clearly foretold in many passages of Scripture, as in Jeremiah xxx.; xxxi.; Ezekiel xxxvii. to xlviii.; Zechariah x. to xiv.; etc. There will be a partial restoration of some of them in an unconverted state and from political motives, and after these shall have passed through "the time of Jacob's trouble," there will be the fuller restoration and conversion of all Israel including the ten tribes, at the period of Christ's descent upon the earth. Hitherto the great majority of that nation still remain in unbelief, although the work of missionaries and teachers has borne blessed fruit in the conversion of many individuals among them. But those who are found in a savingly converted state at the Lord's advent, will be caught up, Jews and Gentiles together, in glorified bodies to be with Him in the heavens. Then will follow the tribulation of those who are left on the earth, and it will terminate in their national conversion at the descent of Christ upon the Mount of Olives, at the battle of Armageddon. It is then that "the nation shall be born at once." Isaiah lxvi. 8; Zech. xiv. 4.

As regards the two Jerusalems, there is an earthly one and there is a heavenly one. The glory of the heavenly Jerusalem will shine upon the earthly one and will heighten and increase its beauties. What a blessed and glorious hope, when we know that the king will soon come to receive His saints Himself unto the mansions of the heavenly Jerusalem and establish His reign of righteousness over the whole earth.

We have the destruction of Antichrist and the false prophet at the battle of Armageddon in Revelation xix. and the binding of Satan in the succeeding chapter. Now the devil has never yet been bound and deprived of his power, as here described. He is still exercising mighty influence; but his power must come to an end. That old serpent which is the devil and satan is to be imprisoned for a thousand years in the bottomless pit, and a seal as it were set upon him. So then we shall have a state of things such as never was before, viz:—the elect church with Christ in the heavenly glory; Babylon consumed; antichrist gone; the devil bound in the bottomless pit; and Jerusalem and the Jews occupying the chief position in the millennial earth; and the nations flocking to her light, and going up from year to year to keep the feast of tabernacles. This is briefly the picture presented. It is in one aspect even a higher condition than that in paradise. Why better even than paradise? Because there will be no tempter except the tempter within man's own heart; no devil to entice and to deceive in the millennial kingdom; and all mankind in the visible presence of the Lord will learn their dependence upon him. The saints and the angels will be witnesses of all. Yet is going on here below a state of peace and blessedness. Dear Mr. ——, and you will see what a blessed and happy condition it will be, when men shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and when they shall learn war no more.

But what shall we say of the end of this period? In Revelation xx. we read that when the thousand years expire, satan will be loosed out of his prison, and go forth to deceive the nations again. Then we have the account of the impious rebellion of Gog and Magog. This is evidently not the same invading host as that mentioned in Ezekiel xxxviii. and xxxix., which, before the Millennium, came against the Jews in their unwalled villages. This is an outbreak of wickedness after the millennium: and it shows us how the devil is the same, and man the same at all times. It is a most solemn thought, that, notwithstanding all the proofs and evidences exhibited in the millennium, of the power and glory of Christ, yet still the devil will be the same at the end as at the beginning of that period, and the same as he was at Christ's temptation. He is unchanged and unchangeable; and this very fact furnishes a strong argument for the eternity of punishment.*

And then, "the devil who deceived the nations is cast into the lake of fire where the wild beast and false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night forever." And then we read, "I saw a great white throne," etc. "And I saw the dead." Who are these? They have waited for the final judgment; and here we have, at the close of the thousand years, the sitting of the final assize. The throne is a great white throne, no longer surrounded with the rainbow of mercy. There is no Lamb before the throne now; and the sentence to be passed is irrevocable upon all those who are to be excluded from the everlasting kingdom of glory. Here we have the final doom of the wicked. The unholy dead are now summoned out of their graves to die the second death. They are cast into the burning lake, into the furnace of flames "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." There they will be separated from life and peace and happiness for ever and ever.

On the other hand, the new heavens and new earth are then fully introduced. Nothing that defileth can enter therein; there are no thorns or briers; no curse, no night there. The former things have passed away, and the state of the blessed is one of joy and purity and peace for ever.

In conclusion, I ask whether we are amongst those who look and long for these things? Is it the desire of our hearts to see the Savior eye to eye, face to face? To see the King in His beauty? Here is a distinctive test of conversion: Do you wish to see Jesus? Do you long for Him? We like to see those we love; to look into their faces, catch their smile, and hear their voice. Do we thus long to see Jesus? Do we thus love him? The question of Jesus to Peter is very suggestive, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" Christ did not say do you believe in me? but, "Do you love?" This is the great question. Have you given your heart to the Savior? Do you love Him as a wife loves her husband? Do you long for His return from heaven?—By the Rev. W. R. Fremantle, Canon of Christchurch, Oxford, and Rector of Claydon.

Definite Faith Contrasted With Educational Impressions.

The faith that comes by hearing the word is definite and consistent with all God's loving will, (Romans x. 17,) and all human weal. But all theory adopted or argued out at second hand is versatile and often inconsistent with itself and the glory of God, in the foretold consummation of the gospel system.

To make this doctrine practical, allow me, please, to make a further brief statement on prophecy. Some seem still in doubt, as if the national and dispensational landmarks of prophecy had been scattered loosely and vaguely along the lapse of ages, to be fixed and set up by us or some other bewildered mortals.

As it was my lot to act some part at the introduction of Russia, as number "five," in the series of earthly empires among us, some twenty-four years ago, it seems good to me to note the root and substance of the subject.

At our conference in Rochester, N. Y., 1854, I think, Dr. John Thomas asked me to present all the objections I could to his "Anatolia—Russia Triumphant," &c. I was looking for light, and of course consented; which led me to examine the whole subject of that work. It seems duty to present the salient points, to aid in understanding the prophecies, and also to estimate the transcendent importance of Russia, as the Scriptures, and events overwhelming weight in the scale of nations. Please note the cited points.

I. On page 5, section 3, the author says that "The different forms of the kingdom of men are represented in the symbols of the book of Daniel. It will have assumed five distinct forms: The Chaldean, the Medo-Persian, the Macedonian or Grecian, the Roman and the Russian."

With surprise and regret I was compelled to object to his emphatic number "five," also to his making Russia the mightiest and most extended, and pars excels are the nation of prophecy—nay, the sum and absorbing subject of the symbol of Dan. ii.

My faith had fixed on "four—the fourth" being "the last, and the object of destruction at the judgment. Dan. vii: "These great beasts which are four, are four kings (kingdoms) which shall rise out of the earth." Jer. xxv. 3: Zech. i. 18-21; vi. 1, repeat this four-fold series, as all of "the gentiles that should scatter Israel, Judah and Jerusalem." The changes in "the fourth—the iron and clay," do not justify number five in Anatolia, more than the changes in the first, second and third would have justified a like addition. The principle that doubles the fourth would double them all, and falsify the prophecy all through, as this does, as to Rome, the fourth.

II. Page 25 recognizes Rome, "the fourth," in the first century of our era destroying Judah," &c.

Again, "The northern kingdom—the Seleucidæ were heirs of Alexander;" and "the Romans inherited it the king of the north—Syria, from Seleucus." Then this fourth—the Roman-Greek-Babylonian (?) descriptive of it the fourth in its relation to the holy land, in all its future phases, until its utter destruction by Messiah the Prince.

This echoes the truth, but it leaves no place or possibility for the sole he assigns to Russia. Then his number five is ruled out of the prophecy altogether by himself, so far and so long as he forgets his erring theory.

Hence every one who feels the need of the author's endorsement of the proper sphere and destiny of Rome—the fourth—has it in this work.

These "four horns"—four parts of the image—the four symbols of earthly empires—are the Gentiles that lifted up their horn over the land of Judah to scatter it. Zech. i. 22. Luke xxi. 24; Romans xi. 25-29. If there be darkness here, Dr. S. H. Cox said, "it is all in t ourselves."

III. Yet from page 68 he gives the future magnitude of the Czar's dominion, "from the North Sea to the wall of China—and to the deserts of Africa and Arabia." P. 69, section 2.

This would put the Messiah's coming quite out of association with prophecy and the destiny of the fourth kingdom—as noted by the author himself above. P. 23, section 2.

IV. P. 69, the caption of section 26 reads thus: "Nebuchadnezzar's Image the Symbol of the Autocrat's Dominion," &c.

...." The organization of the Russian empire when fully developed is represented in Dan. ii. by a colossus in human form....it follows that what is recorded in that chapter is yet in the future"! P. 70, section 1. "It is the mission of the Autocrat (of Russia) to form the feet and set up the image before the world in all its excellent brightness and terribleness of form." No comment here is needful.

It was my aim to say very little, except to note these points, in the structure of the work, which are palpably incoherent, self-contradictory, and impossible.

Note 1. The king of Babylon saw the image in his dream 2500 years ago (all there was of it), yet the Autocrat is made down here to "form its feet and set up the image," and be it!

2. The divided fourth—the Roman—"the iron and clay"—of the image is to be dashed to dust and destruction. Dan. ii. Yet here is Russia made number five, to fill a role, transcending in extent, "in brightness and terribleness" all foregoing empires, but utterly unknown to the prophecy. Dan. ii. 7; Rev. xvii.

3. The drapery for Russia is borrowed from the fourth—the Roman empire, pp. 68-69.

4. Let us take the four seasons of the year, and imagine them somehow to expand into five, (as the fourth symboled kingdoms are treated in this work,) and then proceed to justify the additional number five by some obscure changes in the fourth: then we have the principle of this work—making last the year itself.

Again: Take an obligation to pay $1,000 in four instalments, and then make the divided fourth expand into a number five, and borrow the terms of the obligations of the fourth, so as to array another five upon a reconstruction of the engagement! Would he hold me to the entire obligation? Would he not give me a quietus in this case, and wave it also? Decision.

5. The entire work—"Anatolia,"—applied Cæsar's triumph to the presumed achievements in the Crimean war. The disastrous failure of Russia in that war, however, was known and read of all men; hence the assumed wisdom of the work should have vanished with that most signal misapprehension. The facts should be known. The theorists, the expounders, the would-be leaders, of every class in Christendom, seem to think that their reputation is at stake, and hence they feel compelled to readjust, reduce or expand and add to, just enough to make the symbols and prophecies seem symmetrical, or the like. So far, they use the prophecies as a child does his toy of putty—to be remodeled to suit his fancy. But no. The symbols are like "the pattern shown to Moses in the mount." The original is divine. They are, as designed, just obscure and yet consistent enough to outline the subject, and test the loyalty of our faith. They are sufficiently monstrous to show what Satan and his subjectsinners would do, and now have done, in organizing the government and religion of our world.

Just compare them with "the glory and beauty" of our King and his associates in the Mount of Transfiguration! Matt. xvii. This is "the kingdom of heaven." While they portray the empire of sin, all disordered and demoniac, monstrous, dragonic and manifold in form, and so out of harmony with any object God ever made or authorized.

Thus I see propriety in the ill-shapened symbols, to suit the dreadful and terrible character of organized evil. Yet most seem oblivious to all such correlated truth.

Faith says let the symboled disorder of Babylon alone. It is given, as it should be, to depict the dominion of the devil and men.

In closing, please observe that the author's number five is a fiction; that the fourth is said to be "destroyed by Messiah," and yet that Russia, the fifth form of "the kingdom of men," is to transcend all its foregoing forms. Then, to crown the climax, "The image is the symbol of the Autocrat's dominion"!

Surely these incongruities have been overlooked by the abettors of the Doctor's general view. That view is also oblivious of the geography, history and ethnology which the subject embraces. No definite faith is possible, on this whole range of truth, except as we believe God's word. Rome was and is "the fourth." The the "third part"—eastern division—is Turkey. The judgment (Dan. vii. 9-11; Rev. xvii. to xix.) impends. "Now the just shall live by faith,"—by believing the Word. Amen!

J. B. COOK.

P. S.—"Anatolia" claimed to be original, unique and universal, as to its statement of the Eastern question in prophecy. This may be granted, but then does not this demonstrate its mistake?

The truth—all its truth—like the pattern shown to Moses in the Mount, was given through the prophets, nearly 2500 years ago. It is addressed only to faith, in both symbol and its verbal import. But this unnatural make-up of God's four into five, and number five "formed and set up" as the sum and substance of the symbol-image, as a whole, may well be "original!" The misapprehension may have been too great for any other age or author. "The Unpreached Gospel."—original—from H. Dunn, Esq., may be its "nearest of kin."

May I, for the sake of getting out the truth, ask our intelligent brother, H. Wilson, to map out the four symboled kingdoms, Dan. ii., vii; Zech. i. 18, which embrace the character and course of organized evil; in its antagonism to "the kingdom of God"? Then enquire whether all that follows these four kingdoms must not be assigned to "His times—the Blessed and only Potentate"? Illustrative of this truth, we have recorded, "for our learning," that "the Lord" did "come down to deliver" his ancient people. Ex. iii. 1-10. The judgment plagues followed.

So here. "The seventh angel sounds; Rev. xi. 15-18; the dead in Christ rise; 1 Cor. xv 51; and are caught away to meet their Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 13-18. The time of wrath follows on the oppressor—the Gentile powers, the fourth beast, man of sin, Babylon, and the false prophet, and Satan.

My point is, that there seems to be no occasion to bring in any form of foretold Gentilism, again. One formal fulfillment of first, second, third, and fourth, is all that is demanded or allowed. Having, then, had this, let us tell the world that the judgment, then, will act on all forms of Gentilism, as it if began on Egypt when the Lord came down and gave Moses his miraculous commission.

"The trumpet should give a certain sound," that all who have ears to hear may hear and prepare. Amen!

"The nations will be angry," and Gentile powers will struggle as they did at the slaughter of Midian, and as Pharaoh and his hosts did to their miraculous destruction. That is their destined end. But "the bride the church of the first-born," will then be hasted in the chambers of Omnipotence, above the fear of evil. Amen! Isa. xxvi. 18 21.

The swinging upper, the new covenant, the reign of the saints with Christ, all come in their revealed order, as the prophetic scenery unfolds to the new heavens and new earth, in their consummated glory.

A Word to Christians.

Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work....in the grave whither thou goest. Eccl. ix. 10.

When the Lord of glory ascended up on high, and led captivity captive, he gave "some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, and the edifying of the body of Christ," leaving to the world his word, which, accompanied by the powerful influences of his Spirit, would if properly used prove strong to the destruction of sin. We feel confident then, in saying that God has so distributed the work of his church among its members, that every individual, without any exception, possesses influence and has a work to accomplish. We are apt now that persecution against the saints has ceased, and the shame of the cross is forgotten, to discharge our religious duties by proxy. Churches are built and men set apart to minister, after the fashion of secular institutions, and we compose ourselves with the idea that heaven can ask no more; we forget the personal influence we possess, and the power to accomplish good. Troubled and perplexed by the thousand and one petty differences in our midst; bound up by some hobby of a doctrine which we fairly ride to death; our understandings darkened by unbelief—our faith weak, and our hope low and grovelling—we keep ourselves forever in misery, and neglect God's demand upon our time and talents.

In the formation of character around us, and the shaping and disposing of events, every one, and especially every Christian man, possesses influence. No matter how lowly or poor; it may be the silent influence of a sanctified life, (and this should always exist,) or it may be the influence of a pleasant expression of thought, power of mind—ability to write or speak. God distributes these gifts according to His wisdom. Brought by redeeming grace into close connection with the father of spirits, every new-born child of God has a work given him to do. His is a work for eternity, and is followed either by the joy of heaven or the dark consequences of sin. His relation to Jesus has changed his relation to the world, for he belongs not to it. Old things pass away, and the fountain which washed him of his sins, removes his dimness of sight, reveals joy unspeakable and full of glory—and if really born again, inspires him with a heaven-born desire to work for Christ.

The high and glorious intelligences around God's throne are not inactive; he himself cannot be passive; he ever labors in goodness—his angels are "ministering spirits," and surely his servants should not be idlers! We beseech our readers to look at this subject, as rational and God-loving persons should. Your work, dear friends, is given you by God; you are responsible for a faithful discharge of duty. The book of remembrance is not kept in vain; the last great day will reveal it all.

"Father, I have glorified thee on earth. I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do; and now I come to thee." So said our adorable Redeemer, ere he left the world of his suffering, and though we cannot approach his perfect diligence and fervent spirit, though we cannot copy his blessed example, we may at least, "show diligence, to the full assurance of hope unto the end." Brothers of a like precious faith—"the morning cometh and also the night"—the night of death-like silence and of rest. Work for Christ; labor for Christ; and then when earth's toils and sorrows shall cease, faith shall hear a voice from heaven saying, "blessed are the dead which die in the Lord: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

"Art is long and time is fleeting,
And our hearts, though stout and brave,
Still, like muffled drums, are beating
Funeral marches to the grave.
Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate,
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the unconditional salvation of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief in the simple, rejected gospel, and immersion as prerequisites to the Redemption of the soul; a holy life as essential for final salvation.

"Coming to the Light---Walking in the Light, as He is in the Light."

Epitome of a Discourse in Brooklyn, E. D., Oct. 28, as per Advertisement, made by the Brethren.

We read: "That God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with him and walk in darkness, (in doubt of his care) we lie, and do not the truth. But if we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another; and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." 1 John i. 1-7.

The vital truth of this text is presented in the gospel of St. John i. 4-14; iii. 20-21; by the contrast between one "who doeth evil, and hath the light," and one "who doeth truth, and cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God,"—in his counsel and in the promotion of his heavenly purpose on the earth, ("in Christ in the spirit," are of like import).

As I have been placed by my brethren, in their advertisement of my testimony, where the subject of these Scriptures seems most appropriate--the "meat indeed," and due at this "season,"—I give it my humble echo.

"The light" in which God is seen, is the light of Revelation. His "goings are from of old, from everlasting." Micah v. 2. His "goings" have made Revelation, and God's worthies have walked with God, as did Enoch and Noah, and all the faithful.

1. We see his "goings" in creation and Providence. As says the Psalmist: "The heavens declare the glory of God." Again, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches; these wait all upon thee, that thou mayest give them their meat in due season. Thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good,—the Lord shall rejoice in his works." Psa. civ. 24-31.

2. His goings with man in Eden to guide him in the way of life, and to avoid the way to death, are traceable thence through every age and every condition of human existence. God is unchangeably opposed to man's going away from light and life into darkness and death. So far as we leave the Word, we leave the light and life and way of God.

Hence his attitude is always against the evil—the foul, the vile—(which speculates and seeks darkness, in which to hide from exposure), and in favor of light and the life and blessing to which it guides the doers of truth, as revealed.

3. The circular sent out, groups the time appointed,—the coming quickly and the consummation, as if my subject had then been so announced. Hence, as it suits my purpose, I fall into this wake of truth.

As God's movement is always seen in the light of his word, as the worthies "walked with God," by believing and doing his will as revealed, so we may "walk and work together" with Apostles, prophets and all that is divine—the Father, the Son, and the Spirit by a firm, unhesitating faith in his word, which he "magnifies above all his name." Psa. cxxxviii. 2.

This takes in the number--("four") the character destiny, and "the times before appointed," for "the Gentiles" to govern "this present evil world." Dan. vii. 27; viii. 11-13; Acts xvii. 26-31; 1 Pet. i. 10-12.

"Behold I come quickly." This coming of Christ, "quickly," relates to the all-comprehending events, national and dispensational, that fill out "the time appointed (when) the end shall be."

"The day and hour is not known, but the end of the Lord of Hosts will --hasten it--as its time." Isa. lx. 0, 7.

Conclusion. "This light" discloses the divine love to "the world—the whole world." It has provided pardon for the guilty, and "life" for the dead and dying; nay, more, it will so "take away the sin of the world," that "there shall be no more curse," but "all things be made new." 1 John ii. 2; Rev. xxi. 1-7; xxii. 3.

The mighty motive to constrain us to "come to the light--walk in the light"—to believe and obey God—is that we may be right in all our relations to his moral universe, and "inherit all things" when restored and perfected for our perpetual possession!

This subject gives us the principle and assures the practice of Christian union--"fellowship" with all that is pure and good and godlike, through all time, and through the opening ages of eternity. It leaves no place for party spirit, "private interpretation," or personal theoretic opinion; for all these are "the evil" to be avoided.

In this "light, life and love of God," it seems the strangest of all strange things, that any "who have tasted the good Word of God," should dare to derange or disregard the Divine numberings:—"the four" forms of Gentile government over "Judah and Jerusalem"—or "the time appointed" for their "end," at the "quickly" coming of God's King to reign and "restore all things spoken." Let us, brethren, "come to the light; walk in the light," and so be in fellowship with "the Father and his Son Jesus Christ," and enter through grace into the light and life eternal. Amen. J. B. COOK.

Anglo-Israel.

We print to-day a letter signed W. W. Cox, presenting a very able summary of the argument on which the Anglo-Israelite denomination rests its faith. We do not know that we use too strong a word in calling the believers it this theory a denomination. They are very numerous, and some of them devote as much time and thought to the discussion of it as they do to all other religious matters put together, and in some cases they have, it is said, gone so far as to offer themselves in a body as adherents of any clergyman who should proclaim their doctrine—quite a temptation in these days of active competition.

SCRIPTURE PROPHECIES, AND THE MANNER OF THEIR INTERPRETATION.

The Bible teaches us that the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven can only be apprehended by a spiritual faculty, while it also tells us that many of the prophecies it contains address themselves to our understanding—in other words to our common sense.

The promises given to Abraham are of this character. The predictions are very simple when contemplated through the medium of common sense, but they are equally complex when we endeavor to explain them in any other manner.

Till within the last 1,800 years no doubt could be entertained that the descendants of Abraham were the chosen people of the Lord; but since the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans the Jews have been a scattered people, fully verifying the predictions uttered by Moses that they should be a by-word and a reproach, but not in the least degree carrying out the unconditional promises previously made to Abraham. This leads the infidel to scoff a Scripture prophecy, and to say the predictions made to Abraham have been utterly falsified. But in Isaiah xi., Zechariah xii., Hosea i., Ezekiel xxxvii., and other Scriptures, we find the re-union of "Judah" and "Israel" alluded to. "Judah" and "Israel" must, therefore, have been previously divided, as the Scriptures clearly demonstrate. In Isaiah xii. 12, we have the "outcasts of Israel," and the "dispersed of Judah" plainly set before us—the "outcasts of Israel" being those to whom the disciples of our Lord referred when they said, "Will He go to the dispersed among the Gentiles." They had lapsed into wanton idolatry, and became such as were described in Hosea i. 9, where God says, "They are not my people." Therefore they are denominated the "outcasts of Israel," and the Bible tells us that they were taken captive and carried into Assyria, where we hear of them as dwelling in Media. It is necessary to take this survey of their condition, for the purpose of seeing how distinct they were from the "dispersed of Judah," who had been guilty of our Lord's crucifixion, and were afterwards banished from Palestine by the Romans, and scattered into the "four corners of the earth." If these "dispersed of Judah," who are usually called Jews, were the only descendants of Abraham, then it is clear that the promises given to Abraham have totally failed of their accomplishment during the last 1,800 years: but this cannot be, for God hath sworn unto Abraham that it should not be. Abraham must therefore never be without descendants in whom he is always blessed. It will not do for this purpose to say "the Jews did not on their part fulfil the covenant which God made with them, therefore during the last 1,860 years they have reaped the reward of their iniquity, but ultimately they will be restored to their own land, and then all the promises given to Abraham will be accomplished in them." This method of reasoning would be valid if the promises given to Abraham had been of a conditional nature; but they were not so. They were so absolute as to be confirmed by the oath of God. We must, therefore, discover the manner in which God has been continuously fulfilling the promise He gave to Abraham in respect of his descendants; and if we take common sense [illegible] sufficient to do so. In accordance with the words contained in Hosea i. 9th verse we find the "outcasts of Israel" described as no longer "God's people," but they did not cease to be the "descendants of Abraham," and it is in this latter character we shall discover what a wonderful destiny they had to accomplish in the world, and how the thread of God's purposes in respect of the "descendants of Abraham" when broken by the "dispersed of Judah," was to be taken up and preserved by the "outcasts of Israel." In entering upon this investigation we have to consider whether we perceive any people in the world who are fulfilling in themselves the promises given to Abraham; and if in the case we reason fairly and legitimately, we cannot deny that the Anglo-Saxon races are accomplishing these results, for inasmuch as they are a multitudinous people, with vast colonial possessions, commercial prosperity, enormous wealth, lending to all nations and borrowing from none), maritime supremacy, inheriting the "uttermost parts of the earth for their possessions," not only being the pioneers of civilization, but sending missionaries to circulate the Bible and preach the Gospel to the heathen, as well as to the Jews, in every portion of the world, they are becoming a blessing to "all nations." But we have next to ascertain whether these Anglo-Saxons are in any way connected with the "outcasts of Israel," who are the descendants of Abraham.

For this purpose we consult the most celebrated and trust-worthy Anglo-Saxon historian, Sharon Turner, who informs us that the birth-place of the Anglo-Saxon race was in that portion of the world where the "outcasts of Israel" were lost, that is in Media, among the Scythian tribes, in the Assyrian empire. This leads us to perceive that the Anglo-Saxon race was the resurrection form in which the "outcasts of Israel" were to appear, and in which they were to accomplish the wonderful predictions made to Abraham in respect of his descendants. In a condition of idolatry the "outcasts of Israel" came to Britain, and formed a portion of the Anglo-Saxon people. At that time and previously, they were described by the Lord in Hosea i. 9th verse, as "not being His people," but in proportion as they are brought to believe in the "seed of Abraham," who is the Lord Jesus Christ, they enter into that relationship with God which is described in the 10th verse: "In the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not My people, there shall they be called the sons of the living God." And after this blessed transformation shall have fully taken place, we have the recent assertion in the following verse, the same chapter of Hosea: "Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land." Now we have seen that the "outcasts of Israel" had a destiny altogether distinct from the "dispersed of Judah;" that these "outcasts" were described by the Lord as "not being His people;" that their subsequent condition is so far recognized by Him as to lead Him to say, "In the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not My people, there shall it be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God." And after these things have taken place, says the Lord, "Then the children of Judah and the children of Israel shall be gathered together." We may now enquire in what manner does common sense lead us to survey this state of things. Surely, that we see in the Anglo-Saxon people the resurrection of the "outcasts of Israel;" that in them all the nations of the earth are being blessed; that although they were not the Lord's people in consequence of their idolatry, yet now, in consequence of their belief in the Lord Jesus as the true "seed of Abraham," they are becoming the "sons of the living God;" and that this belief in the Lord Jesus leads them to send missionaries to preach the Gospel to the heathen in the "uttermost parts of the earth," and also to labor more especially for the conversion of their brethren—"the dispersed of Judah"—whom they recognize not only socially and politically, but with whom they are longing to be re-united, in the bonds of one faith.—R. W. Cox, in Times.

Expositions.

Mark xiv. 32-35:—"And they came to a place which was named Gethsemane: and he saith to his disciples, Sit ye here while I shall pray. And he taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy; and saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death: tarry ye here and watch. And he went forward a little and fell on the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible the hour might pass from him. And he said, Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; take away this cup from me: nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt." Heb. v. 7:—"Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared."

What cup did our Savior desire "might pass from him"? Was it his death on the cross? No, my brethren, for he "was heard in that he feared," and he was not delivered from the death of the cross; but he was delivered from the agony of that "hour" in Gethsemane, which would, it appears, have terminated in death, had not "an angel appeared unto him from heaven, strengthening him." Luke xxii. 43.

It was the immutable purpose of his heart of love to lay down his life for his sheep. John x. 15. "For the life of the world;"—John vi. 51; "that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii. 16. From this purpose of Jehovah's wise and gracious counsel, the Son of the Blessed never faltered for a moment. When his mistaken disciple objected to its fulfillment, he immediately reproved him, as using the part of an "adversary," savoring of the things which were of men and not of God. It is not to be supposed that he himself would ever waver in respect to this great purpose of his incarnation.

1 Tim. vi. 14-16:—"That thou keep this commandment without spot, unrebukable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ; which in his times he shall shew, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see; to whom be honor and power everlasting. Amen." Here is an object to be shown and a person who shall show it. The object to be shown is Jesus Christ. He who "shall show" him is the Father, who is the "blessed and only Potentate," etc. Acts iii. 20. He alone is the invisible God. Jesus Christ has been seen of many of the human race. He assures us that he lives by the Father, without excepting his divine nature. John vi. 57. The Father alone (whom our blessed Redeemer assures us, John xvii. 1-5, is "the only true God") is possessor of independent immortality. —Henry Grew.

The Accuracy of the Bible.

An astonishing feature of the word of God is, notwithstanding the time when its compositions were written, and the multitudes of topics to which it alludes, there is not one physical error—not one assertion or allusion disproved by the progress of modern science. None of those mistakes which the science of each succeeding age discovered in the books of the preceding; above all, none of those absurdities which modern astronomy indicates in such great numbers in the writings of the ancients; in their sacred codes; in their philosophy, and the finest pages of the fathers of the church; none of these errors are to be found in any of our books. Nothing there will ever contradict that which, after so many ages, the investigations of the learned world have been able to reveal to us on the state of our globe, or that of the heavens.

Peruse with care our Scriptures from one end to the other, to find there such spots, and, whilst you apply yourselves to this examination, remember that it is a book which speaks of every thing, which describes nature, which recites its creation, which tells us of the water, of the atmosphere, of the mountains, of the valleys, of the animals and of the plants. It is a book which teaches us of the first revolutions of the world, and which foretells of its last. It recounts them in the circumstantial languages of history, it extols them in the sublimest strains of poetry, and it chants the chariots of glowing songs. It is a book which is full of oriental rapture, elevation, variety, and boldness. It is a book which speaks of the heavenly and invisible world, whilst it also speaks of the earth and things visible. It is a book which nearly fifty writers of every degree of cultivation, of every state, of every condition, and living through the course of fifteen hundred years, have concurred to make.

It is a book which was written in the center of Asia, and in the sands of Arabia, and in the deserts of Judea; in the court of the temple of the Jews, in the music schools of the prophets of Bethel and Jericho, in the sumptuous palaces of Babylon, and on the idolatrous banks of Chebar, and finally, in the center of western civilization, in the midst of polytheism and its idols, and in the bosom of pantheism and its sad philosophy. It is a book whose first writer had been for years a pupil of the magicians of Egypt; in whose opinion the sun, the stars, and the elements, were endowed with intelligence, reached on the elements, and governed the world by a perfect alluvium. It is a book whose first writer preceded, by more than nine hundred years, the most ancient philosophers of ancient Greece and Asia; the Thalesas, and the Pythagorases, Zalucuses, the Xenophons and the Confuciuses. It is a book which carries its narrations to the hierarchies of angels; even to the most distant epochs of the future, and the glorious scenes of the last day.

Well, search among its fifty authors; search among its sixty-six books, its 1,189 chapters, and 31,713 verses, search for one of the thousand errors which the ancients and moderns committed when they speak of heavens, of the earth, of their revolutions, or their elements--search, but you will find none.

The Madras famine has left thousands of children orphans. Most of these will probably come under state care until they grow up, and it was at first taken for granted that they would be educated as Christians; but it has been strongly urged at a public meeting that this would not be right, on the ground that no interference is justifiable with the religion of a child as derived from its deceased parents.

One of the largest gold balances in the world was recently made for the United States mint by Henry Troemner of Philadelphia. The beam measures five feet six inches in length, and is mounted on agate bearings, with a capacity of 10,000 troy ounces (about 600 pounds) in each pan, and is sensible to a single grain when loaded. Over twenty million dollars in gold pass over this balance yearly. The workmanship is of the very finest.

The Restitution.

E. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, NOV. 7, 1877.

GOOD THINGS for October has come to hand, and is filled with good articles. It is an eight-page quarterly, published at Canton, O., and sent out at one cent a number—merely the postage.

THE AMERICAN WATCHMAN of Nov. 3d is received. It is said to be meeting with great success as an uncompromising advocate of civil and religious liberty. It is sternly opposed to all the machinations of Jesuitism, and is worthy of Protestant support.

THE elections in France have not been favorable to the clerical Ultramontanists and their political abettors. Jesuitical ecclesiastics are scheming for the restoration of the Pope's temporal power, and France may be kept in a ferment for some time to come.

THE latest items of news in the papers of to-day, (Nov. 7,) are that the Russians are meeting with marked success in Armenia, about Kars and Erzeroum. It seems, also, that they have Plevna completely invested. The tide of events in the Orient appears to be rapidly turning in favor of the Muscovite.

WE made a flying visit to Chicago one day last week. Called on Elder F. Burr, editor of the Advent Christian Times, and spent a very pleasant hour or so with him. We also called upon Brethren T. Wilson, W. H. Wilson, and Thomas Newman. Enjoyed our brief call with all these very much. We also met our old time friend J. S. Stephenson while in the city.

SINCE our last, Indiana's distinguished Senator, O. P. Morton, has died. The loss of no one individual in public life has caused more regret and sorrow since the death of President Lincoln. He was highly respected even by those who were, politically, bitterly opposed to his measures and policy. He had, as a man of talents, very few peers in the United States.

WE shall give a number before long on the "Scientific and Religious Teachings of the Great Pyramid." We will endeavor to make it as interesting and instructive as possible. It will be fully illustrated. Will probably issue this number the last week in November or the first week in December. Will supply those who did not get our previous number who paid for extras of the same, and others who may send in hereafter.

IN ONE of our clippings Joseph Cook was credited with saying that infidel works, inclusive of Theodore Parker's, scarcely ever passed beyond the first edition. Mrs. Parker, however, it seems comes out with an open letter, showing that her husband's works have some of them passed through several editions. If our clipping was wrong, it now stands corrected. For ourself, we have never seen but a single copy of his works, which we borrowed and partially read some fifteen or twenty years ago.

WILL all who now get our paper please examine the directing slip, to ascertain whether their time has expired or not. Our friends have been trying to aid us by free-will offerings to some extent lately. For this kindness they have our most hearty thanks, and we pray God to abundantly bless every sacrifice made for his cause. It has been an extremely hard year for all religious papers. Others complain as well as ourselves. Personally we do all we can.

OUR papers, just as THE RESTITUTION is to be finished up, are in a state of complete confusion. As we were leaving our rest this morning to engage anew in the duties of another day, our ears were saluted with the alarming cry of fire! fire! To our consternation we found out that the fire was in the front of the large building in which we reside, and likely soon to stop our egress down stairs from the rooms which we occupy. We were compelled to hurry our retreat from the rooms in danger of soon being burned. Some of our books were thrown from windows, which our young friends kindly scaled with ladders. The fire was finally suppressed and we are back in our rooms, but everything is disordered as we fix up our last items for this week's paper. We thank God for our preservation, as had the fire happened during the night we might have lost all, and perhaps perished ourselves in the ruins. Truly our lives and times are in his hands, and the number of our days is with him. We gladly take this opportunity of returning sincere thanks to all our friends for the efforts they made to save our little effects from the fire, had its progress not been stayed.

The Great Image.

We have no doubt that the Great Image symbolizes a succession of imperial dynasties filling up what is chronologically known as "the times of the Gentiles." We also are in full accord with the general interpretation which applies the different parts of the great symbol man, as composed of the different metals of gold, silver, brass, and iron, to the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Macedonian, and Roman governments. But we are utterly unable to see any propriety in placing the ten toes of the statue all on one foot, and making them chronologically longer than all the remaining parts, from the head to the feet, inclusive of both. Our own opinion is that the toes have never as yet been formed. The two legs have been correctly enough represented in the divisions of the Roman government into eastern and western empires.

To have history respond to the prophecy as foreshadowed in the metallic symbol, there must be two well-formed feet with five well-proportioned toes on each; five connected with the western division of the Roman empire, and five with the eastern division. The Ottoman power hinders the development of the eastern toes. Prophecy, to a certain extent, demands a remapping of Europe. Russia has, undoubtedly, an important part to act in crushing out Ottoman supremacy, for at least two important reasons: one of which is, that five provinces may be permitted to become Romano-Grecian autonomies, with some bond of connection among themselves; and another reason is that Palestine may become Israel's patrimony to which the Jews may return to build the unwalled towns and villages.

The times of the Gentiles are, as we think, rightly explained to be seven prophetic times, or 2520 years. Commencing these times with the head of gold where the prophet places the commencement of the Babylonian monarchy under Nebuchadnezzar 606 before Christ, they extend to about A. D. 1914, or about thirty-seven years into the future. This gives time enough for completing the image, and repeopling Palestine.

While the ten horns of the fourth beast unquestionably all belong to Western Rome, only five toes belong to a Western foot. Toes are not as long as horns, and will, in forthcoming revolutions, be fully developed both in the West and East. The formation of the stone kingdom precedes the smiting on the feet, and a translation forms the nucleus of the heavenly kingdom.

Whether the Great Image shall be, in some sense, reformed, and galvanized into life, or not, one thing is certain: every component part, from gold to clay is demolished by the stone. None of these changes hinder the soon coming of Christ for his people.

WHILE there is considerable diversity of opinion regarding the fulfillment of prophecy, we are inclined to adhere as closely as possible to the old landmarks. In regard to this world's future political destiny, we do not find it necessary to differ very much from English Millenarians. Contrary to the expressed views of some correspondents, we are compelled to believe that both Turkey and Russia fill quite a place in prophecy. We do not think, however, that the present war is what Ezekiel alludes to in regard to Gog's invasion. We would be glad to have Brother Werthee continue his communications. Let all who write forbear criticism of others' views. Were we to express our dissent from everything that does not harmonize with our own conclusions, we should be in perpetual controversy. We let our friends express their views freely, and write our own conclusions, precisely as we would if no other views were promulgated in the paper. We are as likely to misapprehend portions of God's Word as others. Much controversy about the king of the north, and the king of the south, may be premature. There may be great changes in the Orient hereafter. Possibly prophecy has not its counterpart in history yet. Syria, Palestine and Egypt may assume quite new phases of government in the future. History has not exhausted every jot and tittle of prophecy. Still we live in the closing times of Gentile rule. We hope our able brethren will not lay down their pens.

Human Tests.

H. V. REED.

To test anything it must be compared to a standard. If there is no standard there can be no test. A human test must depend upon a human standard, a divine test requires a divine standard. Men have formed certain creeds to which they demand assent. Persons who object to the items of the creed, do not stand the test, and must be counted out. Those who believe God and accept his Son as the sent of God, must endorse the message and conform to the items of the Word. The crucible in which men are to be tested is not human, but divine. Men did not make the crucible, they are not its managers and are not authorized to decide upon the results. He therefore, who says that he has the one and only test, must admit that God decides—not man. If this be true, what must we think of those who form crucibles of their own; try men by their standards and accept or reject in accordance with their items of faith?

Each member of the body of Christ is now in God's crucible. Has he any heaven-born right to dictate to the one who made the crucible? Shall the clay say to him who formed it: "why hast thou made me thus?" Do not the Scriptures, as well as experience, teach us, that in a great house there are vessels of honor and of dishonor? The one foundation has upon it hay, wood and stubble, as well as gold, silver, and precious stones. The field has tares as well as wheat, and the prospects are that they will both grow together until the harvest. Men have been trying, ever since Christ was here, to separate the sheep from the goats, but they have made bad work of it. "That day is to declare the result." The decrees of councils, the making of creeds, the resolves of conferences and the whereases of churches have never purified the world. The branches cannot cut off each other: God is the husbandman. The cold spirit of exclusiveness, doctrinal points of non-importance, and a love for the pre-eminence have nearly killed the sweet spirit of Christ and brought forth mildew and death. My brother, hitch your hobby-horse to the nearest post, accept the situation. Let God preside over the world, and let those who are the builders of Babylon, learn the lesson from that king who ate grass seven years until he learned that the heavens do rule.

Exegetical.

"And thou, O tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion; the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem. Micah iv. 8.

The Hebrew combination of words מִגְדַּל־עֵדֶר Migdal-eder, rendered above tower of the flock, occurs but twice in the Scriptures. Once in Gen. xxxv. 21, and again here in Mich. iv. 8. In Genesis it is mentioned as the name of a station or village near Bethlehem. According to Gesenius it is put for Bethlehem itself, and, tropically, for the royal line of David, as both David and his far more exalted Son, Jesus, were born there. The pastures of Bethlehem were famous throughout the whole course of inspired history, and the tower of the flock, undoubtedly, at the first, denoted nothing more than the Tower of Shepherds—the tower from whose summit they could look over the whole surrounding country and survey their scattered flocks while grazing. Not only Jacob's tents and flocks were spread abroad here, but here, also, the "shepherds were abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night," when the Savior was born in the city of David. But David was taken from the sheep folds to feed Jacob, the people of the Lord, and Israel his inheritance.

The "tower of the flock" changes now from Bethlehem Ephratah to Jerusalem and Zion; for the Lord "chose the tribe of Judah, the Mount Zion which he loved," for the future watch tower of his ruling Shepherd. The Jebusites maintained possession of Mount Zion till David became king over all Israel. David wrested this strong fortress from them as stated in 2 Sam. v. 7: "Nevertheless David took the stronghold of Zion; the same is the city of David." Here commences David's undisputed reign over all the tribes of Israel inclusive of both people and territory. In this stronghold of the daughter of Zion the descendants of David exercised dominion over all Israel till the revolt of the ten tribes, and, then, onward over Judah and Benjamin, the remaining two tribes, till the subversion of the kingdom, by Nebuchadnezzar, under Zedekiah, the last prince of David's royal line who reigned in Jerusalem. The fate of this dynasty is thus denounced by the prophet: "And thou profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, Thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same; exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it to him." Ezek. xxi. 25-27. Thus ends the first dominion commencing with David and closing with Zedekiah. But Bethlehem, the site of the first tower of the flock, was destined to furnish another ruler for the tower of the flock, which is the stronghold of the daughter of Zion, the seat of David's royal empire.

Concerning this future monarch of Israel and the world, the prophet predicts: "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." Mich. v. 2.

The evangelical prophet, contemplating the birth of this heir of endless royalty, predicts his future greatness on the restored throne of David in these sublime strains: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Isa. ix. 6, 7. When Gabriel announced to Mary that she should be mother of this wonderful personage, he said: "Thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 31-33.

Equally explicit is the testimony of prophecy in reference to the restoration of the royal tabernacle when David and his lineal descendents were throned. "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in days of old." Amos ix. 11.

The Psalmist says, "when the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory." Psa. cii. 16.

Although the Lord hath "covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger," though her "ways mourn," and though she has been "plowed as a field," yet "the Redeemer shall come to Zion," and "out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem" when the "Lord shall set his King on his holy hill Zion. Round this tower of the flock, as the seat of eternal and universal empire, will the redeemed come "with singing and everlasting joy upon their heads." Isa. li. 11. When our Lord shall return and reign, when the "kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem then the first dominion that was overturned when Zedekiah went into captivity, will be restored to the "tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion." There is an age-to-come, there is a restoration of Israel and Judah yet future, and Messiah will yet be seated on David's throne, and to him will yet be given the sceptre and crown of the "first dominion." The terms Shepherd, flock, and tower of the flock, as pastoral terms, all pass over into the royal relations of Messiah with his people in the kingdom. David became the shepherd of Israel and his throne in Zion became his watch tower, or tower of the flock. The kingdom and throne are to be restored when his royal Son shall reign and the princely tower of the flock reverts to him, as his throne, as well as the first dominion.

With singular impropriety it has been supposed that the first dominion was lost by Adam and is to be restored by the Messiah, but scarcely any position could be more untenable. All the imagery in prophecy concerning the kingdom, from the very beginning to the end is Israelitish, it is David's throne that is in ruins; it is the kingdom of Israel that is overturned, and will remain so till the return of the rightful heir; and it is on David's throne and on Mount Zion that the heir of his crown, throne and sceptre will reign, and that, too, over the house of Jacob forever. It is Zion and David's throne in the Old Testament; and it is Zion and David's throne that fill the vision of the prophetic seers in the New Testament. The city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, to which the general assembly and church of the first born gather, are most intimately connected with Mount Zion. Heb. xii. 22, 23; see also Rom. xi. 26 and Rev. xiv. 1. The first dominion was in Zion; with it are connected the beautiful pastoral and princely figures of watch, care and dominion, and to Zion and the tower of the flock will the first dominion again come.—ED.

Lord's Supper.

Were I able to write anything for THE RESTITUTION calculated to edify the brotherhood, I would like to do so; but we must keep the paper alive awhile longer. If we continue faithful a short time, he that shall come, will come and reward us. If we overcome, we shall have right to the tree of life, but if we fail, or draw back, he will have no pleasure in us. I would like to have some light on the doctrine of the forgiveness of sins. It seems, by examining Deut. xii. 5-13, that God had a particular place where he recorded his name, and there he met his people, to bless them, and not everywhere. Has not Christ recorded his name in the new institution, or, the New Covenant, in a specific or particular place when he has promised to meet his people and bless them? I conceive he has—just in two places, and no more; first, in baptism, his name is recorded where he has promised to meet the alien and forgive his alien sins; that is all. Now he is in Christ, but he must, when raised up, walk in a new life. What next? The Christian must meet Christ where he has recorded his name, and where two or three are met together in his name. Says Christ, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

Some teach that this has reference to any place where two or three persons may have met together, and call on the name of the Lord, but I can not think that such are within the bounds of the promise. If we ask according to his will he heareth us, and we know that we have the petitions we ask for. Paul, Heb. x. 25, charges the brethren —"Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another; and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." Where are we exhorted to meet? Is it not where Christ has recorded his name, and where he has promised to meet the believers?

Now, Paul again, (1 Cor. xi. 20,) says: "When ye come together," what is it for but to commemorate the Lord's death till he come? The Lord has placed his name in this institution, where he has promised to meet his children. In the 23d verse, he says, "I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, that the Lord Jesus in the same night in which he was betrayed took bread; and when he had given thanks, he broke it, and said, Take, eat; this is my body, which is broken for you; this do in remembrance of me. After the same manner also, he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood; this do ye, as oft as ye drink it in remembrance of me. For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come." Then this must be when he has charged his children to assemble together, and not to forsake it as some had already done. Why? Because he has recorded his name in this institution; where, if only two or three should come together, and, in his name, break the loaf and drink of the cup he would be there to bless them. Where his body is, must be the place where he has recorded his name.

Again, Jesus has said, "Except ye eat my flesh, and drink my blood, ye have no life in you." Why? To my mind the reason is: because in him is life, and when the alien is baptized into his name, he is out of the first Adam, and freed from the penalty of continued death. Hence, in Christ, he is a new creature, and must henceforth walk in newness of life. The first Adam was driven away from the garden and the tree of life, and thus removed from the source of eternal life.

Now in Christ we look forward to the restoration of the tree of life of which we can eat and live forever. Now Christ is our life. Then we must come to him, that our life may be perpetuated. Where can the saint meet Christ except where he has placed his name or body as the Father placed his name in the temple in Jerusalem where only the high priest could go to receive the blessing? But we are all as priests, and therefore can enter where Christ has left his body, and we must eat of it continually, or we have no life in us. Baptism will only save us from the condemnation of the first Adam, that we may enter into the second Adam, and have life, and have it more abundantly, by doing the things he has required of us.

We must not forsake the assembling of ourselves together, as some do. But for what must we come together? Merely to preach, to lecture? No; but to show our faith in the promises of God and in his Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, who died and was buried, but rose from the grave by the power of the Spirit of God; being quickened and made alive, he lives forevermore, and when we come together around his table in his name to receive the bread and wine, he will be there to bless those who partake as discerning this as the Lord's body and shed blood. Thus the believer, who has put on Christ according to the Gospel, commences a new life, as Christ is the life of the Christian. So I think in the same sense Jesus said, "Except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood, ye have no life in you." A sinner baptized into Christ for the remission of sins, and rising up to walk in newness of life, might never attain that life if he does not obey the command to eat the Lord's supper, where Christ has promised that there is life. "If we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin." 1 John i. 7.

Where do we come in connection with the blood of Christ? Did he not say of the cup, "This is the New Testament in my blood"? Hence the blood of the New Testament is for the remission, or cleansing, of all our sins if we are in Christ.

The Christian may commit sin, and how can he receive pardon only to come where Jesus has recorded his name? John says, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Must this not be by coming where he has recorded his name and put his blood which cleanseth from all sin? I do not learn of any other way in all the Good Book than to come to where he has placed his blood in the New Institution.

I feel this subject has been neglected, and by many misunderstood, by thinking that God will forgive all sins, in any place and condition, by prayer, whether before or after baptism, instead of in the way and place that he has appointed.

May some more able pen give us the truth upon this subject.

LONDON, November 6.—The investment of Plevna is complete. The Russians are clearing not only the Sophia road, but all approaches from the Balkans. A Turkish relieving army would have to fight its way up to Plevna step by step.

LONDON, November 6—5 a. m.—By the occupation of the heights near Dubnik the Russians command the Turkish tete-du-pont over the Vid, which is the only means of egress from Plevna on the south and west.

LONDON, November 5.—A Russian official dispatch, dated Vezinky, November 4, says: "Kars is closely invested. To-day we commenced the erection of siege batteries opposite the southeastern fort."

The Turks are generally much more confident.

LONDON, November 6—5 a. m.—An Erzeroum dispatch, dated Monday, says: "A severe attack was made today on the Turkish positions. There was fighting along the whole line. After ten hours' engagement, the Turkish center was driven in, and the Turks compelled to fall back. Mukhtar Pasha was slightly wounded."

Russian forces from Arduhan have entered the Western Euphrates valley, endangering the line of communication between Batoum and Erzeroum, and Erzeroum and Trebizond.

Editor Restitution:—I am happy to learn from THE RESTITUTION that the cause of truth is prospering in some parts, if not here in Hamilton. Many here, I am sorry to say, who once professed the truth, have made shipwreck of the faith and turned after the many errors that have sprung up—some after one thing, and some after another, so that we have but few left to gather around our Master's table when the first day of the week comes. But thanks be to our Heavenly Father that there are a few faithful and zealous ones who hold fast the truth, whatever may oppose, and who are always at their post, striving to have their loins girt about with truth, and their lights burning, looking for the soon-coming of their Redeemer, when their hearts will no longer be saddened with the desertion of false brethren. Then the true and faithful ones, who hold fast unto the end, will meet in a loving band to part no more forever. There all toil, pain, sickness, and death, will be forever gone. These things, dear brethren, are worth striving for a few short days longer. For my part, I do fully believe that our long looked for Master is soon coming to gather his scattered followers, and may we all stand ready to meet him, is the humble prayer of your sister in the Anointed.

Hymn.

HENRY DOWNTON.

O thou, my heart's best treasure!
O friend unrecognizable!
Sweet spring of ceaseless pleasure
For all who love thee well!
Take of my heart possession,
And rule it alone therein,
Then, whose dear cross and passion
Have saved me from my sin.

Joy of my life! thou leadest
My soul with living bread;
And to faith's sight on Olivet,
And richest drops are shed.
When tired and faint I languish,
By thee the weak is strong,
And in my night of anguish
I tune my loudest song.

Ah! pour on me thy favor,
Rich fount of love and grace;
Around me shine forever,
Great Sun of Righteousness!
Without thy souls preserving,
Late were but death to me;
But in thy presence living
True light and life I see.

My heart, in closest union
With thine, dear Lord, made one,
Finds here in sweet communion,
Its heaven on earth begun:
Better than Eden's breathing,
Safe in thy love to be,
Than heaven's own fragrance breathing
If heaven were void of thee!

Report of Union Conference Held at Galesburgh, Mich., Oct. 25th to 29th, 1877.

Called to order by Brother Berry, pastor of the church at Galesburgh.

After a few remarks from Brother Crozier, Brother James Ferriss, of Buchanan, was elected chairman, and Brother Berry secretary.

The following ministers were present: James Ferris, O. R. L. Crozier, C. D. Berry, J. R. Preston, A. N. Seymour, E. Miller; also Sisters M. A. Seymour and M. E. King.

Letters were received from C. F. Sweet, Albion, N. Y., John Bower and E. B. Scott, Northern Michigan.

The committee, appointed last April to confer together and with others in regard to a better union among Adventists, reported through their chairman, Brother Crozier. The report was accepted, and after a critical reading, adopted.

The subject of permanent organization occupied some of our time. We finally decided to meet next January, —exact time to be noticed in the papers,—at Burlington, Calhoun county, Michigan.

A resolution was passed requiring the secretary to send the minutes of this meeting to THE RESTITUTION, Times, and Crisis.

A vote of thanks was also passed for Brother Crozier, for his labors in the past; also one by the visiting brethren to the brethren and sisters of Galesburgh, for their warm reception.

Committee to locate time and place, and call the next meeting,—Brethren Crozier, Seymour, and Bristol.

Our meetings throughout were characterized by warm love and earnest devotion, and as we listened to the strong reasonings and tender appeals, we felt it was "good to be here," and finally, as we gathered around our Elder Brother's table in remembrance of him, our hearts were saddened with the thoughts of his sufferings and agony as he drank the bitter cup in Gethsemane, and bore the rugged cross of calvary, pouring out his soul an offering unto God for us; but then the glorious "till he be come" sounded on our ears like the glad notes of victory, and we were led to look forward to the glad morn when we should behold him in his beauty and "be made like him," when never more we should take the parting hand—when we nevermore shall say farewell, nor take the parting hand.

C. D. BERRY, Secretary.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Your committee appointed at the Galesburgh conference in April last, to confer together and with others, in regard to a better union among Adventists, would respectfully report that they are conscious of having quite inadequately served the object of their appointment.

We could hardly expect to add anything on a subject that has engaged the most earnest attention of the best Christian minds for the last fifty years. It may, however, be well to "stir up the minds" of our Advent brethren, by way of remembrance.

In our zeal for special truths of great importance, which had been forgotten by the Church, we may not have given sufficient prominence to Christian oneness so earnestly desired by the Savior. Such oneness certainly is not impracticable, nor unimportant, else Jesus would not have required it. It would be unfortunate if we should neutralize the great Gospel facts we have been permitted to discover and publish, by a factious spirit among ourselves, among whom others may rightly claim that those facts should show their first and best fruits. It seems fair to expect that those who have most of divine truth shall possess and show most of the spirit of Christ, and that all who hope to be one happy and immortal company in a very short time, will in their religious intercourse show a tender affinity for each other now.

It may help toward a co-operation if we recognize the fact that we are united. A substantial union exists among the different families of Adventists. High as strife may rise among them, the tie that binds them together in sympathy and work is stronger than all impulses that drive them asunder. The elements of this union are many and obvious, some of which are:

1. A clear perception of a personal Savior, Jesus Christ.

2. Of a literal resurrection.

3. His second coming and its nearness.

4. The judgment—with immortality and eternal life for the saints; and punishment, by destruction, for the wicked, at his coming.

5. The earth the inheritance of the saints, and, as such, "the kingdom of God."

6. The sufficiency of the Scriptures as a book of instruction in religion, without human creed.

7. A personal experience of the grace of God.

Sympathy in so many points makes a real unity, notwithstanding diversities in organizations and operations; the same general work is done by different methods.

In the heat of controversy over the details of these great points, we may forget or undervalue our mutual and earnest faith in these points themselves. This is human infirmity—which should be excused and quietly forgotten.

We can hardly overestimate the value of those points named. A Scriptural understanding of them is a wealth beyond that of the most precious gems—to the possessor personally, and as a means of usefulness to others. May God help us to appreciate and rightly use this treasure, to make it a power for good.

We cannot afford to repress investigation; but free investigation means free speech. This is the very pith of our controversy with the so-called Orthodox Churches. They object to diverse opinions only when they become so vocal as to attract attention. If we repeat their prohibit we shall also repeat their lifeless formalism. But freedom is not confusion and anarchy; it is compatible with decency and order—is civil and well-behaved.

Christian liberty is tempered with Christian charity. The bigot may sneer at charity, but that is probably just what he lacks of being a Christian. That is a richer field than any from which he has gained his laurels.

The New Testament abounds with lessons of forbearance. This is to be practiced between the weak and the strong—between the ignorant and the learned. The weak and ignorant must not envy the learned and strong, nor forbid or judge his liberty and knowledge. The learned and strong must not perplex the weak and ignorant with what he cannot understand. Both are Christians; both are in Christ—the one not for his knowledge, nor the other for his scruple—both for their loving faith. They alike cling to Christ, and read his Word and serve his Gospel to the best of their ability. They are not and cannot be identical in knowledge and judgment; yet they are one in Christ and love as brethren.

Ignorance is not "the mother of devotion," neither is knowledge. The latter, the great expounder of the Gospel says "puffeth up,"—causes an unhealthy growth; (we have seen plenty of it); "but charity edifieth,"—causes a healthy growth (just what we need). Charity is akin to, if not identical with, "the wisdom from above." Compare Ja. iii. 17, and 1 Cor. xiii. Wisdom is knowledge rightly applied. Charity qualifies us to make such application. We make no apology for urging the special study of charity. Inspiration declares it to be more excellent than all gifts and all knowledge and all faith. We cannot rise to the true dignity of the Gospel, nor feel nor use its mighty power, till we are thoroughly imbued with this, its supreme grace, charity. That keeps us steady at our work, little disturbed by the petty annoyances that, without it, might discourage or divert us.

In all great reforms, where deep feeling is stirred, there is more or less fanaticism. Some are quick, some are sluggish; some neither; some conservative—all useful and needful to each other. Earnest criticism is not an evil. It is useful, however offered, but most useful both to the critic and criticised when offered and received in a friendly spirit. These classes cannot afford to separate. Each needs the culture the other affords, and which they can not have apart. One, too, may save the other by patience. It should be borne in mind that the duty of forbearance is mutual. One should not crowd unreasonably; the other should not resist too promptly nor violently. The effect on public sentiment will be much better than separation or repression.

The old maxim, "In essentials, unity; in non-essentials liberty; in all things charity," though possibly not the exact truth, is a convenient formula.

An essential Bible doctrine is one that has no text that can be fairly understood against it. Those things that divide Adventists are certainly not among the essentials, and are to be allowed with charitable liberty, and without division.

Chief among things that have been allowed to divide us are, the Sabbath, and the age to come. Paul, in Rom. xiv. and Col. ii. prohibits making the keeping of the Sabbath or the not keeping of it a test of fellowship or a cause of division. The age to come lies beyond the advent. Intelligent thinkers always have and always will differ in regard to its details, till they personally observe them.

With right morals and candid judgment, the keeping or not keeping of the Sabbath, and the believing or non-believing in the testimonial age to come, do not indicate Christian character. Division on either of these topics is evidence of a carnal sediment somewhere, which may endanger the salvation of its possessor.

Limitation of Objectives. — Many Churches are greatly injured by grievances among their members—some of them of many years' standing. A trifle, perhaps, at first, or mere misunderstanding or misreport, has grown with age into cause for permanent alienation. Would it not be well for each church to make a rule that no grievance shall be noticed unless action be instituted in regard to it within six months, or some other limited time, after its origin?

Let us not obscure, with our follies, the light God has graciously given us. Let us try to build together a power for truth against the infidelity and corruptions of these last days. Let us work together so far as we can; but work if we have to work apart, and put no obstacle in the way of any who are trying to serve Christ. We should not forget that the mission of the Gospel is to save men; that every word of God has saving power in it, and so study as to discover that power, and so preach it that that power shall be effective upon those who preach and those who hear.

Iowa Conference Report.

The annual conference of the Church of God in Iowa, met pursuant to notice, at West Irving, Iowa, on the evening of Oct. 18, 1877. Brother H. V. Reed addressed the congregation; at 10 o'clock Friday, the brethren met for business; Brother G. M. Myers, was chosen chairman, and G. W. Chown, secretary pro tem. Brethren Steffee, Robinson and Callaway, were chosen as a committee on arrangements. Brother Myers then made a few remarks in regard to the union movement with the Advents of this state, and Brother Callaway made a few remarks on the subject of finance, and the meeting adjourned until half past 2 o'clock.

Half past 2 o'clock, met as per adjournment; secretary in attendance; minutes of first quarterly of this year, read. Secretary reports that missionary board are not prepared to report at present; motion carried to proceed to elect officers for the ensuing year. John Steffee, of Victor, president; John Fitz, of Irving, secretary, and Brother James Carr, of Nevada, treasurer, were the officers chosen, after which the finance question was taken up and discussed at length. Pending this question we adjourned until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

At 10 o'clock Saturday, conference assembled. After singing and prayer, minutes of previous meeting were read and approved. The question of finance was then taken up. On motion, the missionary business was taken out of the hands of the officers of this conference. On motion, Brethren Steffee, Fitz and Carr, were nominated as a missionary board; an amendment was offered, adding Brother Levi Marsh to the board, which was adopted. On call of the previous question, the above named brethren were chosen as a missionary board for the ensuing year. The resolution to adopt the ad valorem system of raising fund was voted down. We then adjourned until half past 2 o'clock.

Met at half past 2 o'clock; minutes of previous meeting read and approved, after which a resolution was adopted that we contribute by voluntary contribution and subscription, as the Lord has prospered us, for missionary purposes. The secretary then reports that the missionary board have expended all the means at their disposal principally at Marysville, Benton county, having employed Brother J. T. Prine, under whose efforts a congregation of between thirty and forty believers has been organized. The remainder of said funds was paid to Brother Prine with the understanding that he visit the brethren at Rock Creek, Jasper county, Iowa. Before this conference convened, the treasurer being absent, the exact amount expended at each point, I am unable to give. It has been the intent, however, of the board to concentrate their efforts on one or two points until they become self supporting.

Reports were then had of Brother Reed, of Indiana, Brother Callaway, of Mission, and Brother Elliott, of Lamark, Illinois; also Brother Culy of Tipton Grove, this state, in reference to the cause of truth in their respective localities. Brother Brayton and Brother Reed, called attention to the padlock that appeared in the World's Crisis lately, designed for the speaking brethren who dare entertain the age to come doctrine so called. Our brethren look on this effort as having the same effect as damming a water-course, viz.: To concentrate and utilize a dormant power.

Committee recommend that our next conference be held at Rock Creek, Jasper county, Iowa, commencing Thursday evening, February 14, 1878.

During the last session one hundred and eighteen dollars and a half were pledged for the mission work of this year. The conference then adjourned. May the above amount be largely augmented so as to enable the board to carry forward the good work. Our conference was very well attended, but fell far short of what was expected, owing to the inclement weather. Brother H. V. Reed supplied all the preaching, except one discourse from Brother Brayton. Only those who know these brethren, can appreciate the good things brought forward for our consideration. During Brother Reed's stay with us, five intelligent believers were added to the church here. May they hold fast the beginning of their confidence to the end, is our prayer.

JOHN FITZ, Secretary.

The Blessed Gate.

There is a gateway at the entrance of a narrow passage in London, over which is written, "No burdens allowed to pass through." And there is another gate through which no burdens will ever pass: it is the gate of pearl. And there is another city into which this gate leads: it is the city New Jerusalem. London is the city of man; Jerusalem the city of God. London is the city of Time; Jerusalem the city of Eternity. There is sorrow and sin in London; there is neither in the holy city. There is death in London; there is no death in Jerusalem the golden. London is two thousand years old; Jerusalem is the city of unnumbered years. London has four millions of people dwelling within her precincts; Jerusalem will have a multitude that no man can number. London will go down in the crash of the earth's fiery doom; Jerusalem will stand forever and ever. Which city do you prefer?

And after all, mortals do carry their burdens through that London gate. These burdens may not be visible to the eye, but nevertheless the sore, sad, stricken heart bears them, and they are many. Beneath the weight of these burdens, men stoop, and their steps falter. Into that mighty city day and night, men and women bear heavy burdens, as crushing that they would fain fling them at their feet but they cannot. But no burdens will pass the gate of the better, the enduring city: the burden of evil, the burden of grief, the burdens of hearts so broken as never in time to be healed, the countless burdens of the world's long dreary night,—none of these can enter there. All will be laid down forever at the beautiful gate. Into the light of a long, sweet home, into the breast of a glad, glorious welcome, into the air of the eternally blessed, they will pass who cross that threshold, and are enfolded within. O blessed gate! Towards thy ever open portals we onward press. Holy Bridegroom, we beseech thee, let us in!

Roll back on your hinges, ye jeweled doors,
Till our souls shall your beauty know;
Till heaven bursts through her starry floors,
And strews all her lights below.
Till the glow of a thousand suns comes down,
And the sheen of a silver flood
Shall deck our sad earth like a golden crown,
Till it flames like the hill of God.

Putting Children to Bed.

Not with a reproof for any of that day's sins of omission or commission. Take any other time but bedtime for that. If ever you heard a little creature sighing and sobbing in its sleep you could never do this. Seal their closing eyelids with a kiss and a blessing. The time will come all too soon when they will lay their heads upon their pillows lacking both. Let it be then at least a sweet memory of a happy childhood, of which no future sorrow or trouble can rob them. Give them their rosy youth. Nor need this involve wild license. The judicious parent will not so mistake my meaning. If you have ever met the man or woman whose eyes have suddenly filled when a little child has crept trustingly to its mother's breast, you may have seen one in whose childhood's home Dignity and Severity stood where Love and Pity should have been. Too much indulgence has ruined thousands of children; too much love, not one.

THE CHURCH AT CLEVELAND, OHIO.

The brethren of the true Faith assembling here desire it to be made known that we meet at Beck's Hall, corner of Case and Woodland avenues, every First day of the week at 11 o'clock a.m.

Shall be glad to see those of like precious faith at any time—Especially Brother H. V. Reed or Brother A. N. Seymour. Come to any of the following addresses, and you will be always sure of a hearty welcome.

E. S. Cottrell, 160 Forest Street, Cleveland.
Robert Mitchell, near Bridge House, Newburgh.
A. F. Jones, cutter of Union and Miscegenie Sts., Newburgh.

DAVID C. HAY,
Secretary for the Church.

Cleveland, Ohio, October 13, 1877.

NOTICE.

Our next conference will be held in November, to begin on Friday before the second Sunday in the month, or Nov. 9, 1877. This is a special call to all, as we want to see if we can put an evangelist in the field to travel all the time. In this way we believe much good can be done. The call is to be blown at South Branch, school house, Hurley county; Updegraff Creek, Wilson county; to three in Tuffs' tp., Lafayette Co.; Cherokee Co., Neosho Co., Montague Co., no. Lafayette Co. Let all the preaching brethren come, and spread their counsel. Hickle, Kinney, Owen, Lawyer, Wilcox, Hayden Stringer, B. H. Ward, Harlan, Pine, and if I have overlooked any let them be our brother, or it will be a free unwilling for all. I do think it will pay for you to come. If not in great luck, as Brother Stringer says, yet in encouragement to you. So, come one, come all; get us have a good time once more. I would not have asked the two last conference meetings for any consideration. Kennedy, Nov. 2, 13, 11, 1877.

The above conference will be held at the Grady School House on Mc Creek, ten miles northwest of Erie, Neosho county, Kansas.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the Nature of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Hexham, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Church of Christ, Bethnal Green. The proposition discussed was: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after the decease. Affirm-ed by W. C. H. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever, and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth lettered boards, well bound, 350; postage 10c. Paper cover 30c; postage 5c.

Herodian on the Nature of Jesus Considered. By Rev. R. Constable, of A late Presbytery of Cork, Ireland, 350 pp. An elaborate argument touching the position held by the ancients. It is particularly fine in its philosophical chapters respecting the morality of the Greek word used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 18c.

"We hail this book with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, is very dear and precious, for it has held of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance.... We must also congratulate the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present all the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will fully be made more than re-covered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this painfully misapprehended department of Christian theology."—The Rainbow.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 56 oldface. Price $1.75; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"The quotable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state, and the present book is the result of his large exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by a lucid treatment, a keen style, and a clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

It is characterized by intensity and vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I., May to December, edited by W. Kelloway. The only English work up that advocates the ancient Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the most progressive views on the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $3.75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II., January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $1.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written. Indeed we know of none other to every way so well adapted to show the necessity of substituting the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be a sad loss indeed, we would be grieved, if the little page bore any name instead of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so original, so forcible, so convincing, it would be hard to guess where an excuse will exist. Every body should possess a copy."—Ed. Bible Echo.

Requiescat in Pace.

J. E. RANKIN.

Sleep here in peace!
To earth's kind bosom do we fearful take thee;
No mortal sound awaits from foot shall wake thee;
No fever-heat, no grief that needs assuaging,
No tempest-burst, all earthly load-defying.
Sleep here in peace!

Sleep here in peace!
No more thou'lt know the sun's glad morning shining,
No more the glory of the day's declining;
No more the night that stoops serene above thee,
Watching thy rest, like tender eyes that love thee.
Sleep here in peace!

Sleep here in peace!
Unknown to thee the spring will come with blessing,
The turf above thee in soft verdure dressing;
Unknown will come the autumn rich and mellow,
Sprinkling thy couch with foliage golden-yellow.
Sleep here in peace!

Sleep here in peace!
This is earth's rest, for all her broken-hearted,
Where she has garnered up our dear departed;
The prattling babe, the wife, the old man hoary,
The tired of human life, she crowned with glory.
Sleep here in peace!

Sleep here in peace!
This is the gate for thee to walk immortal;
This is the entrance to the pearly portal;
The pathway trod by saints and sages olden,
Whose feet shall walk Jerusalem the golden!
Sleep here in peace!

Sleep here in peace!
For not on earth shall be man's rest eternal,
Faith's morn shall come! Each netting sun diurnal,
Each human sleeping, and each human waking,
Hasten the day that shall on earth be breaking.
Sleep here in peace!

Sleep here in peace!
Faith's morn shall come when he, our Lord and Maker,
Shall claim his own that slumber in God's acre;
When he who once for man Death's anguish tasted
Shall spoil Death's gloomy realm despoiled and wasted.
Sleep here in peace!

Selections.

The Ante-Tribulation Translation of Watchful Christians.

BY THE REV. RICHARD CHESLER,
Presbyter of Cork, and Vicar of Middleton.

One alleged objection to the view of an interval between the taking of his saints to meet the Lord in the air, and their return with him to the earth is, that the existence of such an interval is at best but an inference and is no where directly stated in Holy Scripture. * * * This doctrine, which is held by the large majority of professing Christians, can only be gathered inferentially from various passages of Scripture stating truths from which it necessarily follows.

In coming to a right conclusion as to the force of inferential argument in the matter with which we are now concerned, it will help us much to remember that there is not a single passage in the Old Testament which states that there should be two advents of the promised Messiah, one in humiliation and suffering, the other in power and glory, with an interval of more than eighteen hundred years, or with any interval, between. On the contrary, the two advents are spoken of in the Old Testament prophecy as though they constituted one event. An intelligent Israelite could only have arrived at the conclusion that there were to be two advents of Christ by seeing that such an advent as that typified in the Levitical sacrifices, and foretold in Psalm xxii., and in Isaiah liii., could not possibly be simultaneous with an advent of power and glory as predicted so largely by the Old Testament prophets.

Again, it may be worthy of note that at the first advent there was an interval of eighteen years between our blessed Lord's appearance as "the child Jesus" when he attracted the eyes, and hearts, and hopes of many of God's people, and the eventful three years and a half of his public ministry, of which interval, spent as it was in utter privacy, prophecy is altogether silent.

There are two classes of predictions going before the future advent, even as there are two classes of predictions which went before the past advent of our blessed Redeemer, so totally differing from each other as to character, object, circumstances, etc., as to render it, to my apprehension, impossible that one coming of the Lord, to take place as one act, and at one moment, could fulfill them.

The Lord will come "to receive his people to himself, that where he is there they may be also." John xiv. 3. He will come to raise dead saints, and to change living ones, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," and to "catch up both together in the clouds to the meeting (Greek) of the Lord in the air." 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52; 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. He will do this with a suddenness upon his part, and an absence of expectancy on the part of the world, as to the actual time of his coming, so as to find two women grinding together at the same mill, two men working together in the same field, of whom one, being ready, will be taken, and the other, being unready, will be left. Luke xvii. 34, 36. He will come at a time when slumber upon the subject of his coming and his nearness, shall have pervaded his church—even those who had previously taken their lamps and gone forth to meet him; when the cry that he is coming, and his actual arrival, will be so close the one upon the other, as to leave no time for getting ready upon the part of those who shall not have gotten ready beforehand. Matt. xxv. 1-13. "Behold," he says, "I come as a thief." Rev. xvi. 15. Here is one class of passages describing his second advent.

Another class of passages teaches us that "immediately after the tribulation of those days,"—the tribulation which includes the three and one-half years—"the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers that are in the heavens shall be shaken"—(very sure and solemn premonitory signals these!)—"and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven—and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Matt. xxiv. 29, 30. Again, "He shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance upon them that know not God and obey not his Gospel." 2 Thess. i. 7, 8. We have further the description of his advent, Zechariah xiv., when he comes at a time which, after the Jews have been restored to Jerusalem, all nations shall be gathered in siege against them, and when, in the midst of that siege, he descends, "and all his saints with him, and his feet shall stand on the mount of Olives." We have, corresponding with this, the prophecy of Enoch, Jude 14, 15, and the descent from the open heaven in overwhelming judgment upon the last antichrist and his assembled hosts. Rev. xix. 11-21. To me, and to the very many who agree with me in this matter, these two classes of predictions, so totally differing as to the character and objects of the event to which they each refer, seem altogether incapable of being applied to an advent of the Lord without an interval between the two acts of that advent—between (1) the taking up or receiving to himself of his saints in the air, and (2) his coming with them to the earth.

But a far stronger and more conclusive reason for the inference of such an interval, seems to me to arise from the fact that a coming of the Lord is foretold, for which we are solemnly enjoined to be ever and always on the watch, "with our loins girt about and our lamps burning," in the attitude of constant expectancy, "like men who wait for their Lord when he will return from the wedding, that when he comes and knocks they may open to him immediately." Luke xii. 35, 36. A coming is foretold concerning which we are expressly forewarned that it may take place "in the second watch, or in the third watch;" and bidden to be ready, for it is at a time when "ye (his disciples) think not, the Son of man cometh." Luke xii. 38-40. A coming is foretold again with regard to which we read the exhortation—"Take ye heed, watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is;" and further, "Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not when the Master of the house cometh, at even or at midnight, or at the cockcrowing, or in the morning, lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping." Mark xiii. 33-35, 37. That these passages apply to our Lord's advent to the Mount of Olives, during the future siege of Jerusalem—an advent which cannot occur until after the Jewish people shall have been restored, and until the siege shall have commenced, and while it is going on—an advent which cannot take place until the armies of the last antichrist shall have been assembled, and which must take place when they shall have been so assembled—I can by no means bring myself to believe. There can be no watchfulness, it seems to me, for this last mentioned secondary act of Christ's advent—no suddenness—nothing unexpected in its occurrence when these preceding events shall have occurred. I, for my own part, deeply feel that I could no more be at present watchful for, or expectant of his advent, as my Lord enjoins and requires of me to be, were I to regard the restoration of the Jews—the gathering of the nations against Jerusalem—the fall of the mystical Babylon, etc., as of necessity to intervene between me and his coming to receive me to himself, than I could now, in this month of March, be watchful for and expectant of the coming harvest, as not knowing the day nor the hour when it would take place. I know that the harvest will come; but I know for a certainty that the weeks and months of spring time with their showers, and of summer with their sunshine, are as yet between me and it, and therefore I am not, and cannot be, as yet, expecting it. An advent with nothing necessarily between me and it, and which I can therefore truly and daily watch for and expect, seems to me a necessity; and in order to such there seems to be manifestly a further necessity—a coming first to the air, and then subsequently to the earth, after an interval, during which many, we know not how many, of the inspired predictions connected with the Savior's second coming shall be fulfilled.

I now proceed to add what I regard as more direct Scriptural evidence to the fundamental arguments which I have already adduced upon this subject.

In so doing I shall pass over Psalm xxxi. 19, 20, and Zephaniah ii. 3, as, although satisfactory to myself, they may not be so to others. I refer especially to Isaiah xxvi. 19-21, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead. Come, my people, enter thou into thy holy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For behold the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." Here, in immediate connection with a predicted resurrection of the dead in Christ, we have a summons of the Lord's people to a place of refuge and security, in which they are to abide until the indignation be overpast, and while the Lord, who comes out of his place for the purpose, is punishing the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity. If this passage be not admitted as an evidence in favor of the view of saints being caught up before the tribulation, I am utterly at a loss to conceive how it is to be interpreted.

I pass on to Luke xxi., where, as in the parallel passages in Matt. xxiv. and Mark xiii., the Lord has himself foretold the tribulation, the wrath, the judgments, the fearful signs and portents which shall precede his coming to the earth in power and great glory. In the thirty-sixth verse, after the enumeration of all these in the preceding portion of the chapter, we read: "Watch ye, therefore, always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape" (Greek, to fly out of,) "all these things, and to stand before the Son of man." The Greek word translated "to escape" is, I submit, such as to preclude the possibility of such escape being effected, by being preserved in safety while the last clause of the passage, to stand before the Son of man, would seem not ambiguously to define the nature of the escape as being a removal to Christ's presence.

In exact accordance with this injunction, we read the promise (Rev. iii. 10), "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I will also keep thee from (Greek, out of,) the hour of temptation (Greek, trial,) which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

Again, in Luke xvii. 25-37, we find the days of the Son of man likened to those of Noah and Lot. One remarkable feature in the character of these days we find to be that "two men shall be in one bed," "two women shall be grinding at one mill," and that one of each shall be taken and the others left. In looking for the parallel in this respect between the days of Noah and of Lot, and "the day in which the Son of man shall be revealed," we find that Noah and his family were taken into the Ark seven days before the judgment of the flood, which the ungodly inhabitants of the world were left to undergo; and that Lot and his daughters were in like manner taken out of Sodom into Zoar, before the Lord reigned fire and brimstone on the cities of the plain.

St. Peter, moreover, in his second epistle, ii. 4-9 speaking of the same period, and having, it would seem, these words of our Lord in his mind, says: "If God spared not the old world, but saved Noah, and, turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, and delivered Lot, the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation (Greek, trial,) and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." Comment as to the import of such teaching seems to me to be superfluous, harmonizing, as it does, so perfectly with that of the passages already adduced.

I might, also, very materially strengthen my position by reference to Revelation iv., v., xii., interpreted according to the Futurist system; but having, in a former letter, spoken of the view which I am advocating as one not necessarily pertaining to either the historical or Futurist school of interpretation, but as held by adherents of both, I forbear from such reference, contenting myself with the arguments, inferential and direct, which I have thus far adduced. I shall now proceed to notice some few of the objections which are usually urged against this doctrine.

1. It is urged that two future advents of our blessed Lord are thereby rendered requisite, whereas Scripture speaks but of one. I answer, No; no more than it would require two visits of our gracious sovereign Queen Victoria to Ireland to enable her first to anchor with her accompanying squadron off the harbor of Kingstown, there to receive and entertain a deputation from the citizens of Dublin, and after a interval of several hours to make, accompanied by that deputation, her public entry into the metropolis.

2. It is further objected that in Rev. vii. 14 it is expressly stated of the innumerable multitude who are all have "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," that they "came out of the great tribulation," thus affording proof positive that the church of this dispensation must go through that tribulation. I reply that this great multitude represents a subsequent and much larger body of the ultimately saved, and which stands in a relationship to the raptured saints of 1 Thess. iv., similar to that of the subsequent harvest to the earlier gathered first fruits. It should be remembered that, under any circumstances, it could only be a very small portion of the entire church—that portion actually alive upon the earth at the time of its occurrence, that could possibly go through the great tribulation.

3. A further objection—and the last I shall notice—is that this doctrine is irreconcilable with the statement of Rev. xx. 4, 5, concerning the first resurrection, inasmuch as it supposes a resurrection prior to that spoken of in this passage, and thus makes it to be a second instead of a first resurrection, whereas it is especially designated as the first.

My answer is, that the word "first," in this passage has manifest reference to what follows, and not to what has taken place before. The chapter speaks of two—and only two—resurrections, of which this one spoken of in the fourth verse is the first—that spoken of in verses five to ten is the second. There were, all will admit, at all events, two resurrections prior to either of these—that of our Lord himself, and that of "the many bodies of the saints who arose and came out of the graves after his resurrection." Matthew xxvii. 52, 53.

I regard the first resurrection, or "the resurrection of life" as distinguished from "the resurrection of damnation" or judgment, (John v. 29,) as consisting of different stages. The resurrection of the Lord himself, "the first of the first fruits," (Ex. xxiii. 19;—the wave-sheaf presented on the morrow after the passover Sabbath. Lev. xviii. 10, 11. Then the resurrection of "the many bodies of the saints which slept," (Matt. xxvii. 52, 53,) another sheaf, as it were, of first fruits. Then the resurrection of the dead in Christ, at his coming in the air, (1 Thess. iv. 16,) being the first fruits proper, as represented by the two loaves presented before the Lord on the day of Pentecost. Lev. xxiii. 15-17. The subsequent resurrection of the martyred for Christ, and the faithful to Christ during the brief but fearful period of the reign of the last antichrist, as set forth in Rev. xx. 4-6, and forming a great portion of the multitude spoken of in Rev. vii. 9-14, etc. I regard as the harvest of the resurrection of life—the full reaping from the field of death of the redeemed and glorified people of God, who are to live and reign with Christ in his millennial kingdom. Another party besides the martyrs, and the faithful to Christ during the time of the last antichrist, is spoken of in Rev. xx. 4, "I saw thrones, and they sat on them, and judgment was given unto them;" after which follows the further vision: "I saw the souls of them that were beheaded," etc. These occupants of thrones I affirmed to be, according to my belief, the previously raptured saints of 1 Thess. iv. 16; Rev. iv. 4; v. 8-10, all thus conjointly constituting the subjects of the first resurrection.

I have thus endeavored to set forth as briefly as possible the views which I, in common with very many entertain, and my reasons for entertaining them upon this as I deeply feel it to be, most momentous subject. And I earnestly pray that the Lord may guide us into all truth.

When the flowers are full of heaven-descended dews, they always hang their heads: but men hold theirs the higher the more of the world they receive,—getting proud as they get full.

Consecrated Life.

There are wants peculiar to certain times in the history of the world. The need, it seems to me, of the present time for the glory of God and the progress of pure and unbefitted religion is consecrated life. The times do not lack men of recognized and acknowledged ability, men of liberal education, men who can guide ships, run engines, control large manufactories, men who can command armies and govern nations, but it does lack men, and women too, who can and do govern themselves.

We forget that "he that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city." It is, no doubt, easier sometimes under the spur of abnormal ambition, love of conquest, and desire of gain, to "take a city" than to control these unlawful desires and practice the unselfish precepts of the Gospel of Jesus by "doing unto others as we would that they should do unto us."

Many perish, perhaps, for lack of knowledge, more are lost because they do not live the truth as they know it.

Just here comes in the great conflict between man's carnal nature, with all its natural and acquired wants and appetites, and God's will as manifested in the constitution of his being. This is what that most profound philosopher, Paul, called "minding the flesh." With equal physiological, moral, and religious truth, he says that the minding of the flesh is death. If unrestrained, it sooner or later leads to the destruction of the body and the mental and moral powers. God in his great scheme of benevolence, in which he brings life and immortality to light, placed before man not only bodily health and length of life and happiness in this world, but moral purity and excellence here, and eternal life and happiness in the future world, as motives to induce him to consecrate himself wholly to the service of high, noble, unselfish purposes.

Our bodies may become habitations for the Spirit. Shall we, by improper indulgence of appetite and passion, by unhallowed desires so debase, defile, and blunt our perception of truth and right, prostrate our spiritual faculties as to shut up the avenues by which God's Spirit ordinarily enters within "this tabernacle?" No man can present his body as a living sacrifice, acceptable to God, while indulging in habits that are destructive to the physical, mental, or moral powers. We can not deny that many of the excellent ones of the earth have learned, through physical sufferings, the lesson of obedience. But we believe that he who can, by obedience to the laws of health, not living after the flesh, but after the spirit, enjoy vigorous health, devoting it to noble purposes, best serves humanity and glorifies God. It may be easy under the influence of the sentiment, "Let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die," to barter the possibility of high attainments in the present life, and a glorious inheritance in the future, for a mess of earth's pottage.

Perfection of character embraces more than simple desire to be "saved;" it requires daily, hourly, and persistent endeavor. The low places of selfishness must be lifted up. The sharp corners must be broken off, and the rough places made smooth. Man is not left to struggle for this high attainment against great opposing forces unaided. He that truly turns his face upward, seeking to know his duty as God reveals it, seeking to do his duty as God commands, will find his path like that of the just, "shining more and more unto the perfect day." The day which by its clear light will reveal unto him still more of truth, more of duty, more of divine love and guidance, "Then shall ye know if ye follow on to know the Lord." Where finite wisdom ends, infinite wisdom may begin. Where finite capacity reaches its utmost limits, infinite power may come to give success.

Man's hour of extremity, when in his weakness he breathes the prayer of faith, is ever God's time to reveal himself most lovingly and helpfully, the time when out of weakness he is made strong.

Many persons are deterred from entering upon a course of life calculated to develop their latent powers and call into activity their highest faculties by the fear of failure. They say, "We would prefer to remain in comparative obscurity, assuming no obligations, making no professions, rather than fail to reach a high position." This is wrong. Such persons are exercising a certain kind of pride, or else they lack true courage. You should press forward though you may not attain to the highest position in life's honorable and useful pursuits or professions. Every one shall be held responsible for his one, two, or three talents. You dare not say because I have but one talent I may bury it in the earth. You may not lawfully hide God's money; for you must put it on exchange. You must study your qualifications and the world's needs, and seek to render the highest service within your power. You have an ideal life higher, purer, and nobler than your actual life; strive to live it.

Be true to truth in all personal relations to it. One of the grandest ways in which to testify to the truth is to endure patiently, adhere to right. In some men's hearts are works where falsehood's arts are hid away, and because of this they are unsuccessful. Each one holds truths peculiar to himself. No truth, perhaps, is known by any one but which, sooner or later, he will be called to utter and maintain. Truth is not revealed or acquired to lie dormant. God will manufacture providences for you if you are faithful, but you may not expect such divine assistance if you are a coward. He whose life is hid in the bosom of God shall never fail.—H. C. McElroy, M. D., in Phrenological Journal.

Sententious Paragraphs.

The sun shines even when clouds are darkening the earth.

A true religious sentiment never deprived man of a single joy.

It is not the length of our lives that produces happiness; it is the manner in which we conduct ourselves while we do live.

If there is a man who can eat his bread at peace with heaven and man, it is that man who has brought that bread out of the earth by his own industry. It is cankered by no fraud—it is wet by no tear—it is stained by no blood.

The most trivial circumstances are able to put an end to our gratifications; they are like beds of roses, where if it is very unlikely all the leaves should be smooth, and even one that is doubled suffices to make us uncomfortable.

Love is but a solitary leaf, but neither storm nor blight can fade it; like the perfume that a dead flower sends forth, it is sweet when all the gay sunshine has departed; when all its bloom is past, it has the fragrance of memory; it is the last lingering beam that glows long after the sun and star have set—a refuge from the tempestuous and bereaving storms of life.

Let us gather up the sunbeams,
Lying all around our path;
Let us keep the wheat and roses,
Casting out the tares and chaff.
Let us find our sweetest comfort
In the blessings of to day;
With a patient hand removing
All the lesser from the way.

A strong mind always hopes because it knows the mutability of human affairs, and how slight a circumstance may change the whole course of events. Such a spirit, too, rests upon itself; it is not confined to particular objects, and if, at last, all should be lost, it has saved itself its own integrity and worth. Hope awakens courage, while despondency is the last of all evils; it is the abandonment of good—the giving up of the battle of life with dead nothingness. He who can implant courage in the human soul is the best physician.

THE FORCE OF TRUTH.

Dreadful limits are set in nature to the powers of dissimulation. Truth tyrannizes over the unwilling members of the body. Faces never lie, it is said. No man need be deceived who will study the change of expression. When a man speaks the truth in a spirit of truth, his eye is as clear as the heavens. When he has base ends, and speaks falsely, his eye is muddy, and sometimes squint. I have heard an inexperienced counsellor say that he never feared the effect upon a jury of a lawyer who does not believe in his heart that his client ought to have a verdict.—Emerson's Essays on Spiritual Subjects.

Secret Prayer.

Besides the open return, there is a secret reward of secret prayer. There is a peculiar and present joy in communion with God. The deeper pleasures are the purest and of all pleasures, the purest is the peace of God. To feel that he is love—to draw so near him as to forget the world—so near as to lose the love of sin—is of all pleasures the sweetest, of all blessedness the purest and most profound. And next to this high communion with God—next to this joy of passions lulled, and sins slain, and self forgotten in adoring fellowship with the Father of lights—is their sedater comfort who can pour their griefs into their Heavenly Father's bosom, or who feel that they have hespoken help against coming toils and trials at their Heavenly Father's hand. To know that God is near—to know that he is trusted, honored, loved—to feel that you are acting toward him as a reverential and affectionate child, and that he is feeling toward you as a gracious and compassionate father—there is in this itself an exquisite satisfaction, a present reward.—Ed.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the first "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.

The Great Crisis—Coming Events Foreshadowed in the Apocalypse.

J. P. WEETHEE.

In taking up this vast, interesting, and most intricate subject, we solicit the undivided attention and patient endurance of all, interested in the reading, and in the investigation of such topics. Examine carefully, and compare the view with the original Scriptures, and with authentic history, read us through, and then make such strictures and improvement as you may deem necessary for the cause of truth.

Bear in mind, that Daniel's vision chart follows the pathway of Gentile Empires; John sees the people of God as they pass through the wilderness into the Messiah's Kingdom. As the fourth beast and his rider are the Christian's deadly enemies, they occupy the front to the "hour" of their "judgment." The word judgment, as here used, applies to both agents as intimately associated. (See Rev. xiv. 7, and xviii. 1.)

In our articles on the "little horn," we traced the history of the fourth kingdom to the beginning of its judgment. Where, on the prophetic chart, is the particular locality of that event? In answering that question, associated events will come to view.

The introductory events of the judgment age (now commenced) lie between the sixth and seventh trumpets. That space of time has various names:

1. It is called delay, to teach us that there is a space of time not under either trumpet, but properly belonging to the seventh, but cut off from it for some particular purpose—the finishing of the mystery of God. (Rev. x. 7.)

2. It is called the voice of the seventh angel, because the events to transpire under that trumpet are proclaimed in advance.

It is termed quickly, as it is a short delay between two woes.

We propose to investigate the following proposition:

I. That Rev. x. 6, 7, bring to view such a period.

II. We shall consider the civil, social and religious elements, of that space.

III. Examine the class of agents sent forth to mould and gather those elements to the great and final conflict.

IV. The messengers dispatched to gather out of these corrupt masses the people of God, that they may escape impending judgments.

V. Show that that work is the "finishing of the mystery of God."

VI. Show that the first struggles are national, "nations are angry!" There will be two or more contending national confederacies.

VII. We shall attempt to classify the nations on the opposing sides, and show the objects for which they will be contending.

VIII. That the last conflicts will be between all the powers of earth, and their leaders, the dragon, wild beast, and false prophet, and the "WORD OF GOD" and his armies.

IX. Show that that age is the age of subjugation.

X. That the reign which follows is pure, peaceable, eternal.

XI. The duties that grow out of our position.

XII. Show the differences between the Christian hope of the first, and popular hope of the nineteenth centuries.

As preliminary to our investigations, we shall consider the question: Is Time symbolized in prophetic visions? In all we have yet written we have taken for granted what some deny, the year-day interpretation. We shall present the following condensed statement, as embodying our views on that subject:

1. Scriptures: Do the Scriptures authorize such an interpretation? If they do not, we have seriously mistaken their meaning in a class of texts. The first passage reads as follows: "And your children shall wander in the wilderness, and bear your whoredoms, until your carcasses be wasted in the wilderness. After the number of days in which ye have searched the land, (even) forty days (each day for a year) shall ye bear your iniquities, (even) forty years, and ye shall know my breach of promise." Num. xiv. 33, 34. The twelve spies are here a type of Israel in the wilderness: the time (forty days) is a type of Israel's wandering in the wilderness. The number of spies (twelve) and the time of their searching the land photograph the nation and its wanderings.

2. For I have laid upon thee (Ezekiel) the years of their (Israel's) iniquity, according to the number of the days, three hundred and ninety days: so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Judah. And when thou hast accomplished them, lie again on thy right side, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year. Ezek. iv. 5, 6. Ezekiel is here a type of Israel, three hundred and ninety days, each day for a year of Israel's punishment, beginning B. C. 975. 1 King xii. 28, ending B. C. 585; and for Judah forty days each day for a year. Ezekiel photographs Israel and Judah, one man representing many, one day representing 360 days, or a year, in one case as also in the other—uniform representation.

Let us compare Dan. vii. 25, with Rev. xii. 6, 14.

And he (the little horn) shall speak (great) words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time. Dan. vii. 25.

And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred (and) threescore days. And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time. Rev. xii. 6–14. Daniel and John describe the same agents, the persecutor, and the persecuted. The sun-clad woman symbolizes "the saints of the Most High." The suffering is the same in kind and duration. The saints were persecuted over a thousand years, represented by the wilderness state. That period is called time, times, and the dividing of time, or half a time, in Dan. vii. 25, and Rev. xii. 14, and in Rev. xii. 6, twelve hundred and sixty days.

Time, times, and half a time are three and a half prophetic years, or 1260 days, as we shall learn.

In the first two passages we have agents, actions and time typified. The spies searching the land forty days, typify the children of Israel wandering in the wilderness forty years, each day typifies a year.

Ezekiel, lying on his left side 390 days, typifies Israel bearing his iniquities 390 years; his lying on his right side forty days, typifies Judah bearing his sins forty years, each day for a year.

Types differ from symbols, only in this: types are real, symbols unreal, or fiction.

Agents, seen in vision, are not real. In Dan. vii. 25, a little horn is seen as the actor; he persecutes and has power over times and laws, for a time, and times, and the dividing of time, which, (Rev. xii. 6,) is 1260 days. The horn and its acts are symbols; why not the time a so?

The time allotted to those acts seen by Daniel, is limited to the duration of the vision. The agent, acts and time are all taken from the same scale of equal parts, and are symbolic. But the acts of the real agent symbolized by the little horn extended over 1260 years at least. The vision, therefore, gives us only a miniature view of the horn and his actions.

In a vision, where the life of a beast represents the life of an empire, a short period must symbolize a long period, because it is limited by the years allotted to beasts, which is a duration as much shorter than the years of an empire, as the life of the one is shorter than that of the other. The one is a photograph of the other.

The visions of Daniel and John are scenic representations, or miniature pictures of wild beasts and their conflicts—females, and their actions. These beasts represent symbolic bodies of national rulers; the females represent churches and ecclesiastical rulers. The whole machinery of the visions is symbolic, so far as their agents and acts are concerned, and is limited to a part of their natural lives. Why, then, should not time be symbolized? The miniature picture, as to agents, acts and time, is a symbol of real agents and acts extending through as many years as the vision picture does days. The time of the one symbolizes the time of the other.

ANCIENT VIEWS.

1. Rabbi Isaac Abarbanel's commentary puts a day for a year.

2. A small Hebrew work on Daniel, by all the most learned doctors of the synagogue, says that a day is put for a year.

3. Elen Ezra is the only one who understands three and a half times literal.

4. Abarbanel asks Ezra how then he explains the "season and time," Dan. vii. 12. What secret was there, then, in the number by the angel? Daniel xii. 9.

5. Rabbi Saadias Gaon and, Solomon Jarchi say the 1335 days are years.

6. Mons. De Cheseaux, a Swiss astronomer before the royal academy of Paris, says that "The grand periods, 1260, 2300, 1040 their difference, are astronomical cycles, at the end of which the sun and moon return nearly to the same position."

Jesus and his Apostles applied Dan. vii. 13, to the second advent, as appears from Matt. xxvi. 64, and Rev. i. 7.

The number 1260 occurs seven times in the Bible, and refers to events that could not be accomplished in three and a half years, but have required, at least, one thousand years in their fulfillment.

In Dan vii. 24, 26, we have seventy sevens, seven sevens, and one seven. No mention is made of weeks. We answer that shabuah is always translated "week" in the Old Testament, except in Ezek. xlv. 21. Shabuah in itself means seven days. Gen. xxix. 27, 28; Lev. xii. 5; Num. xxviii. 26; Deut. xvi. 9, 10, 16; 2 Chron. viii. 13; Jer. v. 24; Ezek. xiv. 21; Dan. ix. 24–27; x. 2, 3. A seven of days, Dan. x. 2, 3. Three weeks as to days, not in the construct state, shebah, means seven. Gen. xli. 10, and must have some other word to show whether it means days, weeks, or months. Seven sevens would be seven shebah, and not shabuah—weeks.

"By restricting the word day we demolish some heavy bulwarks against Popery."—New York Evangelist.

Yom, literally day, sometimes means year. 1 Sam. ii. 19. Lev. xxv. 29; Judges xvii. 10; xi. 40; xxi. 19; Exod. xiii. 10; 1 Sam. i. 3. Same word translated day, daily.

Seventy weeks, Dan. ix. 24–27. It is evident that the Jews understood these to be weeks of years, a day for a year. Bagster's note is as follows: "Seventy weeks—that is, seventy weeks of years, or 490 years, which, reckoned from the seventh year of Artaxerxes, coinciding with the 4256th year of the Julian period, and in the month of Nisan, in which Ezra was commissioned to restore the Jewish state and polity (Ezra vii. 9–26,) will bring us to the month Nisan of the 4746th year of the same period, or A. D. 33, the very month and year in which our Lord suffered and completed the work of our salvation."

The seventy weeks are divided into three parts after the Oriental custom. Ezek. xlv. 12. Seven weeks, or forty-nine years, for restoring and rebuilding Jerusalem; sixty-two weeks, or 434 years, from that time to the Messiah, the Prince; and one week, or seven years, for confirming the covenant. The birth of the Messiah at the end of the seven weeks named, and his crucifixion, demonstrate the year-day view.

The Romans reckoned days for years and weeks of such years. Varro says he was entered into his twelfth week of his years, or into his eighty-fourth year. That there are weeks of years will appear from Matthew xxiv. 15. "When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand,)"

It would seem that the making of these weeks literal would invalidate Jesus of Nazareth's title to Messiahship; for if he did not fill the prophetic predictions relative to time, the Jews may still be correct in looking for one not yet come.

There are two kinds of time in the books of Daniel and John. None can read the prophecies, or the books of the two prophets, without noticing two kinds of time at least, literal or historic time, and prophetic or symbolic. Daniel and John make use of one kind, and God, by his angels, another. The distinction is readily followed. No one can have any difficulty that reads with attention.

Examples: The adverbs of time are signs of literal time, such as: now, then, when, soon, until; as, "And they shall be given into his hand until (literal) a time and times and the dividing of time (prophetic or God's time) at the beginning of thy supplications." Dan. ix. 23. "Seventy weeks." Dan. ix. 24.

In Dan. xi. the time is historic or literal, generally; of verse 24 there may be some doubt; some say it is literal, denoting an indefinite period; others that it means 360 years. See also verses 27, 29, 33, 35, 40. See time in Dan xii. 1, 4, 7, (prophetic;) verses 9, 11, (prophetic), verse 12, (prophetic). See verse 13.

In Rev. vi. 1–10, the time of opening the six seals is denoted by the word "when;" no specific dates named or duration is given. The sealing of the multitudes in Rev. vii. has an order, but no prophetic time. The half hour at the opening of the seal, Rev. viii. 1, is perhaps prophetic, as it belongs to the vision. The first three trumpets have an order, but no prophetic time. The fourth trumpet the word day may be doubtful. The five months of the fifth seal are prophetic; it is time given from God by an angel to John.

The time of the sixth trumpet is prophetic, heard in vision, as truly symbolic as the objects seen. Why should the sense of sight be symbolically exercised, or objects seen in vision be symbolic, but time heard be literal?

The time that the witnesses prophesy is prophetic. Days, in Rev. xi. 6, signify the whole period named in Rev. xi. 2. The time is not yet. Rev. x. 6, denotes the period allotted to the finishing of the mystery of God, and is called the days of the voice of the seventh angel.

"Three days and a half," Rev. xi. 9, are prophetic. Hour, verse 13, means time, (prophetic, probably, as it is vision time.) In Rev. xii. 6, "days" are prophetic. Three and a half times in verse 14, are prophetic. Forty-two months, Rev. xiii. 5, are prophetic.

The seven vials have an order, but no prophetic time named. "Hour," Rev. xvii. 12, means during the same time. "Thousand years," Rev. xx. 2, 3, 5, 7, are understood by some to be symbolic, extending over 360,000 literal years.

We have extended our examples to a great length, that we may be fully understood. This method of computing time has been so general that Prof Stuart says: "It is a singular fact that the great mass of interpreters in the English and American world have for many years, been wont to understand the days designated in Daniel and in the Apocalypse, as the representatives or symbols of years. I have found it difficult to trace the origin of this general, I might say universal custom."—Hints, p. 72.

Ireland and Scotland are only separated at one point by twenty-two miles of water, and 126 years ago it was proposed to divert the water from the narrow part of the Irish channel, near Portpatrick, and join the countries together, when, it was contended, every objection against a union would cease. The projector was of opinion that "it might be completed in one summer by a few regiments of soldiers."

A New Phase of Prophecy.

As the general subject of symbolic prophecy has been brought to me in a new phase, "it seems good to me" to aid in our general effort to come to a proper understanding of it. If we confine our testimony to the range of the symbolism, as a whole, and in the light of the facts embraced, there should be no occasion to stumble into error or confusion. The general concurrence of the symbols with themselves, and the harmony of history concurrent with the symbols, make "the ten horns" the appendages of the Roman symbol—"the fourth beast." Dan. vi. 7-20; Rev. xii. xiii. xvii. In the last reference, we have the imagery located and geographized. "The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth, and they, (the seven heads) are seven kings"—seven forms of sovereignty, in Rome; "And the ten horns are ten kings"—sovereignties, Dan. xii. 24; and another shall arise after them"—the Popedom three and one-half times; forty-two months or 1260 days." Rev. xii., xiii.

1. This number "ten" occurs nine times. They, the ten, do all belong to to the fourth symbol, though varied in form enough to suit the variations of history. It follows of necessity that this number "ten" concurs with "the toes," and cannot belong any where, except to the Roman world.

2. The shorter periods—arching the apostasy—the papal power, "the horn that arose after the ten," answers to prophecy, as the impression of a seal answers to that seal. The papal "horn" from Justinian 533-3 to 1793-6, did (D. V.) fill the picture. Townsend gives the lists of "the ten horns" by the best authorities, to suit slightly the shifting scenes that were like "the troubled sea, that cannot cannot rest." Men may assume a standard of their own to which history will not agree—so it was with the Jews at the first advent, and so it was in Korah's rebellion; but God's one great plan rolled on, and will still roll on to the consummation! — now to come "as a snare!"

3. As the appointed time, Dan. viii. 13–19, has had its widest range—2300 years, and is about ending, there is in the prophecy no room for a repetition of horns or toes. Amen!

4. "The entrance of thy Word giveth light,"—God's light—"Without the shadow of turning." Another apostasy—a second disclosure of the foretold horns or toes; their sin, sorrow and Satan; their darkness, delusion and the devil—would wreck the world, leaving no promise for either faith or hope! Why no? Because the promise applies only here at the close of the fourth kingdom. Dan. vii. 17. One fulfillment is just enough at each stage for the one prophecy.

5. This understanding of the prophetic fourth kingdom—of its toes and ten horns; of its other horns rising after them—is demanded by the corresponding fulfillment of the foregoing three—Babylon, Persia, and Grecce—with their specified changes. The historic fulfillment of each and all proceeds on the one line: that is, once is altogether enough; for once is is all that is noted in the Scriptures of truth, Dan. x. 21. One first—one of the second and third numbers, and only one fourth, aural

6. "Westward the star of empire wends its way." The gospel began in the East. It has advanced westward over Europe, west over America, and of late it has lighted on the isles of the Western ocean. Its most signal triumph in our time having been achieved in the Sandwich Islands. But what of all this? Much, every way, because it should anchor our faith. It discloses God's landmark, that no subtlety can disturb, as to the application of this prophecy. The climax seems so plain that there should be no need to formulate it, yet it has become, I think, needful, thus. As all nature teaches that the horns are only and altogether nothing more than members of the fourth beast that bears them, as the image, Dan. ii., is face front!—the feet and toes project in front, and are never made to circle around and back of the upright line of the human form! —half more jots from the heel!

7. "Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you, saith the wisdom of God." John xii. 34-37. Is it not on this principle that objectors to God's plain truth become bedazzled, or blinded, as to baptism, the second coming and kingdom, for which they may, in words, daily appear to pray? So it seems. One came into our meeting, and said, "Christ has come in me!" He claimed the Spirit, but was oblivious to all the sublime surroundings of Christ's coming and kingdom, as seen when we walk in the light of the gospel. His light had become darkness, I thought.

Just such bewilderment prevails as to the appendages and parts of the last or Roman symbol. The horns, and the feet and toes, may with them belong to any other power—to Russia, say, rather than to Rome. Hence the toes of the image may be all around, and out behind the heels, as well as where God made them, in front. But no; God's Word is true from the beginning. It "commends itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God." Amen.

My would-be assailant would have his own readjustment. So of every such one, through all their gradations. Then, how charmingly precise; how beautifully consistent would seem the divine symbolism! But no. "To the law and the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii. 20. This word is high as heaven above opinion, Isa. lv. To my mind a world of presumptuous opinion would not weigh to the amount of one feather against "one jot or tittle of the law—the Word of God."

As Christian prudence and piety, faith and hope, centre in the Word, it seems most safe, most becoming, and most in fellowship with all that is divine, to avoid the expression of "my opinion" against the plain Word, ten times told—as to the fourth kingdom, and its appendages, parts and historical stages, as they stretch on to "the glory that shall follow."

The kingdom of men will have had its whole day—man's day—at the close of the times of the Gentiles—with the last phase of the fourth kingdom. The new phase is only human.

If the Word is to be amended, then that is in order; but while we stand committed to faith in this Word, let us speak that word faithfully. Amen.

J. B. COOK.

Stronger than Death.

Christ's love for men is stronger than death. If it were not so he would not have put on record this promise, made in Heb. xiii. 5:

"For he hath said, I will not, I will not leave thee; I will never, never, never forsake thee."

So Philip Doddridge translates it. And the Diaglott reads thus:

"For he himself has said, No, I will not leave thee; no, no, I will not forsake thee."

All the learned assert the presence of five negatives in the Greek original. God to Abraham first promised, then took oath. Here he promises and then iterates and reiterates the promise. He pledges himself over and over, again and again. Are your feet on this rock, O believer? "It is impossible for God to lie," wrote Paul. In trial, in sickness, in life, in misfortune, in want, in pain, in death, in the solemn hour of Judgment God thus in one verse, five times declares he will neither leave you nor forsake you. I say, Christian, are your feet on this rock?—D. T. Taylor.

Simple Faith in Christ.

The prominence given to faith is seen all through the Bible: Have faith in God—Without faith it is impossible to please God—According to your faith be it unto you—Being justified by faith—The just shall live by faith—Purifying your hearts by faith—Sanctified by faith—Child of God by faith—Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith—We have access by faith—He had faith to be healed—Thy faith hath saved thee—Thou standest by faith—We walk by faith—Strong in faith—Thy faith hath made thee whole—The full assurance of faith—Kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation—Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls—The prayer of faith shall save the sick—These all died in faith.—T. A. Wood.

The unsettled condition of Europe falls very heavily upon Italy, which, already burdened with a taxation most severely felt, considers it necessary to increase her military and naval expenses, in view of what the War Minister calls in his estimates "extraordinary circumstances." These frightful armaments are sapping the resources of the whole continent.

The Restitution.

A. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, NOV. 21, 1877.

BROTHER H. V. REED is now holding a series of meetings at Plymouth during the evenings of the current week, which are well attended, and a good degree of interest manifested on the part of the audience.

PLEASE remember the wants of THE RESTITUTION. If our patrons will remit as fast as subscriptions expire, and friends, that are able, will afford some extra help, all will be well. We intend to issue the Pyramid number shortly.

BRETHREN and sisters sometimes ask us to write on some particular passage in the Scriptures. We should more often comply with this request if we could devote all our time to editing the paper. To take care of its business matters requires so much of our time that we have to write what we do furnish for the paper in a very hurried manner. We hope some one who is a more competent and ready writer will be found to fill the editorial chair of THE RESTITUTION after the present year.

AN advertisement of the Scientific American will be found in this number. It is an excellent journal, particularly for mechanics. We advertise some few papers in order to obtain the current news of the day. One of our dailies is the New York Sun. It is Democratic in politics, but a good paper for condensed information; and we have been indebted to its columns for many of our brevities. We also get the Chicago Evening Journal, which is Republican in politics, but a good paper for reliable news, as it is very careful to avoid the sensational. And we get the Cincinnati Commercial, lately, and find it a good paper for general news. For ourself, we take no part in the politics of this age; and, consequently, neither praise nor condemn a journal for its political proclivities. We have not voted for president, governor or legislators, since 1840. In looking over scientific journals we never read the novel departments. About one half of the matter in the leading magazines is useless to us from being mere fiction. We are eclectic in our reading, and select the useful.

RUSSIA has obtained a strong foothold in Armenia by the conquest of Kars. How far she may extend her conquests southward over Ancient Syria, formerly under control of the king of the north, must be taught by the stern logic of events. We await the developments of Providence. We append the following from the Chicago Evening Journal:

"Since the capture of the Turkish stronghold in Kars, and, with it, the acknowledged close of the campaign in Armenia, the world's interest in the war now centers in Bulgaria. The relative strength of the opposing forces of Russia and Turkey, in Bulgaria, south of the Danube and north of the Balkan Mountains, is stated to be, in round numbers—Russian, 280,000, and Turkish, 240,000 men. Plevna is now the key of the situation, for the time being, and should the Russians capture that, the Turks might as well 'throw up their hands.'"

WE have found in the New York Observer, during the past year, a great many interesting articles, some of which we have transferred to our columns. Doctrinally, we are compelled to differ with it in many particulars, but as a good family newspaper can commend it. Its claims to patronage are comprehensively given in the following: "Economy is the order of the hour, and every expenditure, however small, is expected to give a return in full value. Every family requires one good, reliable family newspaper. If such an article can be procured for less than one cent for each working day of the year, we are not aware of it. A family newspaper should contain a carefully-prepared summary of all the news of the day, both religious and secular; and if arranged so that the two departments may be separated and read by two individuals at the same time, so much the better. The family newspaper should have attractive reading and information for the various members of the household. Some portion of the paper should be devoted, every week, to religious and moral improvement, to current secular news, to agriculture, commerce, markets, finance, to general literature, &c., with a special department for the young. Above all, the family newspaper should be perfectly pure, and free from any contaminating influences in its reading matter or in its advertisements. Too much attention cannot be paid to this feature, when the press is flooding the country with so much that is vile and pernicious. To crown all, the family newspaper should be untrammelled by any affiliation with sect or party, and should be free to give all the good news from and about all the world. If such a family newspaper can be had for one cent a day, it should be taken by every family in the land. Such a family newspaper, in every respect, we find in the New York Observer, now commencing its fifty-sixth volume. Progressive, comprehensive, sound, reliable, pure, it is just what is needed in your household. Send $3.15 for a year to The New York Observer, 37 Park Row, New York. Sample copies are sent free."

Transient Troubles.

Most of us have had troubles all our lives, and each day has brought all the evil that we wished to endure. But if we were asked to recount the sorrows of our lives, how many could we remember? How many that are six months old should we think worthy to be remembered or mentioned? To-day's troubles look large, but a week hence they will be forgotten and buried out of sight.

"If you would keep a book, and every day put down the things that worry you, and see what becomes of them, it would be a benefit to you. You allow a thing to annoy you, just as you allow a fly to settle on you and plague you; and you lose your temper (or rather get it; for when men are surcharged with temper they are said to have lost it); and you justify yourselves for being thrown off your balance by causes which you do not trace out. But if you would see what it was that threw you off your balance before breakfast, and put it down in a little book, and follow it out, and ascertain what becomes of it, you would see what a fool you were in the matter."

The art of forgetting is a blessed art, but the art of overlooking is quite as important. And if we should take time to write down the origin, progress, and outcome of a few of our troubles, it would make us so ashamed of the fuss we make over them, that we should be glad to drop such things and bury them at once in eternal forgetfulness.

Life is too short to be worn out in petty worries, frettings, hatreds, and vexations. Let us banish all these, and think on whatsoever things are pure, and lovely, and gentle, and of good report.

Eastern Items.

LONDON, Nov. 18.—An official Russian dispatch, dated Veran-Kaleb, Sunday, November 18, says: "The Russians carried Kars to-day by storm. The battle preceding the capture commenced at 8 o'clock last night, and terminated at 8 o'clock this morning. Our trophies and losses at present are unknown."

LONDON, Nov. 19.—A special dispatch dated Veran-Kaleb, Sunday evening, says the fortress and city of Kars, with 300 cannons, stores, ammunition, cash, etc., fell into the Russian hands. The Turks lost 6,000 in killed and wounded, 10,000 prisoners, and many flags. The Russian loss was about 2,700. The Russian soldiers made but little booty, and spared peaceful citizens, women and children. General Louis Melikoff directed the battle. During the day Grand Duke Michael was present also. The former entered the city at 1:10 Sunday morning.

BERLIN, Nov. 18.—A Pole has been arrested on suspicion of intending to attempt the assassination of Emperor William and Prince Bismarck. A judicial investigation has been instituted.

LONDON, Nov. 20.—The Russian official report states their losses at the capture of Kars were 2,500. Among the officers killed were General Bellinsky and Lieutenant Colonel Melikoff.

LONDON, Nov. 20.—The Russian forces in Bulgaria and in the Dobrudscha number 280,000 men and the Turkish forces 240,000.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 19.—The Turkish Governor of Kossovo has exhorted the Mussulmans to defend the province against a possible Servian invasion.

The Pole arrested in Berlin on suspicion of intending to attempt the assassination of the Emperor William and Bismarck has been recognized as a forger whom the police had tracked from West Prussia. When arrested he voluntarily stated that he came to assassinate the Emperor and Bismarck, but as soon as he was recognized he confessed that his first statement was untrue.

Another surgeon has been summoned to give hourly attention to the sores in the legs of His Holiness, as the suppurating continues. Professor Van Zotte considers the state of His Holiness' health decidedly precarious, but declares that the symptoms are not aggravated.

Analysis of Prophecy.

I see an article in THE RESTITUTION of September 19th, from the pen of Brother J. M. Stephenson, entitled, "Analysis of Prophecy," in criticism of which, I am constrained to offer a few remarks, feeling assured that the brethren invite criticism, when given in a Christian-like spirit, and knowing that "in a multitude of counsel, there is safety." Upon what hypothesis, or by what mode of reasoning, Brother Stephenson arrives at the conclusions he does, I am unable to say; but to me, they seem to be erroneous. The gist of the whole matter of the prophecies of Daniel, seems to me, to be the period of time they cover, or in other words: the dispensation they relate to. As I conceive it, the whole of the events enumerated in Daniel, are contained in the period of the Jew's nationality, of 490 years; as the Gentile times are not taken into account; and the seventy weeks end when Michael stands up for the Jews, and the dead are raised, (as all will admit,) but as I believe, seven years after the resurrection of the saints and the coming of Christ. There are two little horns spoken of by Daniel, and the one spoken of as the one before whom three others were plucked up, is not the one who was to "wax exceeding great, towards the south, and towards the east, and toward the pleasant land." And here is where Brother S. first starts in a wrong direction. The little horn, which was to wax exceeding great, came out of one of the four kingdoms into which Alexander's dominion was divided, and, therefore, existed before there was any Roman empire. It is spoken of again in Dan. xi. 5, in the words, "one of his princes." Whose princes? The king of the south's, who was to be eclipsed in glory by this, his own prince, who, in the next verse, is called "the king of the north." But the "little horn," before whom three were plucked up, comes out of the divided Roman empire, (not the Grecian) and is the Papacy. It is essential that we keep these "horns" separate.

I think the two kings derived their names "north" and "south" from the fact that one had the northern and one the southern division of one of the four horns into which Alexander's dominion was divided. I cannot, for my life, see any third power or king spoken of in the prophecy, but I understand that the king of the south pushes at the king of the north. I do not think Turkey is known in the Book of Daniel.

Brother S. identifies the "robbers" of Daniel's people, as the Romans. If he will notice carefully, he will see that the king of the north, of the south, and the robbers, are all spoken of in close connection; so if they (the Romans) are the robbers, then are they not the king of the north, and vice versa? The main point is this: There are three kings spoken of in succession on the same throne, viz.: He who stumbled and fell—"the tax-gatherer"—and "the vile person"—and this last person takes away the daily sacrifice 1290 days before the end; nay, not only so, but about the time of his death, or immediately after, Michael stands up for the Jews, and the resurrection takes place.

I guess Tiberius Cæsar will hardly fill the place. Why he is to "stand up against the Prince of princes," see Dan. viii 25, where he is spoken of as "a king of fierce countenance," etc. He is to take away "the daily sacrifice," and then commence the 1290 days, which, even allowing a year for a day, have expired some 510 years, if Tiberius Cæsar is the vile person. Tiberius Cæsar can not be the man. What about these invasions and counter-invasions, plots and counter-plots. Have they ever taken place between Russia and Egypt? for Turkey has nothing to do with this, even according to Brother S., as she is the king neither of the north or the south, but the middle power.

"The angel says," says Brother S., "at the time appointed he shall return and come toward the south, but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter," etc.; and Brother S. makes this the transfer of the seat of empire from Rome to Constantinople, etc.

Now, surely, Brother S. was not taking pains, or his mind was engrossed with other matters when he wrote this; for he makes the "vile person" to be Tiberius Cæsar, who lived and reigned A. D., 8 or 10; and now he changes him to Constantine the Great, and his time 310 years later.

Please note that it is the vile person who "returns and comes towards the south, but not as the former or latter," and surely the vile person did not live 310 years and bear two names? Brother S. is mistaken; the former, latter, and this time, are different invasions during one and the same war, or at least series of wars, between the same two kings. "The former" is the invasion spoken of in verses 25 to 28, and "the latter," in verse 40, to end of chapter. Why was it not like the former or latter? Because "the ships of Chittim come against him, and he is grieved and returns." Did Constantine return and have indignation against the holy covenant? Did the ships of Chittim come against him? Was there any holy covenant then? Notice! that the wars are not between the king of the north and some other king, and the king of the south and some other king; but between the kings of the north and south; those two themselves, and themselves only. But the Holy Land is the theatre of war part of the time, and in control of the king of the north part of the time, who consumes it. If Russia is the king of the north, then, in the light of either circumstances Turkey is the king of the south.

Where do Brother S. and Brother Kimsey get their mythical third power or party from? Is it from the fact that the pronoun "him" is used in verse 40, instead of the proper name? But the pronoun must have a noun to stand for, and there are no other parties spoken of from verse 26 to 39, but the king of the north, except the Jews, who are spoken of incidentally from verses 32 to 35, inclusive. To verse 40, then, we must look for a grammatical authority one way or the other. "And at the time of the end, shall the king of the south push at him." Him. Who is him? The last person spoken of. Who was that? The king of the north, commencing verse 36, "and the king," etc., and ending "shall divide the land for gain," last of verse 39. "And the king of the north shall come against him." Who is him? Why the "king of the south" spoken of in the previous sentence. This is all very plain. If Russia is king of the north, then Turkey is king of the south. If Egypt is king of the south, then Russia had better fight her instead of Turkey, to fulfill the prophecy. If Egypt is king of the south, then in the war between Turkey and Egypt, Turkey was king of the north. From verse five, the whole chapter is a history of the wars, treaties, invasions, &c., of the same two nations, and they north and south divisions of one of the horns into which the Grecian empire was divided. From the beginning of verse six it is all unfulfilled prophecy, and will be fulfilled during the life time of three kings, who succeed each other on the throne of the kingdom of the north. So these things seem to me. I hope I shall not offend by differing these thoughts, believing as I do that it is only by an interchange of ideas, and comparison of views, that we can ever arrive at a knowledge of the truth.

Fraternally yours,
GEORGE C. WARD.

P. S.—After writing as above, I cannot forbear mentioning some facts which are, at least, curious coincidences. Assuming that the sixty-two and the sixty-nine weeks both start from one and the same time with the seventy weeks, viz: a decree given Nehemiah by Artaxerxes 440½ years before the birth of Christ. We then have A. D. 70—470½ years out of 490—a balance of nineteen and one-half years. Of this space of time, the last seven years will be ushered in by the coming of Christ for his saints, and ended by his coronation at Jerusalem as the King of the whole earth. The seven years preceding the second advent will be those, at the beginning of which the covenant will be made with "the Prince that shall come," and during the last half of which the daily sacrifice will be suppressed. God's two witnesses will prophecy, and Jerusalem will be trodden down of the Gentiles, &c. The five and one-half years left prior to these will be spent by the Jews as a nation in their own land.

Now, assuming that the 2,300 days of Daniel are year days, they expire A. D. 1900, the coronation of Jesus. In 1803, the coming of Christ for his saints. In 1886, the making of a covenant with the Prince, &c. In 1851, the restoration of the Jews to their own land, as a nation.

Now try another line of time. "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders." Dan. xii. "A time, times and half a time." From when? From the time that Daniel saw the vision. How ought it to read? "Seven, sevens, and half seven." Seven what? Let's try it at 700 plus 1400 plus 350—2450 years. From 1000 after Christ, to 650 before Christ. Daniel's visions are laid by chronology between 535 and 555 before Christ. The difference between the least and greatest extreme is twenty years; add ½—10 years to 535, gives 545, which would fetch it to A. D. 1005.

Brethren, this is almost demonstrative proof. But it may be objected that the last week cannot lay beyond the coming of Christ. To this I answer: the prophecy leaves it there; moreover, the second and third woe (Rev. xi.) do not come until the two witnesses have finished their testimony, and that is not finished until the end of the three and one-half years which constitutes the last half of the covenant week (Daniel), and which years end with the standing up of Michael and the resurrection.

Again: Daniel tells us of a time of trouble, such as there has not been since there has been a nation, (Dan. xii.), and Jesus speaks of the same time in Matthew, Mark and Luke,—all after the covenant week. Again the saints are to be in their chambers "until the indignation be past." See Isaiah xx. The 19th verse describes the resurrection, the 20th the hiding of the saints, and the 21st, of the Lord's indignation and punishment of the earth. And this is their proper order. The Lord, with Judah and Israel as his war-horse, and battle-ax, destroys the nations and subdues the enemies of Christ, and at the same time purges the dross (Ezek. xxvi. Isa. ii.) out of the Jews, and fetches one-third of them through, thoroughly refined, "A willing people," (Psa. cx. iii.) to hail their Messiah Prince when all seems lost and hope is gone. See Zech. xiv.

Who are the elect for whose sakes these days are shortened? We see them in Revelations 144,000—12,000 from each tribe. But I am rendering myself wearisome to you, and so will close, asking some brother to answer the following questions: What territory did each of the four subdivisions of Alexander's dominion occupy? What portion, if any, remained unabsorbed by the Roman empire? What nations occupy that territory at present? Do the ten toes, horns or kingdoms (the divided Roman empire) occupy all of the original Grecian empire?

G. C. W.

Be Faithful.

Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. Heb. iv. 1.

In looking over the past history of the world, we find that in all ages man has been a weak, erring, fallible being, inclining toward darkness and evil, and prone to wander from the path that leads to God and eternal life. His imperfections are everywhere manifested, not only among those of this world, but also among the most saintly and righteous of God's children. We look with admiration upon characters most worthy of imitation, found upon the sacred pages of Holy Writ, and yet all these, save one—the pure and spotless Jesus—had their imperfections and short-comings, and at times showed the weaknesses of their natures by yielding to temptation. The real and true characters of these persons are given us, so that we may profit by their examples and experience, and knowing the frailty of our being, we may learn to lean upon God for strength to endure the trials and overcome the temptations of this life.

In view of these things, and in retrospecting the history of God's chosen people of Israel, the Great Apostle realizes the importance of impressing upon the minds of his brethren the fact that all are liable to wander from the right way, and consequently have great reasons to "fear, lest a promise being left them of entering into his rest, any should seem to come short of it."

Is there not just cause for fear in these last days, when human nature is frailer than ever, and the allurements of the world on the increase? Then let these words sink deeply into our hearts, considering well this admonition, and taking heed to our ways, examining ourselves daily, so that each day we may be better than the one before.

The promised rest is a glorious one, and well worth our every effort to obtain. And now, as the time draws nigh, and the shadows of evening are closing upon us, oh, let us not be found sleeping, but watch unto prayer, lest we enter into temptation, and that day come upon us unawares. The conflict will soon be over. Then how sweet to rest in the paradise of God! No more sickness, sorrow nor death; freed forever from the turmoil and strife of a sin-cursed earth, and having been exalted to a throne in the kingdom of our Father, with Christ our Elder Brother, and the redeemed of all ages, our cup of rejoicing will be full, and we shall be ready to exclaim, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." 1 Cor. ii. 9.

Weary, waiting ones, only a little while and this promised rest will be yours if you hold out faithful unto the end. Then let not the fleeting pleasures and vain glories of this world allure you from the strait and narrow way, but ever follow that which is good, and "be ye steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

When the following clauses are taken out of our churches, how many will be left?

All who will not pay their just debts; all who are hypocritical; all who are deceitful, and talk about others behind their backs; all who go in debt without the prospect of paying the same; all who are proud and scornful, holding themselves above their fellow-men, and shunning those less fortunate than themselves; all who worship money more than they do their Creator; all who speculate off of the ignorance of others; all who are tattlers; all who sell intoxicating liquors to make money; all who think more of a wicked rich man than they do of a pious poor one; all who oppress the poor; all who are vain and self-conceited; all who make long prayers for the sake of being seen and heard of men.

When these and a great many others that could be mentioned, are taken out, some bodies that call themselves churches would probably be left with few members; and yet the Lord would have his hidden ones, his seven thousand that have not bowed the knee to Baal.

The religion of Jesus makes the true convert cheerful, hopeful, and charitable, disposed to visit the widow and orphan, and to keep unspotted from the world. It does not make one proud and scornful, but on the contrary, makes one desirous to do good, to be meek and humble, and to be kind to all, as opportunity may offer. Oh that we had less pretension and more genuine Christianity!

Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, says that the negro children in the South might, and should be gathered into the Roman Catholic Church. He recommends the establishment of Roman Catholic schools for them.

How Near!

"Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed."—Rom. xiii. 11.

How near, my soul, how near,
The heavenly home appears!
The hour of thy deliverance comes,
The end of struggling years.
How near that end, how near!

Rest, peace, and perfect love,
The end of care and pain;
All earthly losses swallowed up
In everlasting gain.
How near that rest, how near!

How near the latest sigh,
How near the latest tear;
Then Jesus on his Father's throne
In glory shall appear.
How near that day, how near!

Soon shall these earthly scenes
Forever pass away,
And I my Savior's face shall see,
In light of endless day.
How near that sight, how near!

Shadows and earth-born clouds
Now intercept faith's view;
Yet hope, amidst all, expects to see
Jesus make all things new.
How near that change, how near!

A few more nights and days,
A few more fleeting hours,
Then adoration shall absorb
All my immortal powers.
How near that time, how near!

Our Letter Drawer.

Editor Restitution:—Your letter with the remittance from Sister A. is received. God bless the dear sister. It is a satisfaction to know that there are those of like precious faith who sympathize with us in our persecutions for the truth's sake. I have done what I could—and, am still doing—to plant the truth in this region of country. God accepts the free-will offering, and sets his seal to his own blessed truth. He is raising up and thrusting out men into the vineyard. He is the full and perfect embodiment of wisdom, as we can plainly see, by the choice of instruments he selects to do his will and work. We do not see it in the light that H. W. Beecher does, who says the Master made a mistake in selecting the twelve; and that he ought to have gone to Athens. Big men will say foolish things. There is much fungnity as to what we believe and teach. I have a tract written under the heading of, "The Things we Most Surely Believe and Teach;" and am waiting to get money to have it printed. I have but small means to do with, and am very sorry that others, who have large means, have no disposition to aid in saving a few out of a perishing world. How fearful is the judgment that is so soon to come upon a Laodicean church, and a doomed world. O save the remnant!

Am sorry for your poor health; know a little about it; have been a cripple for thirteen years, and am almost worn out. Still I always find others worse off than myself, so I will not complain.

Would like to see the question settled as to who Paul's Man of Sin is who was to sit in the temple of God, Baxter says, at Jerusalem, but there has been no temple in Jerusalem since the one destroyed by Titus, nor will there be one till after Christ comes and builds it. Will the Antichrist sit in the temple in the millennium? I think not. What a pity Napoleon III. stepped out so suddenly. I hope the question will be settled if it can be done with our present light.

Your brother in patient waiting,
NEWELL BOND.

Editor Restitution:—Enclosed is remittance for your paper which you have been so kind as to continue sending to me after my time expired. I shall continue to send you a little remittance now and then, as I am a poor man, but of course the printer must be paid. I have been contemplating a series of articles on the world to come, as I have been a student of the Word many years. I make no creeds for my, but what I have I freely give. I am much interested in practical Christianity. There is a small band here, who have separated from the world, and look for the return of Jesus. We strive to live for Christ. Our brethren here have thrown away their tobacco, and we strive to keep the commandments of Jesus. We not only meet on the First Day of the week to break bread, but we have a monthly meeting for fasting and prayer. We pray for each other, and when any one is sick, we offer the effectual fervent prayer of faith. We believe Jesus is the same to-day, yesterday, and forever. We like some things in your paper. We believe in forbearance and long-suffering. We rejoice here that we see the commission as Jesus gave it, and not as the Baptist church and others interpret it. But as my heavenly Father has had patience with me so long, I must exercise long-suffering toward others. May the Lord lead all lovers of truth into clearer light, is my prayer.

J. EVANS.

Editor Restitution:—I thought this evening I would write you a short letter to inform you of the state of the Church of God near Salem, Columbiana county, Ohio. We number nineteen members, and meet every Sabbath at 11 o'clock to break bread. We have great opposition from the Orthodox denominations, but we are not going to forsake assembling ourselves together as the manner of some is, but exhort each other and so much the more as we see the day approaching. We are living in perilous times, and it stands us in hand to be on our watch tower, that others may not take our crown. The Lord will come as a thief in the night. We shall be glad, at any time, to see any of like precious faith that may chance to travel our way. Any of the preaching brethren that might pass through Salem, will be met at the depot by addressing John Barber, Salem, Ohio, or W. D. Townsend, Boswell, Mahoning county, Ohio, a short time in advance. Let any that may come, stop at Salem.

Yours in hope,
W. D. TOWNSEND.

Correspondence.

Editor Restitution:—The gospel has not lost its power to save. I have spent one Sunday in our town; spoke in Ott's hall. Subject:—"The better country." Jews, Gentiles, Romans, Orthodox, Universalists, Infidels, and some of our own faith were out to hear. All gave good attention to our message. And as they were passing away, it was said that such preaching would make men better. Attended a tent meeting held by the free Methodists at Niagara Falls. Liberty was given one afternoon for any one to speak as they might be led. And I was led to show them, from the Living Oracles, what they must believe and do, in order to be saved when Jesus our Life Giver shall return—preachers—yes, all gave good attention. Have visited Wainfleet, Ont., new ground, and gave a number of discourses. Had a good turnout and good attention. Gave a number of sermons in Moulton. The attendance and interest was good. In this place I gave six discourses last June. Some will be immersed upon my return. Sold quite a number of my books which will preach while I am absent. I have visited the church in Sweaburg. Our meetings were excellent, and I had great liberty in preaching the word. The church are firm, steadfast, united and ready to learn. I had the honor of immersing two young men into the name, character of Jesus our Life Giver. Have visited the churches at Norwich and Burford; had some excellent meetings, and good visits with them at their own homes. I immersed one young lady into the name of the Anointed—Jesus our Life Giver, for the remission of sins. As two men had been among them and received by them as servants of the Lord, who are guilty of slandering one who has broken down his constitutions in the service of the Lord, and whose character is above reproach: Therefore I discoursed on Sunday morning upon Psa. ci. 5; 2 Thess. iii. 5-14. Closed by reading 1 Cor. xi. 26-30, showing the design of the supper, and who were entitled to it, then we partook of the sanctified emblems. Quite a number of the brethren from Sweaburg were with us. In the afternoon I spoke from Col. i. 18, 19. It was a glorious time. All appeared to enjoy the meeting. Some of the brethren in Norwich and Burford are quite well off, consequently they gave me $3.50 for my labors to aid me in making preparations for the coming winter, for which I am very thankful. In Gainsborough, I preached in Bro. McKay's house to a large audience. Had a good time. The meeting was to have been in the school house, but it took the lock-jaw; a woman got the key and buried it in the earth.

I return to Canada in a few days.

The Covenants of Promise.

It is generally believed and conceded, in these days, by all the professed world, that these promises made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, (Gen. xvii. 8; xxvi. 3, 4; xxviii. 13-16,) have all been fulfilled in the days of our fathers. But when we consider that "all the families of the earth will be blessed" through faithful Abraham, the assumption fails to rise no more. For when have all the families of earth been blessed, as all the righteous in all ages of the world are called the "seed of Abraham, (i. e., after Abraham was chosen out from the heathen,) and heirs according to the promise." Gal. iii. 29. Now, if these promises are in the past, at what age of the world has it been that "they did not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, to know the Lord;" and when has it been that all knew the Lord from the least to the greatest? Jer. xxxi. 34. At what age has the Lord stood upon the Mount of Olives and it cleaved in the midst thereof, and part of it moved towards the north and part towards the south, and left a very great valley, and living water gone out from Jerusalem, half towards the former sea and half toward the hinder sea in summer and in winter, and the Lord been King over all the earth, "and one Lord and his name one?" Zech. xiv.

Again, when has this prophecy come to pass that the wolf and the lamb, and the leopard have lain down with the kid .... and the lion eat straw like the ox .... and they have not hurt nor destroyed in all the holy mountain of the Lord, etc. Isa. xi. 6-9; read also lxv. 25 [illegible]; xxxv. 9; Lev. xxvi. 6; Hosea ii. 18.

We can readily see from the foregoing that the promises made to Abraham are yet in the future, and will come to pass after the chosen people of God are gathered from among the heathen and all countries whither they have been scattered, and the people taken out from the Gentiles for his name; and thus agree the word of the prophets, as it is written. After this. After what? After God takes out of the Gentiles a people for his name, and not before, I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up. What is the object of this? That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. Acts xv. 16, 17. This will take place when God makes the new covenant with his people. "Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt, because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord. For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people." Heb. viii. 9, 10.

But we go back to the promised inheritance, and consider that Abraham was a "stranger" in the promised land that he was to have for an everlasting inheritance at the time the promise was made to him by God. We find a wide difference between "stranger" and "inheritor;" while the former is a goer and comer who has no settled place for his home and no title (or right of possession) to any of the land that he sets his foot on, the latter has a right to the land he lives on, by heirship, or otherwise. Now, this is a true analogy of the children of God, who are at this time pilgrims and strangers on the earth, and as the Savior said unto his disciples, "I have chosen you out of the world" (or out of this state of things), and the people of the world. For while the children of God are looking for that New Jerusalem, whose builder and maker is God, and all those glorious promises which have been kept in store ever since the world began. The latter make all that they can of this world's goods and have more than heart can wish.

There is also an analogy between Christ's first and second coming. The first time he came he was despised and rejected of men, and had not where to lay his head. But when he comes the second time without sin unto salvation and vested with his royal power from God the Father, then he will possess the land as King of the whole earth (Zech. xiv. 9,) with all the ancient worthies, heirs with him. Now, if the ancient Christians had received the promised inheritance, they had no need of faith, "for faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Heb. xi. 1. Now, "hope" is made up of two parts, desire and expectation, and if a person possesses anything, it would be ludicrous for him to wish for it again, with the expectation of receiving it. And, according to Paul, "hope that is seen, is not hope, but if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." Rom. viii. And of course, our fathers understood the meaning of "hope" from the numerous expressions found in both Old and New Testaments, as Joseph mentioning the departure of the children of Israel, made mention of his bones, knowing that God would visit and deliver them from the yoke of bondage. Now, we know that Joseph must have known something about the promised land from the above expression, and the fact that he was a just man, and, like Daniel, he was endowed with supernatural power, so that he could interpret dreams, which caused him to be highly favored by the king of Egypt: we therefore think, that if he was so highly favored by God as to exalt him above his brethren, and from his dying words, he must have looked for the promised inheritance in time to come. Now they that act and say such things (according to Paul), declare plainly that they seek a country; i. e., a heavenly. Yes, and when that glorious day shall come, "many nations shall come and say, Come and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem ..... neither shall they learn war any more, but every man will sit under his vine and under his fig tree, and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it." Micah. iv. 2-5; and Isaiah, speaking of the same day, says: "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." xxxv. 10.

Brethren, let us live in this sinful world, so that we can say, with Paul, we have fought a good fight, we have finished our course, we have kept the faith, and henceforth there is laid up for us a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give us at that day, (of his appearing and kingdom,) and not to us only, but to all them also that love his appearing. Glorious day for the people of God, for they shall meet to part no more over on Canaan's golden shore, and to be with the Lord forever, where there will be no more sickness, pain, death nor sorrow, but all love, peace, joy and gladness, over beyond that beautiful river,—fair Canaan's land, where that precious city shall be the saint's home, and there they shall dwell and worship ever before the celestial throne, where they can forever behold their King.

May that glad day soon come. So, come, Lord, come quickly.

"For the night has been long and dreary,
And we are lonely and weary,
Amid the turmoil and the tempest,
Where the angry billows roll.

"But we are nearing the harbor,
Where we'll soon safely anchor,
In that peaceful, quiet harbor,
Where the billows cease to roll.

"Over in that peaceful country,
So delightful, good and fair,
Where we shall dwell and worship ever,
The King of all eternity."

Fraternally submitted,
J. M. HARLAN.

"In Every Thing."

There is nothing that interests you that is too little to confide to your God in the solitude of closet prayer. You may enter into your chamber, and shut your door, and, secure of a kindly hearing, you may tell your Father which is in secret of little things that worry and vex you, and retard you in your spiritual life, which are yet so little that you would be ashamed to confess to your nearest friend how great a space they filled up in your heart. Fix it in your mind that there is no duty, however small, which we can perform without God's grace, no trial that we can endure without his aid; no enemy that we can defeat unless the Captain of our salvation speaks to us the conquering word. Let us ever lay our wants before him; and find in his presence the remedy for all our anxieties and our fears; so shall we be careful for nothing, while in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving we let our "requests be made known unto God."

The study of nature alone is ever revealing more mysteries than it solves. At every step the darkness grows faster than the light. The soul can not rest in this. It would know the meaning of nature. It earnestly asks, what is it all about? The inquiry itself is a religious one, and religion alone can furnish the answer.

The Altar of Sacrifice.

We, the undersigned, having the good of the cause of God at heart, and believing that it is our duty to sustain the gospel with our means as well as our tongues, and believing that God will bless for all the sacrifice we make in behalf of the truth, agree to pay the amount specified over our names for the purpose of freeing the Restitution from debt, and sending it out as a messenger of truth in these closing days of darkness, and to comfort those who are walking in the light of him:

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Bradshaw, Congregational minister, and W. Kellaway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, irrecusible, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 45c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 30c; postage 6c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A. late Prebendary of Cork, Ireland, 320 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly fine in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 10c.

"We hail this book with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has laid hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance.....We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will speedily be made more than recovered by the large sale of a work which can take a standard place in this painfully misunderstood department of Christian theology.—The Inquirer.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 30 edition. Price $1.25; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by the best learning, keen logic, and a clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrine propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual rigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I., May to December, edited by W. Kellaway. The only English weekly that advocates the original Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing the best papers and discussions on vital matters, and the news concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $2.75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II., January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III., July to September, 1875. This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 3 months of last year, is $2 65.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Equity Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the gardener, and the housekeeper. 224 pp. Price 50c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Earnest Words for Heart Baptist. Nearly 200 pp. Well printed on heavy toned paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 60c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of the kind that could be written; indeed we know of none better in every way so pleasing to those whose the necessity of applying the Bible as a strict rule from God. We would be more than content, we would be proud, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and accomplished lady, the author ess. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a great work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so original, so forcible, so convincing, it would be hard to point where its services filled. Everybody should possess a copy."—The Bible Echo.

Early Morning Rest. [illegible] supply for repeated. Price paper covers, 50 cloth 75c.

Price $ [illegible] Extra tinted leg. $

"I Know My Sheep."

John x. 14.

Thou knowest, Lord, the weariness and sorrow
Of the sad heart that comes to Thee for rest;
Cares of to-day, and burdens of to-morrow,
Blessings implored, and sins to be confessed,
I come before Thee at Thy gracious word,
And lay them at Thy feet.—Thou knowest, Lord.

Thou knowest all the past,—how long and blindly
On the dark mountains the lost wanderer strayed;
How the good Shepherd followed, and how kindly
He bore it home upon His shoulder laid,
And healed the bleeding wounds, and soothed the pain,
And brought back life, and hope, and strength again.

Thou knowest all the present,—each temptation,
Each toilsome duty, each foreboding fear;
All to myself maligned or misrepresented,
Or to beloved ones than self more dear:
All pensive memories as I journey on,
Longing for vanished smiles and voices gone.

Thou knowest all the future,—glooms of night
By storms of cloud too quickly overcast;
Hours of sweet fellowship and parting anguish,
And the dark river to be crossed at last.
Oh, what could confidence or hope afford
To tread that path, but Thine—Thou knowest, Lord.

Thou knowest not alone as God, all-knowing,
As mere our mortal weakness Thou hast proved;
On earth, with purest sympathies o'erflowing,
O Savior, Thou hast wept and Thou hast loved;
And love and sorrow still to Thee may come,
And find a hiding-place, a rest, a home.

Therefore I come, Thy gentle call obeying,
And lay my sins and sorrows at Thy feet,
On everlasting strength my weakness staying,
Clothed in Thy robe of righteousness complete.
Then rising and refreshed I leave Thy throne,
And follow on to know as I am known.

Selections.

The Coming of Christ for His Saints.

The last words of Jesus to his Church are, "Surely I come quickly;" and, for eighteen hundred years, the response has rolled heavenward, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." For this he ever bids us to be on the alert, warning us, "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father. Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is. For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch. Watch ye therefore: for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning: lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch." (Mark xiii. 32 37.)

Let us go back in thought over eighteen centuries, as we turn our eyes eastward, to the now ruined city of the Great King; and there let us take the road to Bethany. A little before us, we perceive a group of men, walking slowly, as they listen, with breathless attention, to the words which fall from the lips of One in the centre. As we approach them, a thrill of joy runs through our hearts; for in him we recognize our beloved Lord. He soon tells us that he is going to ascend to his and our Father; but, he adds, seeing the sorrow depicted on the countenances of his beloved disciples, "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go to prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." (John xiv. 2, 3.) He then leads us out to the Mount of Olives. And now what a touching scene presents itself! The parting of Jesus with his loved ones! No tongue nor pen can tell that farewell parting for the "little while." "And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." (Luke xxiv. 51.) "And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven." (Acts i. 10, 11.) This, then, is how he will come. O wondrous, blessed, glorious promise! Trembling one, why those fears? Eighteen hundred years of glory, amidst which angels and archangels prostrate themselves before him, has not changed his love for us, his poor friends. Oh, no! He comes again; the "same Jesus," in all points, as he went away. This the angelic prophecy distinctly asserts: "This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Would you be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless? would you see him in his beauty? Would you be one of those who shall be "changed, in the twinkling of an eye," and, together with the risen saints, be caught up to meet him in the air? Would you feel his warm embrace, see his smile, and hear those loving words of welcome, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant?" O then, be ready: watch and pray; "for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."

This, then, is the first act in his second coming, and is to be distinguished from his coming in "flaming fire" at the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. (2 Thess. i. 8.) In the first, he comes in love and mercy, to take away his saints from the dread terrors of "the great tribulation," according to his promise: "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from" [not through, but "out of"] "the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." (Rev. iii 10.) In the second, after having presented his body, a glorious Church, without spot, or any such thing, before the throne of the Eternal, with exceeding joy, and the celebration of the marriage supper, he comes, with his saints, according to the prophecy of Zechariah, "The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee." (Chap. xiv. 5.) Observe: he comes attended with his saints, clearly showing they have previously been removed, clothed in a vesture "dipped in blood." His eyes are "as a flame of fire," and "on his head" are "many crowns," and "on his vesture and on his thigh a name is written, King of kings, and Lord of lords." He comes for the deliverance of his people the Jews, to destroy the Antichrist and the false prophet, together with his followers, to bind Satan in the abyss, "that he should deceive the nations no more" for a thousand years, and to inaugurate his own beneficent and glorious reign, as King over the whole earth. Then shall the heavens rejoice, and the earth shall be glad, and the sea shall roar and the fulness thereof. Then shall the fields be joyful, and all the trees of the forest shall clap their hands for very joy, and the mountains and the hills shall break forth into singing; for Jehovah Jesus will judge the world with righteousness, and the nations with his truth.

To be kept from this coming "hour of temptation" was the hope of the Thessalonian Church. In his first epistle to them, Paul tells us how they turned "to God from idols, to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." (Chap. i. 9, 10.) Would it not have been better for them if they had prepared for the reaper Death, if, as some affirm, they knew that, before Christ could come for them, they would have to pass through "the great tribulation?" Surely, if such was the case, they would have had plenty of time to have got ready for his coming when the Antichrist was in their midst, without watching for his coming, before the man of sin was revealed. But that they knew nothing to prevent his coming for them at any moment may be gathered from Paul's words to them in 1 Thess. iv. 13-18. In there tells them that he would not have them sorrow for those who fell asleep in Jesus, as if death had robbed them of participation in the blessings which await those who are alive at his appearing. In loving words, he tells them, "For this we say unto you, by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent [go before] them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air" [observe here, most carefully, that the Lord does not now so much as touch the earth, but that the saints are caught up in the clouds, to meet him in the air]: "and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words."

We now pass on to his second epistle, and we there find that they were soon called to wade through the tempestuous billows of persecution. In this furnace of affliction, Paul hears that they are troubled. Troubled at what? It surely could not be that the coming of Christ for them was at hand. This was their hope, their one longing desire, to see him whom, not having seen, they loved. No! no! It was something very different from this that shook them. It was not this that caused Paul to write those earnest words of entreaty and warning, "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ" (enestgen) has set in. This was what alarmed them. They were falsely told by some that the day of Christ had already set in; and, in support of this, they alleged a pretended letter of the apostle. This Paul at once repudiates, and beseeches them not to be "shaken in mind or be troubled" by any "letter as from us," as that the day of Christ "is present." "Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day" [the day when "the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity," the time of "the great tribulation,"] "shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." And he adds, "Remember ye not that when I was yet with you I told you these things?" How is it, then, that you let these men trouble you, by saying that "the great tribulation" has already commenced, and that you are left to pass through it with the enemies of Christ? You say they pretended a letter from me. What! have you forgotten, then, our Lord's promise, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man?" (Luke xxi. 36.) Besides, have I not told you before, that "God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus?" (1 Thess. v. 9.) And now I tell you again that the coming of Christ for and to be "glorified in his saints" precedes his coming in flaming fire to take vengeance on those who "know not God," and obey not his gospel," who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or our epistle."

Peter, in writing to the elect strangers scattered abroad, confirms this teaching of the beloved apostle of the Gentiles. He says, "The time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God." (1 Peter iv. 17.) Now, although this may, in a secondary sense, denote the Lord's dealings with his people while on earth—"I or whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth" (Heb. xii. 6)—yet its primary meaning is that, when the Lord Jesus leaves his Father's throne, to commence the stupendous work of "the restitution of all things," his first act will be to summon his saints to judgment, not for condemnation—for, blessed be God, "there is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus,"—but to reward each according as his work shall be.

Of this his first act of judgment, we have a vivid description in the parables of the "ten virgins" and "the talents." (Matt. xxv.) But the scene here described is not a judgment upon the persons of the saints, but upon their works, in order to assign to each one his proper station and rank in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Eternal life, and an entrance into that kingdom, will be given to all, else the reward would be no longer "of grace, but of debt;" but the position each one will occupy in the kingdom depends upon his faithfulness to his Lord while on earth. The parables show us that there will be gradations of rank in the kingdom; some, who will rule over ten cities, others over five. The same truth is also expressed in the following words: "Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." Matt. v. 19.

Of this calling of the saints to judgment there will be no premonitory signs; but, when all is quiet, when the world is saying, Peace and safety, and when even the saints least expect it, then suddenly, as a snare, shall be heard the midnight cry, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh!" Then "one shall be taken, and the other shall be left;" left because they "received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved," to pass through that night of fearful apostasy—a night in which all who have rejected the truth shall believe a lie, that they may be condemned (2 Thess. ii. 11, 12); in which the earth is peopled with demons (Rev. xii. 12); in which all shall worship a man as God (Rev. xiii. 8); in which plagues, terrible beyond description, shall desolate the earth (Rev. xvi. 1-11; a night of pain and anguish, tribulation and distress on the enemies of Christ.

One more proof we will select, which in itself, is decisive that the saints will be removed before that hour of trial sets in. It is found in Rev. v. There, in heaven, under the symbol of the crowned elders, we at once recognize the church of the First-born. There can be no mistake here; they are seen by John in heaven long before any judgments are poured upon the earth; and he hears them sing the new song, "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us [clearing implying that they are the Church] to God by thy blood, out of every kindred and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth."

It may here be asked, "Who are the saints the Antichrist is said to make war with in Rev. xiii. 7?" They are Jews, undoubtedly, Christ's brethren according to the flesh, who will have their hearts turned to God by the testimony of the two witnesses (Rev. xi.); the elect remnant according to grace (Rom. xi); the third part (Zech. xiii. 8) who shall be brought through the desolating fires of the anti-Christian persecution at the time of Jacob's trouble (Jer. xxx. 7); but out of which he shall be saved; and for whose sake those days shall be shortened. Matt. xxiv. 22. These are "the people" (the "saints of the high places" are those who seal their testimony with their blood, under the persecuting power of the Antichrist, and are seen by John, coming up out of "the great tribulation," together with an innumerable multitude of palm-bearers (Rev. vii.); of the saints of the high places (Dan. vii. 27), to whom, in the millennial age, will be given "the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven." Then will their mouth be filled with laughter, and their tongue with singing, as thy joyfully exclaim, "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

And now, in conclusion, we have placed before you the two acts in our Lord's second coming, according to the Scriptures. Choose now in which one you will meet him. Great honor will be bestowed upon those who are watching for his coming. It is to them the crown of glory is promised, "which fadeth not away;" for they love "his appearing." And, as the Master has prepared for them a city, even the New Jerusalem, what grandeur meets your eye on every hand! Her foundations are of precious stones, her streets of pure gold, each of her gates of one solid pearl; and the light thereof is as a "stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal." There flows the crystal river, to make glad the inhabitants thereof; and on either side grows the Tree of Life, for the healing of the nations. As well might we try to find out how many drops of water the ocean contains as to tell the glories of the celestial city. O! let us all meet there!—Chas. Fooks, in Rainbow.

Meeting at Kingsbury, Ind.

One week ago last Friday evening I commenced a series of meetings at Kingsbury, Ind. We occupied the Baptist meeting house Friday, Saturday, Sunday and Monday evenings, and the school house Sunday morning. Owing to the dark night and bad roads there were but few out the first evening; and the rain prevented enough the following night to not have preaching at all. There were fifty in attendance Sunday morning, and the house was well filled in the evening. There was a fair congregation Monday evening, and excellent attention and interest manifested in all the meetings. Brother D. L. P. Clem's wife was added by immersion to the little band of brethren at Kingsbury. Brother and sister Shaw, and brother and sister Clem are all the obedient believers with whom I am acquainted in that place. This evening I commence meeting at Pierceton, this state. One week from to-day and to-morrow I expect to speak at Indianapolis; the following Saturday, or the Saturday before the first Sunday in December, I commence a series of meetings at Bro. Patridge, of Marysville, Ohio, may appoint. The following, or second Saturday and Sunday in December at Boswell, Mahoning county, Ohio, as Bro. W. D. Townsend may appoint. The following, or third Saturday and Sunday at Collinwood, Ohio, as Bro. W. J. Upton may appoint. And the following or 22d and 23d of December a public discussion with Mr. Knisely a distinguished Lutheran minister, of Newcomerstown, Ohio. This discussion is to be held in Port Washington, Ohio. The following is a verbatim duplicate of the original propositions written by Mr. Knisely, and accepted without modification or change by myself:

I. "The Scriptures teach that man is unconscious between death and the resurrection."

II. "The Scriptures teach that those who die in their sins shall suffer eternal punishment, being in a conscious state."

I affirm the first and he responds.

He affirms the second and I respond.

The discussion is limited by Mr. Knisely, to two days, three sessions each day, or two speeches each in each session. I regret that the time should be too limited for a thorough investigation of the important subject we have agreed to discuss. It should be at least three days. J. M. S.

The Union Conference.

Having noticed the announcement that a "Union Conference" was to be held at Galesburg in the latter part of October; prompted by curiosity to understand the nature of the union; as to who were the parties embraced in it; what was the faith, hope and spirit of the united body, I started, in company with my brother, on Saturday morning, while it was in session, to attend it. We were in time for afternoon services. Before services commenced, however, I was informed that I should be expected to preach at 10:30 Sunday morning. I was somewhat surprised at this, as the same person had previously said to me that no one that did not pray (vocally), in his congregations could speak in the house, which decision cut me off; and more recently I had asked, through Brother L. Chesebrough, for the privilege of giving one discourse on the operation of the spirit, and had been refused. Understanding that to speak to an assembled body by invitation was not an acknowledgement that the speaker was a member of the body, I without objection assented; and when the time arrived, gave a discourse on the ages to come; reading extensively prophecies to be fulfilled in the next age.

On their coming together, I found a very good representation of the different churches of Adventists in western Michigan; those churches which adopt the World's Crisis, or the Advent Christian Times as their organ. Among these were a very few who are now, or have been in times past, associated with the Michigan church conference; but to speak of such as are now acting with the Michigan conference, who participated as members of this, would scarcely admit of a plural. On Sunday I noticed a very few Seventh Day Adventists were present, but I am not aware that they took any part in the exercises. Practically the union is a misnomer; only one class being represented.

As to the faith and hope of the body, there was all the diversity that usually characterizes the Adventists as a body, some denying pointedly any probationary age after this, and contending for a universal resurrection at the coming of Christ, the dissolving of the earth by fire, and its renewal for the occupancy of Christ and the saved forever; others believing that the next age will be probationary, and that Israel will be restored and Christ and the saints rule over them and the nations; and perhaps a very few believing in the restitution of the world to its primeval state; but all agreeing that faith in regard to these things of the future, is not essential to Christian standing and character. As to conversion, I think they generally believe that a trust in Christ to save them, constitutes them Christians, without regard to their knowledge or ignorance of the things of the kingdom; and that this state of trust is effected by the action of the spirit of God in answer to prayer. Of course their hopes are as diversified as their faith.

The spirit, so far as mentioned in the meeting, was good. A zeal and earnestness deserving of commendation was manifest. This was shown in their sermons, their prayers, their singing, and their testimonies, as they were called, in the social meetings. These were all seasons of lively interest.

Probably the object of the originators of this union effort was to bring into concert of action all who believe in the near coming of the Lord; but how can those who are instructed by the Word that the gospel—which is defined to be "glad tidings of the kingdom of God"—must be believed and followed by repentance and baptism in order to membership in the body of Christ, be in union with those who disregard this teaching and substitute a conversion of feeling in answer to prayer? How can those who believe the things of the kingdom, as declared by the prophets and Apostles, be in union with those who disregard this teaching and look for a kingdom dissimilar, only as they look for Christ to be the head and the earth the territory? Although there are some points of agreement in our faith, these agreements cannot possibly make us one so long as one class fails to perceive the purpose designed to be reached by the scheme of redemption; or perceiving it, obscurely fails to regard it of special importance in the scheme? What good could result from a union of such discordant elements? One might expect more harm than benefit. While we could extend to them all the charity that the Bible will permit; treat them with all that sympathetic kindness that the love of God can inspire in our hearts; give them credit for all the honesty of heart that they show themselves possessed of; heartily commend them for all their labor for the good of their fellow men, we must beg to be excused from any chosen union till they, or we, shall learn the way of God more perfectly and conform our lives thereto. Jottities.

Sweden and Switzerland contribute the largest number of new members to the Mormon Church. England is third on the list.

Henry Seebohm, traveling in Russia, writes to the Sheffield Telegraph that while the country is utterly impecunious, there is no want; bread and meat are in plenty.

Mukhtar Pasha complains of the violent storms at the seat of war, which have often delayed military operations. They are announced, several hours in advance, by a violent wind, which tears trees up by the roots; then hail falls for an hour or two with fury, the stones being sometimes the size of a hen's egg. This is succeeded by torrents of rain. Water penetrates everything through the camps, and the discomfort to the soldiers is intense.

Jerusalem has furnished a battalion of Jewish volunteers to the Sultan's army. They have a field preacher of their own faith, and cook their rations strictly in conformity with their dietary laws. Jewish soldiers are also in the Russian and Roumanian armies, but those in the Turkish host doubtless serve with as much more zeal and cheerfulness as their treatment under the Sultan's army has been more humane.

People talk about christian fortitude, but Mohammedan fortitude seems to be quite its equal. Nothing can exceed the endurance displayed by the Turkish soldiery. There is what seems a preposterous rule, according to which a Turkish soldier's limb cannot be removed by a surgeon without the sanction of the authorities at Constantinople, whose decisions are often times delayed for weeks, and the poor fellows will lie day after day in agony, awaiting their fate without a murmur.

The Russian government has seized at Kiew a secret printing establishment where an enormous quantity of proclamations had been issued, declaring the Romanoff dynasty at an end. Sundry documents designated Ahsakoff, one of the chiefs of the Russian socialist party, as the leader in this enterprise, and his arrest, with that of several hundred of his followers, was effected. It was found that they were but a few of an immense body of individuals who were conspiring to overturn the imperial rule, now that the country was comparatively bereft of troops.

The Jewish papers of Europe and the United States are as full now of reports of shocking outrages by the Cossacks and the Bulgarian peasantry upon Jewish residents in the territory bordering upon the seat of war, as the secular press was some months ago of the massacres in Bulgaria. In Kazanlik eleven men, three women, and a girl of fourteen were butchered with wood axes, but not until the women had met with a worse fate than death. This affair was noted in Constantinople by public mourning services in the twenty synagogues of the city, to which many high Turkish officials and leading representatives of other forms of belief were invited. Hundreds of Jewish refugees from Kazanlik and other places sought safety in Adrianople, where the English Consul and others gave them such relief as they could. These refugees spread reports of outrages that were as horrible as anything related of the Bashi-Bazouks in Bulgaria.

Pulpit Reflectors.

The eminent Lyman Beecher used to say that the reason why his ministry was so blessed to the salvation of men, was that he had so many pulpit reflectors in the Christians who lived out and diffused in every practical way the gospel which he proclaimed. A light placed alone scatters its beams on every hand, but a number of well-placed reflectors can concentrate and reflect its rays and cause them to reach places where the direct rays of light never would go; so these pulpit reflectors, these Christians who take the gospel up into their lives, and who talk it, and act it, and live it from day to day, multiply the preacher's usefulness an hundred fold, and carry it down into the deep and hidden corners where sin and darkness lurk, those beams of light which, without their aid, would never reach the souls that sit in the shadow of death.

We need more pulpit reflectors. Let the ministers of the gospel preach with all fidelity, and then let Christians on every hand take up the words of life which he proclaims, and reflect and re-echo them.

Trusting in God implies much more than simply believing in his existence, power and wisdom. It is a constant looking to him for everything good, for both power and wisdom to use his blessings. It is a desire to know his will only for the purpose of doing it.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the investitution of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Love of Gold.

I was lately much struck with an observation of Junius to Woodfall in March, 1772:

"As for myself, be assured that I am far above all pecuniary views; and no other person, I think, has any claim to share with you; make the most of it, therefore, and let all your views in life be directed to a solid, however moderate independence. Without it no man can be happy, nor even honest."

These are the sentiments of the Great Unknown, and bespeak his moral sense of right and wrong; and show us very plainly, he knew nothing of that grace from on high which lifts a man from the lowest depths of poverty, and keeps him sure while in it. We have the testimony of one who lived on the bounty of God through the hands of his churches. "I have learned," said the apostle to the Gentiles, "in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound; everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need." And the key note of this jubilate is: "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." Phil. iv. 11. 12-13. Junius, apparently, knew nothing of this confidence in God. He could, perhaps, echo the words of Augur the son of Jakeh: "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain." Prov. xxx. 8, 9. He had no higher flight: He could not understand that Christian sentiment: "Godlin as with sufficiency (Gk. autarkeias) is great gain." 1 Tim. vi. 6.

The race for wealth has progressed with the age. It has not been content with the slow process of the accumulation of the past century; but like her sister, commerce, she has pressed the steam engine and the telegraph wire into the service, and made them slaves. Men have been accumulating since history began, but the scale of accumulation has varied exceedingly from age to age. There is strong evidence to prove that Charles V.'s bankers, the Fuggers, whose wealth made them princes with sovereign rights, never had more than a quarter of a million; while in 1750, scarcely any Englishman could have produced half a million: The new scale, under which a man with less than a million is, among rich men, quite poor, and (men can be quoted worth nearly twenty millions,) has only been in force twenty years, and most of the new millionaires have not had time to die. Thus, from the columns of the Illustrated London News we learn, that from 1803 to the middle of the year 1874, no less than seventeen persons have died in the British Isles, whose personalty amounted to one million and upwards; fifty-three, more than half a million; and 170, leaving more than a quarter of a million sterling. The consequence is that a man is estimated and valued according to his bank account, and his morals respected or excused by the same rule; and "money covers a multitude of sins." On the other hand, the tyranny of wealth, i. e., vulgar wealth without any higher qualification to tone it down to the rules of better society and religious propriety, is brought to bear against any one who does not bow the knee, and put "bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter;" or run into the same excess of riot and vulgarity. "Greed of gain" comes within range of the Apostle's warning to his son Timothy: "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil; which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things." 1 Tim. vi. 9-11.) Then the Apostle adds for the encouragement of the rich: "Charge them that are rich in this world, that that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life." 17-19. These words need no comment of mine; they refer to the godly getting and the godly giving; and are in strong contrast with the greed of the world whose maxim is,—"Get all you can and keep all you get;" and again,—"Get money honestly if you can, but at all events get money." To speak to such about the pearl of great price, is to sow the word in stony places, "for the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful." It is probable few, if any, of those greedy of gain will ever read this paper; indeed the pages of the Rainbow are quite out of their line of reading; but perhaps some casual sympathizer may, and it may offend some lover of the world. Be it so. The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord. But we are encouraged with the shelter of the Master's wing, "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord." We stand by his side, and listen as he spake unto his disciples. (Luke xvi. 1, et seq.) "No man can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon."

Mammon, the least erected spirit that fell
From heaven; for even in heaven his looks and thoughts
Were always downward bent; admiring more
The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden gold,
Than aught divine or holy else, enjoy'd
In vision beatific: by him first
Men also, and by his suggestion taught,
Ransacked the centre, and with impious hands
Rifled the bowels of their mother earth
For treasures better hid."

We still gladly stand by the Savior's side and listen meekly while his hearers gnash their teeth and otherwise insult him for the truth's sake. "The Pharisees also, who were covetous," (Gk. philargumi,) "heard all these things: and they derided him." (Gk. exemukteerizon.) The word is much stronger than our English translation; and is so vile and insulting that we cannot express it without offending decency; suffice it, that it was a peculiarly offensive action, exhibiting their utter contempt for the speaker as well as for his doctrine. It was quite in character with a people who spat him in the face. But he threatened not, and remarked, "Ye are they which justify yourselves before men," (that was their sole object: the cry of their covetous souls was, "Tush, God doth not see it,") "but God," said he who knoweth the thoughts and intents of the heart, "knoweth your hearts; for that which is highly esteemed among men, is abomination" (a Greek word which signifies what was unclean in the Jewish sense, and especially of impure idol worship, hence idolatry; hence also Mammon, the Plutus of the heathen,) "in the sight of God." Vs. 13-15. Greed of gain is an abomination in the sight of God! How very opposite to the conduct of the world! The man who has been successful in this world's affairs is courted by the world, and is elected to its chiefest seats, and choicest offices. The chief man in the parish is the richest parishioner, and yet one of the poorest may be the man: not only one of nature's noblemen, but one of that class which has been designated "God's gentlemen." For a Christian is and must be "God's gentleman." I often think in my parochial wanderings, if an angel were to come among poor mortals to invite home the most devoted servant of God, it would very likely be some poor enfeebled creature; or, perhaps, as Newton says, some poor, bedridden old woman in the parish workhouse, whom the parish officials would be very glad to get shut of,—certainly not "the squire," or "chief man," for, say the officials, "we could not get on without them."

The man greedy of gain is essentially a covetous man, and as the old Latin proverb runs: Amor nummi crescit, etc., "The love of money increases as money itself increases." I fear whenever it gains possession of the heart it holds it to death. A Christian friend once told me that on the dying bed men and women have been humbled before God, freely confessing their sins, negligences and ignorances, but that a covetous person has never been known to confess his sin in that respect, or felt that it was a sin. It is not a degrading vice to look at as some are; it does not roll in the gutter like a drunkard; it keeps outside all the gross looking sins which degrade our common nature; and shuts up in a cold, selfish heart all that it can scrape up for self, and shuts out Christ and his precepts of love. The covetous man prides himself on his bank account, and his large respectable will in prospect; and so far his friends will will speak well of him: but that which is highly esteemed amongst men is an abomination in the sight of God. In fact, the covetous man is abhorred by God. Psa. x. 3. Indeed covetousness and Christianity cannot reside in the same soul. They are so utterly antagonistic that one must slay the other. Notwithstanding—the greed of gain so largely and increasingly sways mankind, that we look upon it as a sign of the perilous times noted by St. Paul, when man shall be lovers of their ownselves, covetous," &c. 2 Tim. iii. 2.

The command of the Spirit of God is very plain to all Christians: "Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have, for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Heb. xiii. 5. To those who minister in the things of God, special commands are addressed: "Not greedy of filthy lucre, not covetous." 1 Tim. iii. 3, 8. And a solemn warning: They that will be rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil; which, while some coveted, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things. 1 Tim. vi. 8. 11. The Apostle Peter also, in his exhortation to the elders, says: "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lord over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock. And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." 1 Pet. v. 2-4. Our command is, meanwhile, to be separate from the covetous and extortioners; "with such an one, no not to eat," for neither the covetous nor extortioners shall "inherit the kingdom of God."—Selected.

*Paradise Lost, Bk. I. "Mammon," in the quaint style of Trapp, "is a monster, whose head is as subtle as the serpent, whose mouth is as wide as hell, eyes sharp as a lynx, scent quick as the vultures, hands fast as harpyes, belly as insatiable as a wolf, feet swift to shed blood, as a lyoness robbed of her whelps. Ahab will have Naboth's vineyard or he will have his blood. Judas was both covetous and a murtherer, and therefore a murtherer, because covetous" (Trapp, Mall. vi. 24.

Paradise.

To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise. Luke xxiii. 43.

The primitive paradise—the first abode of man—embraced these elements; a state of purity or innocence; a place of beauty, abundance, and delight, or a condition of peaceful and entire satisfaction; the nearness of God as the living Father; and an implied pledge of immortality. The true life in paradise was without sin, for when man sinned he was cast out from the garden; life in Paradise was free from want and care, for toil and pain come as the curse of sin; life in Paradise was one of plenty and delight, for the garden was planted with "every tree that was pleasant to the sight, and good for food;" life in Paradise was favored with frequent manifestations of the presence of God, for the Lord God walked in the garden; he talked with Adam, instructed and blessed him, making every provision for his happiness as an expression of his Maker's love. And this life carried with it the presumption of its immortality; for the symbolic tree of life stood in the midst of the garden, like a covenant in perpetuity, and death was threatened as a consequence of sin. Such a life, pure, peaceful, and satisfying, blessed with the presence of God and the promise of immortality, was the Eden of the Hebrew Scriptures, which, in popular language, long before the time of Christ, had become familiarly known as Paradise. And the restoration of this Paradise was looked for under the reign of the Messiah, whose coming would make the desert like the Paradise of God.—Selected.

An Extraordinary Season.

Even the dullest of newspaper readers must have observed something extraordinary in the atmosphere and other phenomena of this season. It has been marked by various destructive storms, and by an unusual number of disastrous conflagrations. Both series began very early in the season. There were forest fires in the East, North, and Northwest within a very short time after the evaporation of the last moisture from the melted snows of the winter months; and hurricanes began to set in as early as the third week in April. We printed a list of these last Saturday, and by that our readers were advised of the great number of them for so early a period of the spring and summer, and also of their very destructive character. Since then there has been another, the most furious and extensive of all, ranging and raging over a stretch of country from the Upper River to the Upper Ohio—so' in the nut-thanking gusts reaching even to our own city. All of these showed great electrical disturbance, and, taking them and the forest fires and the wide-spread destruction by fires in two cities, they furnish coincidences entitled to consideration. We cannot, of course, arrest or escape the tornado, but we can do something to reduce the risks of fire; and this latter is a thing to be done most carefully at a season when there seems to be an extraordinary susceptibility to fire in the air. When a conflagration consumes half a city in a few hours; and a day or two after that another sweeps away the more valuable half of another town; and when both disasters are the product of fires that, under ordinary circumstances, would have been confined to the buildings in which they originated, or at the worst, to two or three others in the close vicinity—surely such occurrences should arouse the suspicion that some extraordinary agency or influence is at work. Both the conflagration at St. John and that at Marblehead were uncontrollable from the first, just as the enormous destruction at Chicago was. The consuming element seemed to have for the time an augmented power far beyond the reach of the usual appliances. The fire leaped from street to street over spaces broad enough to afford ample protection at other times; it advanced like a great, irresistible wave as long as any consumable material was left in its path. These were characteristics of all the fearful conflagrations mentioned. It is not so generally. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred, the fires which reduced so much of the cities of Chicago, St. John, and Marblehead to ruin, would have been extinguished before the second house was destroyed. But all the power of the fire departments of the cities named was of no more avail than if stricken by paralysis before the petty fires—petty at time of their origin—which grew into such wide-sweeping calamities. These are, however, circumstances characteristic of them all. Not one of them at first seemed to be anything different from the usual fire that destroys a single dwelling, or workshop, or mill; yet each of them almost immediately got beyond control, and at each of them the fire leaped from street to street over broad spaces, and advanced until there was nothing more in its path to burn.

Was there anything in the atmospheric conditions at times of these fires to give unusual potency to the consuming element? This is not asked as a question that can be answered, but as a question to suggest inquiry, in its relations to the extraordinary atmospheric disturbances which have marked this season, and which, to some extent, characterized the period at which the Chicago fire occurred. In this last-mentioned year, and near about the time of the Chicago calamity, there were most disastrous forest and prairie fires in Minnesota and Wisconsin; and intelligent persons who were eye-witnesses to them, in Wisconsin, testified that hot blasts swept the country for miles in advance of the fire; that luminous balls traversed the air in the afflicted districts; and that new flames started up at considerable distances from the main body of the conflagration. Assuming these statements to be true, and they have not been questioned within our knowledge, there would seem to have been something in the air of that region, at that time, which gave it extraordinary potency to excite combustion, to feed fire, and to carry it over long distances. What can our meteorologists, physicists, chemists, and other scientists tell us about this? Given these coincident circumstances, are there any relations between them, and does the atmosphere at times get into a condition to make it extremely susceptible to fire or to give it an unusual power to excite and feed combustion? If there be any such influences even if there be only a suspicion of them—and if this season, with its long list of hurricanes, severe storms, and disastrous forest and city fires be one of the seasons when such agencies may be potent in the air, then it is a season to be on guard against the beginnings of fires, whether by "accident" or by "spontaneous combustion," or by the fire-cracker and rocket-stick. Those people are wise who do not tempt fate or undertake to defy the powers of nature.—Phil. Ledger.

Evils of Gossip.

We have known a country society which withered away to nothing under the dry rot of gossip only. Friendships, once as firm as granite, dissolved to jelly, and then ran away to water only, because of this; love that promised a future as enduring and as stable as truth, evaporated into a morning mist that turned to a day's long tears, only because of this; a father and a son were set foot to foot with the fiery breath of an anger that would never cool again between them; and a husband and a young wife, each straining at the hated lash which in the beginning had been the promise of a God-blessed love, sat mournfully by the side of the grave where all their love and all their joy lay buried, and all because of this. We have seen faith transformed to mean doubt, joy give place to grim despair, and charity take on itself the features of black malevolence, all because of the fell words of scandal, and the magic mutterings of gossip. Great crimes work great wrongs, and the deeper tragedies of human life spring from the larger passions; but woeful and most mournful are the uncatalogued tragedies that issue from gossip and detraction; most mournful the shipwreck often made of noble natures and lovely lives by the bitter winds and dead salt-waters of slander. So easy to say, yet so hard to disprove—throwing on the innocent all the burden and the strain of demonstrating their innocence, and punishing them as guilty if unable to pluck out the stings they never see, and to silence words they never hear—gossip and slander are the deadliest and cruelest weapons man has ever forged for his brother's heart.—All the Year Round.

Men Without Occupation.

The man who has nothing to do is the most miserable of beings. No matter how much wealth a man possesses, he can be neither contented nor happy without occupation. We were born to labor, and the world is our vineyard. We can find a field of usefulness almost anywhere. In occupations we forget our cares, our worldly trials, and our sorrows. It keeps us from constantly worrying and brooding over what is inevitable. If we have enough for ourselves, we can labor for the good of others; and such a task is one of the most delightful duties a worthy and good man can possibly engage in.

Brevities.

It is estimated that 120,000 children have been made orphans by the famine in India.

Mrs. Bonham, a lady of fortune, has lately died in England a bona fide case of 102. She leaves a daughter of eighty-five.

Prussia has 140 Roman Catholic papers; Austria, seventy-seven; Bavaria, seventy-seven; Switzerland, fifty-three; Saxony, three; Baden, twelve.

It is computed that the grain used for liquors in a year in the United States reaches 70,000,000 bushels, which would make 1,050,000,000 four pound loaves of bread. Great Britain uses 80,000,000 bushels of grain yearly for the same purpose, and annually imports food to the value of nearly $400,000,000.

The Pope has issued a decree condemning the substitution of the Russian language in place of the Polish in the Roman Catholic churches of Poland. The Russian Government had previously endeavored, without success, to obtain from the Vatican both a sanction for its use and a declaration of its legality.

The reports concerning the damages caused by the recent floods in the Argentine Republic have not been exaggerated. It has been estimated that at least 40,000 head of cattle and 8,000,000 sheep perished. Hundreds of families have been ruined by this inundation, the most disastrous which has ever occurred in the country.

Every year witnesses curious sand showers in China, when there is neither cloud nor fog in the sky. The sun is scarcely visible, looking very much as when seen through smoked glass. The sand penetrates houses, reaching apartments which seem securely closed. It is supposed to be carried by whirlwinds from the great desert of Gbio, and the storms are indicative of a year of large fertility.

Only forty-two obelisks are known to exist. Four are standing and two are prostrate at Karnac; nine are prostrate at Saan, and one stands at Philae. In Rome there are twelve, the largest one being at the Church of St. John Lateran. Florence containing two, and Paris, Arles, and Constantinople one each. In England there are four—two at the British Museum, one at Alnwick Castle, and one at Kingston-Lacy, Dorsetshire, brought over by William Bankes, a friend of Lord Byron.

The body of Mr. W. W. Barry, barrister, of Lincoln's Inn, who was lost in the Tyrol in September, 1875, has been discovered on the Krimmler Tauern, a pass in the province of Salzburg, about 9,000 feet above the sea. The traveler evidently sat down to rest among the rocks about twenty feet from the road, at the summit of the pass, and there died, overcome by exhaustion and exposure to a cold storm which was prevailing on the day he disappeared. His gold watch and a number of sovereigns lay on the ground near his skeleton.

Erasmus wrote his "Praise of Folly" in seven days. It was a satire on monkish ignorance, which was then undoubtedly great. He mentions in one of his colloquies how an abbot and sixty monks had not one single book among them, and George Buchanan relates how some Scotch ecclesiastics believed that Martin Luther was the author of "a dangerous book called the New Testament." Leo X. is reported to have laughed over Erasmus's book, and Cardinal Ximenes said to one of its censors, "Either write better yourself or allow those to write whom God has made capable of it."

The title of Ghazi, which has been conferred on Mukhtar and Osman Pashas, is one of great distinction, and is rarely bestowed on a subject of Turkey. It is a matter of record that it is nearly three hundred years since any individual was selected for such an honor. In the sixteenth century, during the great wars of the Turks and Western Europe, it was conferred on one or two occasions. The last time it was bestowed in modern days was upon the fortress of Shumla, which is always designated in official documents as Ghazi Shumla. This fortress has been besieged twenty-seven times, and has never been captured. The title is conferred on cities and fortifications and their successful defenders.

The Restitution.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, DEC. 9, 1877.

Stockholders' Meeting.

The Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association will convene in Plymouth, Indiana, on the last Monday of December, 1877 (that being the time prescribed by the articles of association), being on the occasion the first day of the month and week, for the purpose of electing a new Board of Directors, and for the transaction of such other business as may come before the meeting. E. K. HARGHILL, Secretary.

BRO. REED is holding a series of meetings at Argos during the current week.

SOME deferred communications will find a place soon. Some of these we are compelled to copy.

WE are indebted to some friend in England for a late number of the London Times which was mailed from Warrington. Thanks to the sender.

THE year is drawing toward the close and we urge upon our patrons a prompt renewal of subscriptions. And will each one try to enlarge our list by procuring at least one new subscriber. Times are ominous and all need the light on the fulfillment of prophecy.

OUR readers will find a criticism in the present number on the application of the phrase—this generation—from the pen of Granville Penn, a grandson of the distinguished founder of Philadelphia. He was the author of quite a number of literary and religious works, one of the most important being a translation of the New Testament with annotations, entitled "The Book of the New Covenant" in three volumes. His criticism is the more valuable, as he wrote from a purely critical point of view.

BRO. THOMAS WILSON informs us that Our Rest has been delayed in consequence of removal and other causes, and that it will hereafter appear regularly. It will be enlarged from twenty-four pages to thirty-two, and the price will be $1.25 instead of $1.00 as formerly. A portion of space will frequently be devoted to the Great Pyramid which excites so much interest at the present time. The office of publication has been removed from 182 Clark street, to No. 1, Arcade Court, Chicago, Ill.

THE war between Russia and Turkey is progressing but slowly for a few days past. In what has been accomplished Russia has been the gainer. In Armenia the Russian army has gone into winter quarters. In Bulgaria, the siege of Plevna is strictly maintained, and all relief, so far, successfully debarred any approach to the beleaguered city. Should Plevna fall the way would be opened through the western passes of the Balkans to Adrianople and even Constantinople itself. The Turkish army under Mehemet Ali was lately attacked, but the Russians were repulsed. The critical situation of the Turks will prompt them to act with all the energy of desperation.

Talk With a Dunkard.

D. Good morning Brother R., I have been wanting to see you for some time and have a talk with you upon the subject of baptism. You are aware of the fact, we believe, that it requires three dips in order to make Christian baptism.

R. I am happy to have you call to talk upon that subject. I suppose that you desire to have a talk upon the point so far as the Bible throws light upon that point.

D. Yes, of course, we are a Bible people and do not want any one to believe anything which cannot be proven from the Scriptures.

R. Your position suits me exactly. I am of the opinion that whatever cannot be fairly proven from the Word is of no avail to us. Now, I would be glad to have you prove from the Bible that the Apostles dipped men three times in water in order to fulfill the commission of our Lord.

D. I will at once proceed to make the point plain. Jesus told his Apostles to baptize in "the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Now it appears plain to me that it requires a distinct act in each name in order to fulfill the command.

R. I am at a loss to know how you make that out. We read that those who are so fortunate as to gain the future kingdom are to "sit down with Abraham, and Isaac and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven." Matt. viii. 11. Now, must each saint sit down three times in order to fulfill this prophecy, first with Abraham then with Isaac, and then with Jacob?

D. No, I do not think that it will be necessary to have three acts in this case, for each one will be occupying the same position at the time the saint is seated in the kingdom of God.

R. Well, is not that the exact point in the commission? How do you get a variety of objects in baptism? Is not baptism used as a means of getting into Christ? And will you be kind enough to show me where the Apostles dipped men three t' ~es under the commission?

D. I know that baptism is for the purpose of uniting men and women to Christ, but I do not see how that does away with the statement of the commission which requires that baptism must be performed in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

R. I am anxious for you to show where the Apostles ever performed their duty as you say. The commission does not read in the names, but in the name.

D. I do not now call to mind any text where that particular formulary was ever used in the days of the Apostles, but we know that the early Fathers in the church baptized in three names, and that shows they understood the command just as we do.

R. I do not care to be led away from the Bible just now. You agreed with me that the Bible should be our standard. Will you please prove from the Bible that the Apostles practiced the three-dip ordinance? You know that the fathers baptized babies as well as grown people. Do your people practice infant baptism?

D. No; we do not practice infant baptism because we find no command nor any example to that effect in the Bible.

R. Exactly. Now will you please find a case where the Apostles ever dipped men three times? If you will furnish just one proof it will do.

D. I must confess that I do not find a plain text except the commission itself, and that is so plain that it seems unnecessary for any other proof.

R. But I asked you to take notice of the language used. It does not say in the names, but in the name. It seems that the command is against you.

D. I am told by scholars the word baptize is a frequentative in the Greek, and it therefore requires more than one act.

R. So is the word "go," and also the word "preach." The command was to all the Apostles, and the plural form is used to agree with the Apostles, "ye go," or "go ye." This is plural, but it does not mean that they must go three times, preach three times, and baptize three times. If there were three names and the apostles were to go, preach and baptize three times, then your idea would agree with such language; but as it is, I consider that your position is not sustained by the Word of God.

D. I think that the testimony is very pointed, and, although there is no text going to prove that the Apostles did baptize in three names, yet I must believe that they did, or else they did not fulfill their commission.

R. You certainly have strong faith where you have no testimony. Will you please show me where the Apostles performed their work in three names, anywhere in the New Testament?

D. Well, you may think that I am stubborn, but then I have been taught as I now believe, and am intending to stick to it.

R. Of course you can do as you please, but do not try to make men believe that for which you have not one Bible precedent. If you are a Bible man, bring Bible proof.

Baptism.

One baptism—Jesus was baptized to fulfill all righteousness. Eph. iv. 5; Matt. iii. 15; Matt. iii. 16.

Faith precedes baptism because the gospel is first to be preached, heard, and believed; then those who have heard and believed, are baptized, that they may be saved. Mark xvi. 15, 16; Acts xv. 7, 9, 11; xxvi. 18.

Receive the word, then be baptized. Acts ii. 41, 42.

Believe things concerning the kingdom of God, and be baptized. Acts viii. 12.

Jailor heard the word of the Lord, believed, and was straightway baptized. Acts xvi. 31–34.

The eunuch heard Jesus preached from the prophet Esaias, believed that he was the Son of God, of whom so much had been foretold; went down into the water, was baptized; came up out of the water, and went on his way rejoicing. Acts viii. 35, 28, 37, 38, 39.

Crispus and Corinthians heard, believed, and were baptized. Acts xviii. 8.

A great company of priests were obedient to the faith. Acts vi. 7.

Repentance precedes baptism. Acts ii. 38.

Be baptized for remission of sins. Acts ii. 38; x. 43.

No tarrying after faith comes. Acts xxii. 16; xvi. 33; viii. 36.

We are baptized into Christ's death. Rom. vi. 3.

That we may walk in newness of life. Rom. vi. 4.

And that like as Christ was raised from the dead, so we may be raised in the likeness of his resurrection. Rom. vi. 4, 5, 8; viii. 11.

We are born of water through baptism—it being a figure of the resurrection—that we may be born of the Spirit and enter into the kingdom of God through a resurrection from the dead. John iii. 5.

We are baptized in the name of Jesus, that we may put on Christ, become Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. Acts viii 16; x. 48; Gal. iii. 27, 29.

That we may receive the adoption of sons, become heirs of God, and children of promise, as Isaac was. Eph. i. 5, 8, 7; Gal. iv. 7; Rom. viii. 17; Gal. iv. 28; Rom. ix. 8.

Made nigh by the blood, to the covenants of promise, through baptism; we obtain an inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith in Christ. Eph. ii. 13; Rom. vi. 3; Acts ii. 38; xxvi. 18; Eph. i. 11; Col. i. 12; 2 Pet. i. 3, 4, 5, 13, 14.

That inheritance, the kingdom of Christ. Eph. v. 5; Gal. v. 21.

The kingdom of Christ to embrace the uttermost parts of the earth. Psa. ii. 8; xxii. 27, 28; lxxii. 8, 11; lxxxix. 25; Dan. ii. 44; vii. 14; Rev. xi. 15.

The saints, as heirs of the kingdom, to be associated with Christ in his reign on the earth, that reign to endure forever. James ii. 5; Rev. v. 10; xxii. 5.

From these texts it follows that there is but one baptism; that that baptism is a burial—a planting. Eph. iv. 5; Rom. vi. 4, 5.

That, as the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us, and baptism being a symbol of death, his blood is there applied. 1 John i. 7; Rom. vi. 4; Acts ii. 38

That the proper subjects of baptism are those who have the faith of the gospel. Acts vi. 7; viii. 12; Mark xvi. 15, 16.

That baptism is one of the conditions of salvation. Mark xvi. 15, 16.

That it is through baptism that we are born to newness of life, and have hope of a resurrection from the dead. Rom. vi. 4, 5.

Through it we receive Christ's name—and hence it is through baptism that we become sons by adoption, children of promise, and heirs of God, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that faileth not away. Gal. iii. 27; iv. 5, 28, 7; 1 Pet. i. 4.

S. HOXANA WINCE.

Christ's Invitation.

Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Matt. xi. 28.

Several things are clearly implied in the above invitation of Christ, addressed to the "heavy laden;" to those who are "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise." Eph. ii. 12.

1. It implies that you are away from Christ. Hence, the pleading words of Christ—words expressive of love and sympathy—"Come unto me."

2. It implies that you have the ability to come to Christ, for he would not have said "come," if you were powerless to answer the call, by ceasing to labor for the meat which perisheth, and by laying down your heavy burden of iniquity at his feet. Jno. vi. 27; Psa. xxxviii. 4.

3. The language implies Christ's willingness to receive you, and give you rest. Christ has elsewhere plainly said, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Jno. vi. 37. "The Lord knoweth them that are His," "and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand." 2 Tim. ii. 19; Jno. x. 27–29.

4. The language implies that if we have not put off the galling yoke of bondage, and put on the easy yoke of Christ,—if we have not laid down our heavy burden of iniquity and taken up the light burden of Christ, we cannot hope to share in the rest that remaineth to the people of God, even endless rest. Gal. v. 1; iv. 9; Psa. xxxviii, 4; Matt. xi, 29, 30; Heb. iii. 12-19; iv. 1-11.

5. It implies, kind reader, a glorious future of rest for you, if you will heed the words of Christ: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me: for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." Matt. xi. 28-30; Mark viii. 34-38.

6. It implies that Christ is the true source of abiding rest. "I will give you rest." Kind friends, do you not desire to share in the rest which Christ is willing to give you? If so, heed the words of Christ: "Come unto me." Come to Christ, through a living faith and a child-like obedience. Come to him now.

"Procrastination is the thief of time." To-day, if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts Heb. iii. 15. Choose you this day whom ye will serve. Joshua xxiv. 14, 15. How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him. 1 Kings xviii. 21. No man can serve two masters. Matt. vi. 24. There is no neutral ground in the great conflict between truth and error, sin and holiness, Christ and Belial. "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth," is the language of Him whom God commands us to hear. Luke xi. 23; Matt. xvii. 1-5; Acts iii. 22, 23. O! weary one, do you not desire rest? If so, come to Christ. His rest shall be glorious. Isa. xi. 10. "Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." Jer. vi. 16. Walk in the ancient paths. Jer xviii. 15. Do you desire salvation? Come to Christ, in whose enriching name eternal salvation is attainable. Acts iv. 11, 12; Heb. v. 9; Isa. xiv. 17; 1 Tim. iv. 10. In the language of Elder Platt. "Redemption is provisional; salvation is efficient. Consisting in a marvelous moral reconstruction with a contemporaneous external revolution—too mighty for any inferior power, too precious for any lesser love, too glorious for any sullied purity. Salvation in its nature is divine! And of its extent we read, 'He is able to save unto the uttermost!' Let us read that again. To be saved is a glorious thing—almost surpassing human belief; but here is a measure given. Not only will he save, but 'He will save unto—' What? My wish? My sense of need? No, not that;—beyond that! for that may fall far short of my real necessity. 'Unto the uttermost!' 'Unto the utter' is the left hand boundary of want. Unto the most is the right-hand boundary of need. But 'utter' and 'most'—both superlatives—are here conjoined into one compound super-superlative to express all possibilities of need lying between the center and the circumference of probationary existence. Oh, how language groans to express the munificence of God's salvation!" Nevermore question his ability. He is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us. Eph. iii. 20.

It has been said, that "he who launches out upon God's ability, has a far off shore to reach before he can bound it, and tell its sum." Accept God's Son as the captain of your salvation, by obeying his command: "Follow thou me." Heb. ii. 10; Jno. xxi. 22. Do you not desire the peace of God through Christ Jesus?" (Phil. iv. 7; Jno. xiv. 27; Rom. v. 1; Col. iii. 15.) If so, hear the invitation of the Prince of Peace: "Come unto me" Isa. ix. 6; Matt. xi. 28. Do you desire eternal life? (Matt. xix. 16.) If so, accept it as God's gift, through Christ. Rom. vi. 23. Seek for it, by patient continuance in well-doing; (Rom. ii. 6, 7,) and in the world (aion—age) to come, eternal life will be yours to enjoy. Mark x. 28-30; Jno. iii. 14-16; 1 Cor. xv. 51-55; 1 Jno. v. 9-12. But remember, kind reader, God has set before you life and death. O! choose life! Eternal life! Deut. xxx. 15, 19; Rom. vi. 23. Accept the Prince of life. Acts iii. 15. Allied to Christ, you are allied to life, even life forevermore. Psa. cxxxiii. 3. Jesus is the way, the truth, and the life. Jno. i. 4; xiv. 6. He is the resurrection and the life. Jno. xi. 25. Paul, while in the idolatrous city of Athens, preached unto them, Jesus and the resurrection. Acts xvii. 16-18, 32. This was his hope. Acts xxiii. 6; xxiv. 14, 15, 21; xxvi. 6-8; xxviii. 20. Have we this hope? Psa. xvii. 15; Jno. iii. 2, 3. Christ is the door through which we may enter into life. Jno. x. 7; Matt. xix. 17.

"Behold an open door!
It stands ajar for thee!
For thee, poor sinner, to secure
Bless'd immortality."—Rev. iii. 8.

Accept Christ as the bread of life. Jno. vi. 35, 48. Accept him as a leader and commander. Isa. lv. 4. He will lead you on to victory, even victory over the last enemy—death. 1 Cor. xv. 26, 51–57. Christ is the medium through which all the blessings of the future will flow. Then take refuge in the name of the Lord, as in a strong tower. Prov. xviii. 10. Seek the strong and everlasting consolation in Christ. Heb. vi. 18; 2 Thess. ii. 16; Phil. ii. 1. Cease to do evil; learn to do well. Isa. i. 16–18. Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, where unto thou art also called. 1 Tim. vi. 12, 19. We are also called unto glory. 1 Pet. v. 10. Of how language groans to express this glory. It is a weight of glory; an eternal weight of glory; an exceeding and eternal weight of glory; a more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. But hold! Hear the apostle exhaust the language in portraying a dim outline of this glory. It is a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. 2 Cor. iv. 17.

As you sail over the turbulent billows of life's voyage, take Jesus as your captain. Heb. ii. 10. For provisions, take the bread of life. Jno. vi. 48. For your chart, take the words of eternal life. Jno. vi. 68; Phil. ii. 16. For an anchor, take the hope of eternal life. Heb. vi. 17–20; Titus i. 2; iii. 7. Then, with the strong cable rope of faith and love, as a motive power, you can sail in the way of life. Prov. x. 17. And finally, in the haven of rest, a crown of life will be yours to enjoy. James i. 12; Rev. ii. 10.

The request of the Captain of our salvation is, "Come unto me;" "Follow thou me," "Learn of me." Matt. xi. 28; Jno. xxi. 22; Matt. xi. 29.

"Come ye sinners, come to Jesus,
He will take your guilt away
Hear the gospel of the kingdom;
Come to Jesus, come to-day.

"He can pardon and redeem you;
He hath died that you might live.
He is willing to receive you.
And eternal life to give.

"Come ye sinners, poor and needy,
Weak and mangled by the fall,
Not the righteous, not the righteous
Sinners, Jesus came to call.

"Let not conscience make you linger,
Nor of fitness fondly dream;
All the fitness he requireth
Is to feel and trust in him."

My Hope.

If I count the I die hopefully. If buried "my flesh shall rest in hope."—Is hope of the resurrection of the dead.

The night-shadow is not long—the morn will break in glory by and by. Our Redeemer liveth. He has burst the grave, vanquished death, and made known the path of life to those who follow him. He arose visibly, personally, and bodily. He is the first fruits, the pledge, the sample of them that slept. He will come back and send his messengers to gather in his whole harvest in due time. He hath the keys of hades and of death, and shall unlock those dark abodes, and reclaim his jewels which are hid in dust and darkness there. I shall behold him. Mine eyes shall see the King in his glory. His voice, sweeter than all melody, and mightier than all other voices, shall break in upon the sleep of ages, and charm the ear of death. His power shall rend the solid marbles and stir the slumbering myriads to conscious life and glorious immortality. The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. Quick as the electric flash the long dormant life shall be kindled in an immortal flame. This earth, groaning and travailing in pain, shall have its last mighty throe, and from it shall break forth an immortal host, countless and glorious as the very stars of heaven. I shall see loved faces there. I shall hear loved voices then. I shall clasp friendly hands then. I shall gaze rapturously then into eyes which fears no more shall dim. I shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God. I shall behold martyrs and saints, Apostles and confessors. Those that led me to the Lamb of God, that taught my lips to pray, that bathed me in the waters of holy baptism, shall be there. I shall meet unnumbered brethren in the Lord, now unknown—then all well known—now sorrowful, then always rejoicing. I shall meet those that have heard the word of Christ at my mouth, and whom in Christ Jesus I have begotten in the gospel.

I trust Christ's favor shall place me among the saved ones there, and they shall be "my hope and joy and crown of rejoicing, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming." Reader, shall I not meet you there, shining like an angel amid the radiant ranks of the redeemed? O let us be there in the glorious resurrection morning. This is my hope. Those dear as life to me shall come to meet the Savior in that day, and we shall be "forever with the Lord," and forever safe in his presence from all the ills of life or death, of earth or hell.

Compared with such a prospect, how vain are worldly hopes! What are the rewards of earth compared with the glories of being "recompensed at the resurrection of the just"? Luke xiv. 14. What are the joys of earth compared with the gushing raptures of that glorious hour? What are the friendships of earth compared with those associations "where death and the tomb shall divide hearts no more?"

Reader, have you the hope of all these joys? Is your trust in him who is "the resurrection and the life"? Then happy are you, for you are "rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation, instant in prayer." Hold fast unto the end, and Christ shall give to you eternal life and raise you up "at the last day."—H. L. Hastings, in Reasons for my Hope.

Exegetical.

For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many. Mark x. 45.

This word λυτρον (lutron) ransom, admits of no ambiguity. It means "purchase money, the price paid for the release of any one from captivity, from prison, or from peril." The same word, chiefly in the plural form λυτρα, lutra, is common in classic Greek, in the sense of ransom—a price paid for redemption. Plato uses it in describing the rich presents that Chryses brought to the Greeks for the ransom of his daughter. Thucydides speaks of Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, having received the territory of Camarina as a ransom for some Syracusan prisoners. Herodotus, describing the victory of the Athenians over the Chalcideans and the Beotians, says: "All the Chalcidean prisoners whom they took were put in irons and kept for a long time in close confinement, as likewise were the Beotians, until the ransom asked for them was paid. The Athenians made an offering of a tenth part of the ransom money—τον λυτρον, toon lutron." Demosthenes and Xenophon used lutron in the same sense of a price paid for a ransom. In the great tragic poet Aeschylus is a striking instance of λυτρον, lutron in the sense of an expiation or atonement for murder. The chorus of mourning women, bewailing the untimely end of Agamemnon, exclaim: "What atonement is there for blood that has falling on the ground? All the rivers moving in one channel would flow in vain to purify murder." How admirably comes in here the New Testament doctrine of an expiation, a ransom sufficient to atone for every crime. The Son of Man gave his life a ransom, λυτρον, lutron, for many.—Thompson's Theology of Christ.

LONDON, December 3.—A special from Dedua says: "Turkish troops are reported to have disembarked at Dulcigno, the citadel of which was not taken, as previously reported."

VIENNA, December 3.—M. Cristics, agent of Servia at Constantinople, has been instructed to demand satisfaction from the Porte for the continual violations of the Servian frontier by the Turks.

The bad feeling between Turkey and Italy grows out of representations by the Porte about a rumored filibustering incursion into Albania. Italy assures the Porte that the rumor was groundless, but the Porte refuses to accept this denial. There is a report from Rome that some other Powers have also drawn the attention of Italy to the subject. If this be true, the Porte has succeeded in convincing others as well as itself that its apprehensions are not altogether without foundation.

LONDON, December 4.—A correspondent at Athens says: "According to the latest letters, public feeling in Crete favors a rising after the fall of Plevna. The Greek Government has warned the Cretans that it will stop volunteers and supplies if they rise prematurely or contrary to its advices."

LONDON, December 4.—The Herald correspondent at Rome says it was thought the Pope was dead on Sunday night, the rumor to that effect being believed even in the Vatican. In consequence of the report an immense crowd gathered at St. Peter's, yesterday (Monday) morning. The truth, is the Pope is slightly better. A silver ball has been inserted into the sore in his leg, which will act as a safety valve, and may prolong his life for several days.

The Simplicity of the Bible.

The fact that God gave a revelation, not for the learned, but for all classes of men; not for any one age or nation, but for all ages and all nations, proves that that revelation may be understood, at least as to its direct teaching, without the aid of human science. It is an instructive fact, that the gospel was understood, and did achieve its most signal triumphs, at periods when every existing system of philosophy was fundamentally erroneous. The entire history of the Church in all ages, and in the present, sustains me in the assertion—that the gospel has lost its power over the human conscience and heart, precisely in the degree in which there has been departure from the obvious meaning of the language of the Bible, to accommodate its teaching to any science or system of philosophy. The history of the Church furnishes not a solitary exception to this general statement; indeed, one of the most convincing proofs of the inspiration of the Scriptures is the fact, that every attempt to improve upon their meaning, (and there have been many such,) has been attended with loss of power, or has exhibited a perverted and pernicious power.—Nathan L. Rice, D. D.

Be Ye Also Ready.

Ready when the dawning
Comes creeping cold and grey,
And we waken up from slumber
To greet another day.

Ready when the noon-time
Is quickening with heat,
And there steals o'er the spirit
A languor, dreamy, sweet.

Ready when evening falls,
And flits o'er th' glow
As the westering sun's last gleam
Is fading from our view.

Ready at midnight hour
A vigil still to keep;
The heart awake, though weary eyes
Have closed themselves in sleep.

Blessed the servant found,
What time the Lord returns,
Who ready as He found doth hold
A lamp that brightly burns.

Editor Restitution:—I am happy to report that the cause of truth is prospering in the valley of the Osage. I was called to preach in this valley about the first of September, and am now located where I have every reason to believe that a "great door and effectual is opened unto me" to preach Christ's gospel, to "set in order the things that are wanting," and bring to the notice of the brotherhood the excellency of our beloved RESTITUTION. And if we can escape the corrupting influence of disorganizers and hobby riders, we have reason to hope for the accomplishment of a great work in this valley, as we have been successful in removing the prejudice that formerly existed against us as a people—our meeting being attended by all classes and denominations; and our church organization is in a hopeful and healthful condition. Editor Restitution:—I am glad to read the able contributions of men from different parts of the world, especially on the prophecy of Daniel; but still I am left in the dark in regard to who the third party is, who is called a vile person in Dan. xi. 21. It seems to me that the same power or character is presented throughout the chapter, where he exalts and magnifies himself above all gods, and speaks marvelous things against the God of gods.

Again, in the fortieth verse of the same chapter, it being in the time of the end; the king of the south shall push at him, and the king of the north shall come against him; and in the last verse of the chapter, after planting the tabernacles of his palace in the glorious holy mountain, he comes to his end. We read: "At that time shall Michael stand up for Daniel's people," and a time of trouble begins, and soon the dead are coming forth. Now, will some one tell us how all these things can be, and be but two parties or powers? and is not the same power presented in Dan. ix. 27, where he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week, and where he is represented as continuing until that determined be poured upon the desolator?

Yours truly, WALDO MAY.

Editor Restitution:—I find, by reading the paper, I am not alone in want of means to do for the truth; for my thoughts are on the subject day and night, contemplating the things of the kingdom and name of Jesus Christ, and the glorious and precious promises made to the fathers of Israel, of which promises we are partakers in Jesus the Christ. For in him are all things, to whom we look for redemption from this body of sin and death, and for the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

I claim to be one of the few who are looking for the return of that same Jesus that was taken up into heaven, to reward his servants, both small and great. What a hope the promises to the fathers are! This hope makes not ashamed, for all who have it can give a reason for the hope, not a maybe-so, but a thus saith the Lord; for the gospel is to the poor, rich in faith, heirs of the kingdom God has promised; and he has promised a throne and kingdom to David, to be established forever before David, and when David heard he was astonished: "Is this the manner of man, O Lord God? What is my house that thou hast brought me hitherto? And this was yet a small thing in thy sight, oh, Lord God, but thou hast spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come."

So preach the promises which are the gospel, in the name of Jesus Christ, which promises have nothing to do with any isms whatever. I feel sad to read letters from the brethren taking up isms; away with isms; the gospel of the kingdom and name opens up the promises. Break the bread of life, and let all the brethren have their opinions. It is faith in him and on him,—in the Messenger and the message he brought—which has begotten us to this hope. Let us contend for it, and beget others by the same means the Apostle did; for he said he was not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believes it.

Yours, in the hope of Israel.

The Seventy Weeks of Dan. ix. 24-27.

In my articles on "The Time of the End" I had occasion to refer to the Seventy Weeks given in Daniel ix. 24-27, on which some comments have been made in THE RESTITUTION by several writers, but especially on my position with reference to the last week, and its application to "the time of the end." I am called upon to explain, or give some reasons for such application. I am happy to say that I can do so in the words of another—a writer of great weight and authority in Biblical criticism—S. P. Tregelles, L. L. D. The extract is from a work of his, entitled "Remarks on the Prophetic Visions in the Book of Daniel." I give this extract with great pleasure, as it fully expresses my views on the subject, and far better than I can myself. The exposition commences with the 25th verse. He gives an improved translation as far as the 27th verse, in connection with his remarks. Here is

THE EXTRACT.

The twentieth of Artaxerxes* gives us a starting point from which the reckoning of the seventy weeks begins: We have next to pay attention to the manner in which this period is divided into distinct parts. Two portions of the time are first spoken of:—From the issuing of the decree to restore and to build Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks:" i.e. two periods, the one forty-nine years, the other, four hundred (and thirty-four years; the whole period of the four hundred and ninety years being included, except seven years.

There is next added, "the street shall be built again, and the scarped rampart, even in pressure of times:" then follows, "and after the threescore and twelve weeks," etc. Hence it is clear that the whole period from the decree to Messiah the Prince is four hundred and eighty-three years and that forty-nine of these years are appropriated to something peculiar;—the only thing so mentioned has been the building of the street, rampart, etc: —these things are, I judge, to be allotted to the first division of the time, viz: forty-nine years.

Some have thought that this same interpretation was supported by the expression "in pressure of times," which they would render "in the shorter space of time,"—a rendering wholly destitute of grounds, only supported indeed by its supposed fitness in this place. I quite agree with the explanation which allots the first forty-nine years to these events, but I could not support it by any such supposed rendering.

But it may be asked, what is the evidence that forty-nine years were spent in the restoration of the city? I answer, I believe it to have been so, simply on the authority of this passage; no other portion of scripture says anything about the length of time, and here forty-nine years are mentioned, and also the restoration of the city is so placed in juxtaposition, that they appear clearly to belong together.

Verse 26: "And after the threescore and two weeks, shall Messiah be cut off;" this period is marked by the definite article as identical with the threescore and two weeks of the preceding verse. The four hundred and eighty-three years from the issuing of the decree, run on "to Messiah the Prince:"—it becomes then important to enquire to what part of our Lord's earthly path the reference is made. He was "born King of the Jews;"—but this appears to be something more than the mere title: now, the only time in which we find the Lord Jesus taking this title in the presence of Jerusalem, was six days before He suffered, when He came thither on the ass's colt:—He was then presented as King, and six days afterward was put to death as the King of the Jews. I should regard the limit "unto Messiah the Prince," as reaching on to his having been thus presented to Jerusalem. It is worthy of remark, that the decree of Artaxerxes was issued in the month of Nisan, the very month in which the passover was kept and in which our Lord both rode into Jerusalem and was crucified.

I should not thus consider the expression "after the threescore and two weeks" as implying an interval; but rather as being just the same as "at the end of the sixty-two weeks," when they are accomplished.

The words which stand in our English version, "but not for Himself," have often been taken as if they spoke of the vicarious character of our Saviour's suffering; this would however be, I believe, placing a most true and important doctrine upon an insufficient basis. I believe that the words simply imply, "and there shall be nothing for Him";—He will be rejected, and His earthly kingdom will be a thing on which He will not then enter.

The series of years has run on unhinderedly from the issuing of the edict to the cutting off of Messiah;—but at this part of the vision, there are various events spoken of before the one remaining week comes into notice at all. "And the city and the sanctuary shall the people destroy of a prince who shall come." This refers, I have no doubt, to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; as was also foretold by our Lord in Luke xxi. 20. "When ye see Jerusalem compassed about with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." This destruction is here said to be wrought by a certain people; not by the prince who shall come, but by his people;—this refers us, I believe, to the Romans as the last holders of undivided Gentile power: they wrought the destruction long ages ago:—the prince who shall come is the last head of the Roman power, the person concerning whom Daniel had received so much previous instruction. It is most important to attend to the exact words of the passage; it is thus we avoid the mistake of confounding the people and the prince who afterwards springs up.

"And his end shall be in the overflowing;" I suppose that speaks of the end of the prince who shall come; in the expression "the overflowing," allusion seems to be made to some known event in prophecy; I suppose it is the same overflowing as that which is alluded to in Isa. x. 22, and xxviii. 15. This would identify the time of this prince with the crisis of Israel's history:—this identification is (as we shall see) yet more decidedly brought out in the subsequent part of the vision.

The interval up to "the end," is only characterized by war and desolations;—just so our Lord teaches us in Matt. xxiv., "Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom." The expression "that which is determined," appears to be taken up from Isa. x. 23.

The vision gives us no intimation about the times of events which belong to the interval;—we only find at the cutting off of Messiah, one seven years is unaccomplished; this "reserved week," as some have aptly called it, belongs to the time of the prince who shall come.

Verse 27: "And he (the prince who shall come) shall confirm a covenant with the many for one week." In "Remarks on chap. viii." (pp. 89, 90,) I sought to show that the horn spoken of in the two chapters (vii. and viii.) is identical, and here he again appears to come before us; in fact, the allusion seems to be made to known circumstances about him. He makes a covenant with the multitude; that of course means the multitude of Daniel's people—they are leagued with him, and he with them. This takes place three years and a half before he causes sacrifice and oblation to cease;—hence it is clear that they go on as under his patronage for some time. This will, I believe, throw some light upon the two thousand three hundred days mentioned in chap. viii. 14. We find him here making a covenant for one seven years, then breaking it at the end of three years and a half; and the removal of sacrifice, etc., is so spoken of, as to connect it with the breaking of the covenant. This tends, I think, to show that one thing done in pursuance of this covenant had been the establishment of the temple worship. The period of two thousand three hundred days is a few months short of the whole term of the seven years,—enough not being included, it may be, to be allotted for those preparations which will be needful for the worship to be set up; then follows the time during which it is carried on under his auspices, and then follow three years and a half of distinct persecuting and blasphemous power.

The character of this period of three years and a half is to be especially gathered from chap. viii, in which mention is made of "a time, times, and a half," and also from the forty and two months, twelve hundred and sixty days, etc., which are spoken of in the book of Revelation.

The identity of the time, times, and and a half of chap. viii., with the last half week of this chapter might almost be taken for granted:—the proof, however, is simple:—the horn in chap. viii acts in blasphemy and persecution until the Lord Jesus and His people take the kingdom; the three years and a half run on to that point: here in this chapter, the whole period of seventy weeks issues in the absolute and established blessing of Israel, Daniel's people:—the week of this covenant is the last portion of the seventy weeks, and the half week after the sacrifice is taken away, is the latter portion of that week. Thus the period in chap. viii., and the concluding period before us run on to the same point; they are also equal in duration; hence, they begin at the same time, and are altogether identical. If we would form a just estimate of the events of the last half week, we must gather it from chap. viii.;—here we have the same power in its local connection with Jerusalem. Pages 108 113.

B. WILSON.

The date which stands in our Bibles for the transition of Artaxerxes, is B. C. 445;—this makes the commencement of his reign, B. C. 465; but the authority of the best and most nearly contemporary historian will put the matter in a very different light. Thucydides mentions that the accession of Artaxerxes had taken place before the flight of Themistocles; this authorizes us to adopt Usher's date, and to place the commencement of the reign 473 or 474 B. C. This would give the date of 454 or 453 B. C. If we add to this the date of the expedition, it will just give us the exact period of the sixty-nine weeks. In doing this we must remember that the birth of our Lord was about four years before the common era, so that the thirty-third year of his life, when he is supposed to have suffered, would correspond with twenty-eight or twenty-nine of our reckoning. I believe the former to have been the true date: first, because of the day of the week on which the passover commenced in that year; and also, because of the consuls of that year (the two Gemini) having been mentioned by several writers as those of the year when our Lord was put to death.

This remark does not affect the instruction given or by God in this chapter; it is a point which I only notice for the removal of difficulties.

United States Coinage and the Great Pyramid.

Some one who fails to see wherein the benefit of importing obelisks from Egypt exists sarcastically proposed not long ago that Yankee ingenuity should astonish the world by floating, not an obelisk but a pyramid across the Atlantic, and erecting the structure in some city park. The satirical proponent might have strengthened his scheme if he had added that while this nation has no bond of connection with obelisks, it actually has something in common with the Great Pyramid—and that we have a direct national interest in that mass of stone, inasmuch as a most curious analogy exists between its measurements and in the weights of our several coins. We are indebted to Dr. Watson F. Quimby for the following letter, wherein he ingeniously points out this remarkable linkage, and suggests the very plausible idea that the weights of our coins owe their origin to no fortuitious circumstance, but rather to customs established at a period dating back beyond history. Dr. Watson says:

"In the admirable work of Professor Piazzi Smith entitled 'Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid,' it is shown that the Great Pyramid of Egypt contains in its interior standards of inch measure, while the exterior gives the same standards in the sacred cubit of twenty-five inches. One of the most important units of measure is the length of the so-called king's chamber, which is 412·5 English inches, and its breadth 206·2 inches. Now our silver coinage corresponds to these numbers, as the 'dollar of the fathers' weighs 412·5 grs., the half dollar 206·2 grs., and the quarter dollar 103·1 grs., which last is a very important pyramid number. On inquiring at that mint why the silver dollar was made of this weight, I was informed that it was the weight of a coin that would readily pass current in the Eastern Asiatic trade. It is therefore a traditional coin, by whatever name it may have been known, for thousands of years.

"But not only does the silver coinage correspond to the inch standard of the pyramid, but our gold coinage corresponds to the cubit measure. The height of the pyramid in sacred cubits is 232·5, and our gold eagle, the unit of gold coinage, weighs 232·2 grs., and the half eagle 116·1 grs.

"The relation of these numbers is such that 'the area of a square having 103·03 on the side, is equal to the area of a circle having 116·26 for its diameter.' (Phillips.) Now as there are 360 degrees in the circumference of a circle, its diameter in terms of seconds is 412620, and its circumference is 1296000. Then the number 4125 is the thousandth part of the diameter of a circle in terms of seconds, and 1295, the number of square inches in an English square yard, is the thousandth part of the circumference of a circle in terms of seconds. This at once connects English with pyramid measure, and may indicate the origin of both.

"From the standard square yard all the rest of our measures may be deduced. The old English gallon contains 231 cubic inches, which is a number intermediate between the height of the pyramid in cubits, 232·5, and the height of the king's chamber in inches, 230·80. The diameter of a circle is to the side of a square of equal area, as 9 to 8 very nearly.

9 : 8 :: 116023 : 103132.

"It thus appears that in the weights of the quarter dollar and the half eagle we have had the squaring of the circle problem typified without knowing it."

A Lesson for Boys.

A gentleman visited an unhappy man in jail awaiting trial. "Sir," said the prisoner, tears running down his cheeks, "I had a good home education; it was my street education that ruined me. I used to slip out of the house and go off with the boys on the street. In the street I learned to lounge; in the street I learned to swear; in the street I learned to smoke; in the street I learned to gamble; in the street I learned to pilfer. O sir, it is in the street the devil lurks to work the ruin of the young."

Annual Meeting.

There will be a general meeting of friends at Plymouth, Indiana, commencing on Friday evening, December 29th, and continuing over Sunday, Dec. 30th. The brethren throughout the state, and as many from other states as can make it convenient to come, are cordially invited to be present, and take part in the meeting. Let us lay aside business cares at the close of the year, and devote a portion of our time to the worship of the Divine Father, and the strengthening of our purpose to continue faithful in the service of the Blessed Master.

Brother C. F. Sweet, of Albion, N. Y., has signified the intention to be present. J. M. Stephenson, of Chicago, J. F. Wilcox, of Beloit, and resident preachers of H. V. Reed and S. A. Chaplin,—will attend. Dr. F. H. Berrick, of Buchanan, Mich., J. F. Wagoner, and others have been invited, and it is hoped they may be present.

Strangers coming from a distance may enquire for ELIZA K. BOROHILL, H. V. REED, or PHAT MCDONALD.

A Change.

[illegible] the roots of the pioneers
[illegible]-there the moss of a hundred years;
Each man and his works has passed the change
Which needs must be in a century's range.
The land lies open and warm in the sun,
Anvils clamor and mill-wheels run—
Flocks on the hillsides, herds on the plain,
The wilderness gladdened with fruit and grain.

But the living faith of the settlers old
A dead profession their children hold;
To the lust of office and greed of trade
A stepping-stone is the altar made.

The church, to place and power the door,
Rebukes the sin of the world no more,
Nor seeks its Lord in the homeless poor.
Everywhere is the grasping hand,
And eager adding of land to land;
And earth which seemed to the fathers meant
But as a pilgrim's wayside tent—
A nightly shelter to fold away
When the Lord should call at the break of day.

Solid and steadfast seems to be,
And Time has forgotten eternity.

Selections.

The Difference between holding Pre-Millennial Doctrine, and Waiting for Christ.

And from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness, and the firstbegotten of the dead, and the prince of the kings of the kings of the earth. Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever. Amen. Behold, he cometh with clouds and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen.

In a day like the present, when knowledge on every question is so widely diffused, it is most needful to press upon the conscience of the Christian reader the vast distinction between merely holding the doctrine of the Lord's second coming and actually waiting for his appearing. (1 Thess. i. 10.) Many, alas! hold, and it may be, eloquently preach the doctrine of a second advent who really do not know the Person whose advent they profess to believe and preach. This evil must be faithfully pointed out and dealt with. The present is an age of knowledge—of religious knowledge; but oh! my reader, knowledge is not life—knowledge is not power—knowledge will not deliver from sin, or Satan, from the world, from death, from hell. Knowledge, I mean, short of the knowledge of God in Christ. One may know a great deal of Scripture, a great deal of prophecy, a great deal of doctrine, and, all the while be dead in trespasses and sins.

There is, however, one kind of knowledge which necessarily involves eternal life, and that is the knowledge of God, as he is revealed in the face of Jesus Christ. "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." (John xvii. 3). Now it is impossible to be living in the daily and hourly expectation of "the coming of the Son of Man," if the Son of Man be not experimentally known. I may take up the prophetic record, and by mere study, and the exercise of my intellectual faculties, discover the doctrine of the Lord's second coming, and yet be totally ignorant of Christ, and living a life of entire alienation of heart from him. How often has this been the case! How many have astonished us with their vast fund of prophetic knowledge—a fund acquired, it may be, by years of laborious research, and yet, in the end, proved themselves to have been displaying unhallowed light—light not acquired by prayerful waiting upon God! Surely the thought of this should deeply affect our hearts and solemnize our minds, and lead us to enquire whether or not we know the blessed person who, again and again, announces himself as about to "come quickly;" else, if we know him not, we may find ourselves of the number of those addressed by the prophet in the following startling words:—"Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light. As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him; or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall and a serpent bit him. Shall not the day of the Lord be darkness and not light? even very dark and no brightness in it?" (Amos v. 18–20.)

The second chapter of Matthew furnishes us with a very striking illustration of the difference between mere prophetic knowledge and the knowledge of Christ—between the exercise of the intellect on the letter of Scripture, and the drawings of the Father to the Person of Christ. The wise men, manifestly led by the finger of God, were in true and earnest search of Christ, and they found him. As to Scriptural knowledge, they could not, for a moment, have competed with the chief priests and scribes; yet what did the Scriptural knowledge of the latter do for them? Why it rendered them efficient instruments for Herod who called them together for the purpose of making use of their Biblical knowledge in his deadly opposition to God's Anointed. They were able to give him chapter and verse, as we say. But, my reader, while they were dazzling Herod by their knowledge, the wise men were, by the drawings of the Father, making their way to Jesus. Blessed contrast! How much happier to be a worshipper at the feet of Jesus, though with but slender knowledge, than to be a learned scribe, with a heart cold, dead, and distant from that blessed One! How much better to have the heart full of lively affection for Christ than to have the intellect stored with the most accurate knowledge of the letter of Scripture! What is the melancholy characteristic of the present time? A wide diffusion of Scriptural knowledge, with little love for Christ, and little devotedness to his work; abundant readiness to quote Scripture, like the scribes and chief priests, but little purpose of heart, like the wise men, to open the treasures and present to Christ the willing offerings of a heart filled by the sense of what he is. What we want is personal devotedness, and not the mere empty display of knowledge. It is not that we would undervalue Scriptural knowledge; God forbid, if that knowledge be found in connection with genuine discipleship. But if it be not, I ask, of what value is it? None whatever. The most extensive range of knowledge, if Christ be not its centre, will avail just nothing: yea it will, in all probability, render us more efficient instruments in Satan's hand for the furthering of his purposes of hostility to Christ. An ignorant man can do but little mischief; but a learned man, without Christ, can do a great deal.

The verses which stand at the head of this paper present to us the divine basis on which to found all Scriptural knowledge, more especially prophetic knowledge. Before any one can utter his hearty amen to the announcement, "Behold he cometh with clouds," he must, without any question, be able to join in the blessed burst of praise, "To him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." The believer expects the everlasting Lover of his soul. The meek and lowly One who served, suffered, and was emptied down here, will speedily come in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, and all who know him will welcome him with glad hosannas—they will be able to say, "This is the Lord, we have waited for him, we will rejoice and be glad in his salvation." But, alas! there are, it is to be feared, very many who hold and argue about the Lord's coming who are not waiting for him at all, who are living for themselves in the world, and "mind earthly things." How terrible to be found talking about the Lord's coming, and yet, when he does come, to be left behind! Oh! my beloved reader, think of this; and if you are really conscious that you know not the Lord, then let me entreat of you to behold him shedding his precious blood to wash you from your sins, and learn to confide in him, to lean upon him, to rejoice in him, and in him alone.

But if you can look up to heaven, and say, "Thank God, I do know him, and I am waiting for him," then let me remind you of what the Apostle John says, as to the practical result of this blessed hope: "Every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure." Yes, this must ever be the result of waiting for the Son from heaven; but not at all so of the mere prophetic doctrine. Many of the most impure, profane, and ungodly characters, that have made their appearance in the world, have held, in theory, the second advent of Christ; but they were not waiting for the Son, and therefore they did not, and could not, purify themselves. It is impossible that any one can be waiting for Christ's appearing, and not make efforts after increased holiness, separation, and devotedness of heart: "Behold, I come quickly; blessed is he that watcheth." Those who know the Lord Jesus Christ and love his appearing, will daily seek to shake off everything contrary to their Master's mind; they will seek to become more and more conformed to him in all things. Men may hold the doctrine of the Lord's coming, and yet grasp the world and the things thereof with great eagerness; but the true-hearted servant will ever keep his eye steadily fixed on his Master's return, remembering his blessed words, "I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." (John xiv. 3.)—English Tract.

Religious Doubts.

I have spent more than thirty years in a close study of the sacred Scriptures, and no small part of my inquiries has had reference to the difficulties which were suggested to my mind by my early skepticism, and to those which, to a mind naturally inclined to unbelief, have been suggested since. I do not mean to say that all those difficulties have been removed; but I have found that, on a close examination, not a few of those which at first perplexed me, have silently disappeared; that a large part of those which have been since suggested, have vanished also; and that, in the mean time, the evidences of the truth of the Bible have, in my apprehension, become stronger and stronger. I come, therefore, in this respect, with the language of encouragement to those who are now just entering on their Christian way, and who find their minds poisoned by skepticism, and their course impeded by difficulties. Time, patience, study, reflection, prayer, suggestions from within and from without, accompanied by the influences of the Divine Spirit, will remove most of those difficulties, and will leave at last only those which belong, not peculiarly to the Bible, but to the mysterious order of things around us; to those which lie wholly beyond the reach of our present powers, and which must be left for solution to an eternal world. —Albert Barnes' Life at Threescore.

"This Generation."

We clip the following from an old number of The World's Crisis. Christ clearly distinguishes between the generation which was then living, and the one that should be living at his second advent. To the then existing generation he addressed himself in Matthew xxiii. 13–36. This generation heard the warning instructions of Christ and his Apostles, and witnessed the confirming miracles that they performed, for the space of forty years. From the long period of 2300 years, seventy sevens, or 490 years, were cut off for the Jews' national trial; and it was to the generation living at the termination of the seventy weeks' period that Christ and his Apostles first preached the gospel of the kingdom. After the Jews had rejected the Messiah, "God visits the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name." During the remainder of the 2300 years, or 1810 from the desolation of Jerusalem, the Jews are to be scattered among all nations, and their city "trodden under foot of the Gentiles." This interval is the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles, and it will have its last coexisting generation.

In Matthew xxiv. 4–14, our Lord graphically delineates, in outline, both the history of the nations, and of his church, during this interval, and shows that a general diffusion of knowledge in relation to the kingdom, by preaching and circulating the Scriptures, would characterize the times just before the end. Compare Rev. ix. and Dan. xii. 4.

Our Lord then, Matthew xxiv. [illegible] gives another outline of the same interval which closes with the, or that generation, that shall witness the signs of his second coming, and the coming itself. The history of this last generation is then more particularly delineated in the same chapter in verses 36–51. In Matthew xxv. 1–13, he parabolically describes a movement, and its disappointments, which is to mar that generation. Analogy would demand that a message, with its resultant movement and disappointments should occupy about forty years. As the 1810 years and not far from A. D. 1830, and as there has been a wide-spread proclamation since 1840, made the press and the living ministry, our conclusion is that the now existing generation was intended by our Lord. This position is being strongly fortified by the great political movements in regard to the papacy, in the overthrow of its temporal power, as well as to the now pending conflict in regard to the Eastern question. Let us watch and pray:

"'Verily, I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled. Luke xxi. 32.

"In the 'Supplemental Annotations' to 'The New Covenant,' by Granville Penn, we find the following interesting remarks on verse 32, quoted above. We think he sets forth the matter in its true light. He says:

"'I tell you that that generation shall not pass away until all those things be done, he genea autes—that generation; not this generation, as our English version has erroneously rendered; following the Latin Vulgate, which renders generatio hæc. It is evident that that generation which is here pointed out, is that which is predicated in the preceding warning respecting the 'times of the full accomplishment of the Gentiles;' and that our Lord declared that 'that generation' should not pass away before the 'times of the Gentiles should be fully accomplished: or that, while that generation should be still subsisting, the 'times of the Gentiles' should be brought to their termination. There are contemporary generations between an aged man and a new-born infant; but which is the one here designed in the prophecy, is not pointed out by our Lord. The Port Royal grammarians show (B viii. c. 6) from Budæus, 'that there is sometimes occasion for ambiguity in the pronoun autos.' That ambiguity, in this place, misled the Latin translator, and Wickliffe; and from the latter it misled also all our following translators from the Greek. 'If autos has the a title before it, it signifies the same—idem' (Matthiæ, Gr. Gr. § 467); therefore autes—eadem here relates to the genea—generation in which 'the times of the Gentiles shall be fully accomplished.' The verse 33 resumes, and clinches the verse 24: e. g.:

"'24. Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fully accomplished—

"'34. Verily, I tell you that that generation shall not pass away till these things be done.

"'Euthymius (in the 12th century,) who clearly saw that the generation intended by our Lord did not mean a particular generation of coexisting persons, thus proposed to explain the reference: 'What did he mean by genea autes? He called generation the religion of all who believed on him." The Apostles did not suppose that our Lord's predicted dangers would entirely extinguish both the preaching and the faithful; for he assured them that his religion would not be effaced before his second advent; but that it would continue to the consummation of time, and would not be affected by any danger.' (Vol. 2, p. 935.)

"'But the interpretation thus ingeniously devised is not required; for the genea autes—that generation—here expressed, is plainly to be understood in its ordinary acceptation: and, therefore, it eminently behooves us of this generation, so signally noted, to mark well our Lord's concluding and most solemn warning: "What I say to you, I say to all. Watch!—Watch, therefore; for ye know not in what day your Lord cometh."'"

The Reign of Christ, Literal or Spiritual?

There is no controversy among those who receive the Scriptures as the inspired word of God respecting the ultimate triumph of Christ and his gospel.

Nor yet is there any question among Christians regarding the duty of the church to carry out to the fullest extent the command of our Lord "to preach the gospel to every creature," and evangelize all nations, with the assurance of Christ's presence till the end of the age or dispensation.

The question for solution is, what is involved in the triumph of Christ and his gospel? And what did the Master mean when giving the commission to his church?

Are we to understand that the evangelization of the nations is the conversion of the nations, as nations, or that the majority of those to whom the gospel was to be preached should accept and obey it? How was it in Apostolic days? Certainly the work of evangelization was to commence then, Acts i. 8.

Here were men endued with the Spirit, commencing this great work of evangelization with power to perform miracles, whose success was wonderful, 3,000 converted in one day. The church soon increased to 5,000; then a multitude; Jerusalem filled with gospel doctrine. But was all Jerusalem evangelized? was Judea? or Samaria? or any part of the Roman Empire evangelized?

If the gospel was ever preached with faithfulness, and efficiency, it was in these primitive times. But if we are to understand the divine import of our Lord's command in the light of early church history the evangelization of the nations, means what James declared at the first Apostolic Council. Acts xv. 13–17.

This was Paul's understanding of the result of his labor among his own country-men. If by any means he might save some of them, Rom. i. 14, he remembered and understood what the prophet said: Rom. ix. 27.

What was true of the early church in evangelizing the Roman Empire, has been true of all church work, in carrying the gospel to nations thoughout this dispensation.

The sun of the old Roman Empire went down in darkness, because Christ and his gospel were rejected. The divisions of that dismembered government are repealing the sad history of Rome united, and the sure word of prophecy is unambiguous in pronouncing their doom. Rev. xvii. 12–14.

The history of the church from the fifth century of the Christian era, to the reformation of the sixteenth century, is a mournful record.

Since the days of Luther, the work of evangelization has been going on in various countries and among various tribes and kindreds of men. England has been open to evangelistic work for centuries. How shall we interpret our Lord's commission in view of that history? Certainly there have been no unconquerable obstacles to the evangelization of America since its discovery; the various parts of the country have been opened to the faithful proclamation of salvation by Christ Jesus. Has not our Lord's command been carried out through the States of this Union? With what results all know. Have we any divine warrant for saying that the preaching of the gospel will more signally triumph, in what we call heathen country, than it did in Rome, or than it has among what is now known as Protestant nations?

But, says one, are not the predictions of the Bible plain in declaring the universal triumph of the gospel in this age by human instrumentality? We think not, and for the following reasons:

1. Christ in giving the commission implied that some would believe and be saved, others would disbelieve and be damned. Mark xvi. 16. The past history of the world justifies the Savior's language; what proof that there will be any change in the future?

2. Christ speaks of four classes of hearers, only one of whom is savingly benefited by the gospel. Mark xiii. 1–9. There is a narrow and a broad way, ending very differently, with no intimation that they ever converge, Matt. vii. 13–14. Wheat and tares in the same field until the harvest. Matt. xiii. 40, 41. Antichrist existing until destroyed by Christ's visible coming. 2 Thess. ii. 8. The description of this dispensation by Christ himself does not warrant the idea of all becoming Christians. Matt. xxiv. When we look at the Old Testament predictions, relating to the reign of Christ, such as 2d and 72d Psalm, Isaiah xl. 60–66, Daniel ii. 44, 45, and vii. 13, 14, 27, we find that the Messiah, as the Son of Man, must appear to fulfill them. The reign and kingdom here prophesied belong to the future everlasting ages, not to time. The overthrow of Christ's enemies at his appearing is here plainly declared, as saith the prophet. Rom. xiv. 11, 12. The resurrection of the just, the separation of the righteous from the wicked, and the accomplishment of the promised restitution are all embraced in these soul-inspiring utterances of the ancient seers.

And to all this we may add that the early church, with all its consecrated, self-sacrificing zeal for God and souls, never dreamed of what is now popularly known as the universal conversion of the nations to Christ in this age. This was true of the reformers of the 16th century. Thus the voice of God and the voice of the church harmonize in directing our attention to that blessed hope, the glorious appearing of the great God, even our Savior Jesus Christ, as the crowning consummation of prophetic declarations.

Here we find all the motives that a human mind could need for holy living, consecrated toil and deathless interest in extending the knowledge of the glorious gospel to the utmost limits of the earth, and thus glorify Christ in seeking to save those for whom he gave his life in sacrifice.—Providence Journal.

A Timely Suggestion.

Do not keep the alabaster boxes of your love and tenderness sealed up until your friends are dead. Fill their lives with sweetness. Speak approving, cheering words while their ears can hear them, and while their hearts can be thrilled by them. The things you mean to say when they are gone, say before they go. The flowers you mean to send for their coffins, send to brighten and sweeten their homes before they leave them.

If my friends have alabaster boxes laid away, full of perfumes of sympathy and affection, which they intend to break over my dead body, I would rather they would bring them out in my weary hours, and open them, that I may be refreshed and cheered by them while I need them. I would rather have a bare coffin without a flower, and a funeral without an eulogy, than a life without the sweetness of love and sympathy. Let us learn to anoint our friends beforehand, for their burial. Post-mortem kindnesses do not cheer the burdened spirit. Flowers on the coffin cast no fragrance backward over the weary days.—N. Y. Evangelist.

The Kingdom and Dominion.

There is an important distinction between a kingdom and its dominion.

Victoria's dominions might all be taken away and her kingdom remain.

Daniel speaks of some whose dominion was taken away, yet their lives (co-existence as kingdoms) were continued or preserved.

His dominion shall be from the river to the ends of the earth.

All dominions shall serve and obey him.

The uttermost parts of the earth for possession.

Victoria's possessions might all be taken from her, and yet her kingdom remain.

Our Lord will (probably) set up his kingdom while many of the kingdoms of the present time are in existence.

The ten horns shall make war with the Lamb.

The subjugation of all dominions and power to Jesus Christ our Lord comes next. CHAS. BOARDMAN.

Did Jesus Sing?

At a gathering of children on Christmas day, a gentleman present related a very interesting incident.

A little girl, about three years of age, was very curious to know why Christmas greens were so much used and what they were intended to signify.

So Mr. L. told her the story of the babe at Bethlehem,—of the child whose name was Jesus.

The little questioner was just beginning to give voice to the music that was in her heart; and, after Mr. L. had concluded the narrative, she looked up in his face and asked, "Did Jesus sing?"

Who had ever thought of that? If you will look at Matt. xxvi. 13, you will there find almost conclusive proofs that Jesus sang with his disciples.

Is not that encouragement for us to sing,—not with the understanding only, but with the heart also?—S. S. Gazette.

The "Seven-hilled City."

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, in one of her late pen-pictures of Rome, says:

"Rome! Rome the mystery—Rome the strange enchantress, gorgeous, gloomy, sullen, yet sublime. It is even now that the shadow of an awful prophecy rests on her, that all her miseries, cruelties and crimes which have been accomplished here for two thousand years, are rolling up like storm-clouds to some mighty fate, awful and sublime, worthy her weird history! There is a dread old book that has words in it of some seven-hilled city, that come strangely over our mind."

Aye, the prophetic words of that "dread old book," relative to the "seven-hilled city," must soon be a matter of thrilling history.

"O CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION aims to present the Restitution of all things, which God has spoken by the mouth of all His holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the Immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the overcoming of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the incorruptibilization of the righteous, and the final bestowal on the whole of eternal life only through Christ—and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a daily belief of the Gospel, repentance, as taught by the Apostles, and obedience to the requirements of Christ, as a holy life necessary for final salvation.

Rise and Fall of Gentile Supremacy.

BY E. WILSON.

God is the great ruler of the universe. The Psalmist says, "The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all." Psa. ciii. 19. He giveth dominion to whom he will. As Creator and Preserver of all things, he has the right to kill and make alive; to bring down to the grave, and bring up. The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich; he bringeth low, and lifteth high. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory. 1 Sam. ii. 6-8. Jehovah has always claimed and exercised this sovereignty over all his creatures. "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." At the first he gave dominion to Adam over all the works of his hands—"over all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas." Psa. viii. 7, 8. But in the course of time man began to usurp rulership over his fellows, and to oppress them.

Thus commenced all the kingdoms of the nations. So when any of these usurpers' dominion, or their kingdoms, stood in the way of God's purposes, he swept them away. Hence witness his judgments upon Pharaoh and his kingdom; upon the seven nations of Canaan and their kings; upon Edom and Moab, etc.

As the centuries rolled along, the nations of Israel desired a king, like the nations surrounding them, although Jehovah was their king. Then God gave them Saul, a man of their own choice, to be their king; but placed him under law to himself. But he transgressed; and God removed him. Then he raised up David to be their king, of whom he said, "I have found David, the son of Jesse, a man after mine own heart, which shall fulfil all my will." With him he made a covenant, establishing the perpetuity of his throne and kingdom, and confining the royalty to his posterity. Yet David acknowledged that the kingdom belonged to the Lord, when he said, "Thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head over all." 1 Chron. xxix. 11. And he also was conscious that he was responsible to God for the manner in which he performed the trust confided in him; for he said, "the Rock of Israel spake to me, he that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God." 2 Sam. xxiii. 3. While the sons of David ruled Israel according to this principle of government they prospered; but when they departed from it, the Lord punished them. The princes of the house of Israel forgot that the kingdom was the Lord's, and that they were only his servants. They abhorred judgment, and perverted equity. They loved gifts and followed after rewards. And finally, when certain warnings and prophecies were rejected, "Zion was plowed as a field, and Jerusalem became heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest." Micah iii. 9-12. Thus, to all appearance, Jehovah made void his covenant with David his servant, by profaning his crown, and casting his throne down to the ground. See Psa. lxxxix. 28-44; Ezek. xxi. 25-27. The kingdom was overturned, and to be no more, until a righteous ruler should come,—"He whose right it is"—the heir to David's throne and kingdom. The length of time that the children of Israel shall abide without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, etc., must be learned from various portions of the Divine record.

I have endeavored to show, very briefly, that God once had an earthly kingdom amongst men, and only in connection with the house of Israel. When God used his prerogative to cast down the throne and overturn the kingdom, he for the time being, or during the interregnum, called the Gentiles to power, and placed the scepter of universal dominion in the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon. Daniel asserts this in the following language: "Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory. And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath he given into thine hands, and hath made thee ruler over them all." Dan. ii. 37, 38. God gave him this kingdom. But when in the pride of his heart he forget from whom he received his power, saying, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?" God brought him into judgment, and humbled his proud heart, by depriving him of his reason for a period of seven years. When his understanding returned unto him, he was convinced and acknowledged that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. Dan. iv. 30-37. Jehovah called Nebuchadnezzar his servant (Jer. xxv. 9; xxvii. 6; xliii. 10), and he used him to punish kings and nations—Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, Zidon, Judah and Egypt; "and all nations shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son, until the time of his land is also come in its turn; when many nations and great kings shall make it serve." Jer. xxvii. 7. That time came when Belshazzar made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine to his gods out of the gold and silver vessels, taken from the temple at Jerusalem. Whilst thus carousing, his doom is written by supernatural means, in strange characters, upon the wall. Daniel is called, who rehearses the story of Nebuchadnezzar being driven from his kingly throne to associate with the beasts of the field, "till he knew that the most high God ruled in the kingdom of men, and that he appointeth over it whomsoever he will. And thou, his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knowest all this," etc. Dan. v. 20-24. He was weighed in the balances, and found wanting; and his kingdom was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. The historian adds, "In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain, and Darius the Median took the kingdom."

It is not necessary to follow the history of the empires which followed the Babylonian. I have called attention more particularly to the first in order to show that God has given the world into the hands of Gentile rulers, beginning with Nebuchadnezzar. The nations to whom dominion was given are pointed in the metallic image which the king saw in his dream. Daniel gave the interpretation. Undoubtedly Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome, are referred to. These four great empires reach from the overturning of the kingdom of Israel to its restoration under Jesus Messiah, and fill the whole of the intervening space of time. The kingdom of God restored to Israel will be fifth in order. The fourth, or Roman, will last until the fifth comes. This will be the end of Gentile dominion. While the fourth empire exists the times of the Gentiles continue. When these times end, the fourth kingdom will be broken to pieces, and its territory and peoples pass under the dominion of the fifth in order—the kingdom which the God of heaven will set up.

There are some things connected with the fourth universal empire which are worthy [illegible] The symbols [illegible] two legs [illegible] and feet of Dan. ii. and vii. are peculiarly marked when the fourth kingdom is described. In the latter it is represented by legs of iron, and feet part of iron and part of clay, signifying while confined to the iron element, power to break in pieces and bruise; but when mixed with clay, as in the feet and toes, a divided state partly strong and partly brittle. In Daniel's vision of the fourth beast, vii. 7, with great iron teeth, the terrible and destructive character of the Roman empire is set forth. Moreover, it had ten horns which the angel explains to Daniel to be ten kings which shall arise out of this kingdom; and the little horn which came up amongst them and plucked up three, signifies a king which shall arise after them; he shall be diverse from the first, and subdue three kings. This king will be a bold, blasphemous and cruel persecutor. He continues his despotic career until the judgment shall sit, when his dominion shall be taken away, and be given to the people of the saints of the Most High. The ten horns, and especially the little horn, are found upon the head of the beast when the beast is slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame. As these symbols represent the fourth kingdom, the Roman empire will reach to the end.

So also in the image-symbol, the feet and toes were the last formed. The legs of iron, and the feet and toes of iron and clay, all represent the fourth kingdom. The clay element is introduced last, and belongs especially to the toes. Dan. ii. 42-44. Iron is strength—clay brittleness. They do not adhere to each other. Modern nations are well represented by these elements. They are both strong and weak. Republicanism is killing many of the old monarchies, and when the feet and toes are fully formed will permeate the European nations. The image was a perfect symbol, without doubt, and had five toes on each foot; so we may look for five kingdoms in Western Rome, and five also in Eastern Rome.

The present war with Turkey is necessary to clear the way for the development of these kingdoms on the territory which she now occupies. Hence it is probable that Russia will be successful, but she cannot hold the territory alone—a partition must be the result.

The ten horns on the fourth beast correspond to the toes on the feet of the image. And as the toes are not yet formed so as to be identified and properly placed, so also of the ten horns. The little horn is to come up among these, and subdue three of them. Daniel's attention is arrested by the wonderful career and character of this power. The angel informs him that "he shall speak great words against the Most High, and wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand, until a time, and times, and the dividing of time." Dan. vii. 25. This period reaches to the judgment, when his dominion is taken away.

Daniel is favored with another vision, and further information respecting this little horn, in Dan. viii. This little horn power is shown to be of Grecian origin, or to arise out of what was formerly Grecian territory. He is described as a king of fierce countenance, and understanding deep schemes. "And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and holy people." "He shall also stand up against the Prince of princes, but he shall be broken without a human hand." Dan. viii. 23-25.

This power rises at the end of Gentile times—the last end of the indignation. This is also the prince that shall come, who shall make a covenant with many for one week—the last week of the seventy—and then break it. The termination of this week, when that which is determined shall be poured out upon the desolator, reaches to the end, when everlasting righteousness shall be brought in. Dan. ix. 24-27.

Now let us look at Rev. xiii. John sees a beast rise out of the sea. Daniel's four beasts came up out of the sea. Dan. vii. 2, 3. [illegible] This beast, however, is particularly described as having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy. These points of resemblance but prove this fourth beast of Daniel's and that which John saw, to be the same power. Both have the horns, but the first one has also seven heads. The horns are crowned, and the heads bear blasphemous titles. This apocalyptic beast unites in the features of the three beasts which succeeded Grecia—Medo-Persia, and Babylon—the leopard, the bear, and the lion. The dragon—whatever that may be—gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority. This power also has a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies. He blasphemes God, his name, his tabernacle, and those who dwell in heaven. He continues for forty-two months,—the same length of time as that before mentioned in Dan. vii. 25—he also makes war with the saints, and overcomes them. This beast does not represent the Roman empire throughout its existence, but only in its last phase. The beast had seven heads. In Rev. xvii. the angel explains to John—"The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth. And there are seven kings: five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space." In chapter xiii., one of these heads is seen as it were wounded to death; then the deadly wound is healed. This is "the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth unto perdition." The character which this beast manifests is about the same as that of the little horn, only portrayed more fully. The time of their persecuting power is the same—three years and a half—and both reach to the judgment and perdition. As the eighth rises out of the seven, and is of the seven, so the little horn comes up among the ten horns,—both also become chief actors, continue only a short space, and are finally destroyed. This is the resuscitated Roman empire, under one head, the eighth. The head will then control the beast, and "power will be given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations." In fact, this implies universal dominion, such as Rome exercised in its first days. This beast has also ten horns. "And the ten horns which thou sawest, are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast. These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast." Rev. xvii. 12, 13. Mark the short space of time—one hour—that they receive power with the beast. These kings "shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. For God hath put in their hearts to fulfill his will, and to agree, and to give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God be fulfilled." Verses 16, 17. Thus they become God's executioners upon "Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." This also proves that this beast and the ten horns he carries, are only to be found in the very last days of Gentile times. And another point which strengthens this conclusion is that these same powers make war with the Lamb, and he overcomes them.

We have now arrived in our investigation to the closing scene of Gentile supremacy—the very last phase of the fourth kingdom. Daniel's prophecies and John's revelation bring us to the same point of time, viz.: The coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven, in power and great glory. This coming is to execute judgment upon this power which blasphemed the Most High. Daniel says: "I beheld because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." Dan. vii. 11, 25, 26. He also says, that when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance will stand up against the Prince of princes, but he shall be broken without hand. Dan. viii. 23-25. He also speaks of a certain king who shall do according to his will, and exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished: but he shall come to his end, and none [illegible] Dan. xi. 36. 1877.

Before we shall have issued another RESTITUTION, 1877 will be numbered with the periods, whether reckoned as moments, years, or measureless ages, that are alike lost in the abysms of a past everlasting, whose infinite duration, stretching back to the dateless unbeginning, is filled with the existence of the Infinite and Eternal. As it sinks and disappears in those fathomless depths forever, to give place to its successor, 1878, we may well pause a moment to cast a glance backward on the past, contemplate briefly the present, and, through the telescope of prophecy, forecast the near future so far as the sight of dim mortality can penetrate the obscurity of the mysterious hereafter. In the past, if we only retrospect the history of humanity, we contemplate scenes and changes that fill up a dark and sorrowful record. Only one vision of transcendent beauty and loveliness is pictured on the canvas of time. As our world came finished from the hands of its all-wise and benevolent Creator, morning stars sang over a blooming Paradise, and all the Sons of God shouted for joy as they surveyed the grandeur of the new creation. But the serpent spoiler entered the glad garden of God, and seduced its happy inmates into rebellion; the blighting curse fell upon creation's gorgeousness; beauties that were the admiration of heaven faded away, and man, expelled from Eden's healthful bowers and the tree of life, commenced his course of decay, destined to end in his return to the primal earth from which he was taken.

Since that expulsion the flight of time has been over continued desolations. Empires have arisen only to fall, and proud cities have been builded only to become homeless wastes. Around the base of the still standing remains of Thebes, the oldest of cities, the hot sands of the desert are drifting, while its myriads of mummied dead repose in the countless sepulchres excavated for miles along the sweep of the neighboring Lybian hills. It can no longer send forth an army of 20,000 men and 200 chariots, from each of its hundred gates.

If we turn to proud Nineveh, the once exalted capital of the great Assyrian Empire, the Lord has made an utter end of its place "with an overrunning flood," and its history is now disclosing through the interpretation of a dialect older than the classic tongue in which Homer sang the downfall of Ilium. An arrow-headed language, impressed on the scattered and buried bricks, and the broken slabs that once paneled the entrances to its gorgeous courts, has been deciphered to unfold its former grandeur. Babylon in its turn became the wonder of the world; but the proud walls of the golden city have been broken down, and its high gates have been burned with fire. The wild beast of the desert now meets the wild beast of the island on its desolate heaps, and the satyr dances on the ruined sites of palaces where manly strength and womanly beauty once revaled.

Jerusalem had once a name and a praise in the whole earth, but the abominations of desolation have displaced its sacred fanes, and the infidel foot has trodden down its holy places through the centuries of its captive's long and weary exile. The church, too, of the past has marched a bloody pathway through a frightful howling desert, lined, along its dreadful length, with the graves of its millions of martyred slain.

Turning to the present, and the picture only deepens in sadness. Famine and fire, flood, pestilence and war, are reveling in perfect death-sport in sweeping the world with besoms of destruction; and "men's hearts are failing them for fear and for looking for those things that are coming on the earth."

Looking to the future, darkest clouds curtain its heavens, betokening the coming of a tempest of wrath to result in such a time of trouble as has never been since there was a nation. Sure—

> "We are living, we are dwelling,
> In a grand and awful time;
> In an age on ages telling,
> To be living is sublime."

But, O church of God, beyond the sweep of the near and world-wide desolations of the gathering wrath-storm, dawns the bright day of God, bringing earth's regeneration, and a new-born Paradise, Israel's Hope, and earth's Deliverer, will soon flood the heavens with the light, and the earth with the glory of his coming. He comes for his church. Soon from the rock-hewn sepulcher, from the grave in the clay, from the arctic snow, from the wind-scattered ashes of burned martyrs, and from the depths of the sea where the tiny coral insect has built the drowned saint a tomb, will resurrection power emancipate a bride for the King of kings. The kingdom of God is now nigh at hand. O thou left over remnant of the royalty of Faith, lift up the head and rejoice, for the King is now at the door. We hail thy advent, O Messiah of God, and as thou hast said "surely I come quickly and truly"—our glad hearts respond—even so, come, Lord Jesus. Come, and bring thy church its long-deferred redemption; come, and bring a sin-cursed world restitution; come, and bring a dying world health and cure come, and bring a warring world peace and repose; come, and bring the feathery palm and the rose to earth's arid deserts; come, wipe the tears from earth's weeping millions; come, O come, and bring life to the sleeping dead. Grant that with girded loins, and well trimmed, blazing, lamps we may go forth to meet thee, should'st thou come in 1878. Stand by us through the watches of this last dark night. At last give us the crown to place at thy feet. O loved Redeemer, for thou hast "loved us, and washed us from our sins in thy own blood."

The Son of God.

A triumph indeed would Satan achieve could he persuade us to deny the Sovereign Lord who bought us, by our accepting the heresy insidiously working among us of Jesus "the Root and offspring of David, the bright and morning star" being Joseph's natural son. He whom the angels are commanded to worship;—to whom it is said "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever;" also:—"Thou, Lord, in the beginning didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands," is not one begotten by the husband of Mary; a natural man merely is not the Redeemer! The seed of the woman truly is He, and he is also the only begotten Son of God. Perish THE RESTITUTION rather than it be a vehicle for the countenance of this damnable heresy privily introduced among us. Let it be denounced with detestation, its propagators be discarded, and their teachings appear only to be exposed in their poisonous and devilish tendencies. We hope better things of the editor of THE RESTITUTION, and of evangelists connected with it than to think them inclined to view the blasphemous error as harmless. It is more deadly ruinous than any tenet ever introduced among Adventists or ourselves. Oh, brethren and sisters, be not seduced by those who are laboring to rob us of precious portions of the New Testament. Hold fast the record which has stood for ages. Our foundation is not prophets alone, nor apostles alone; it is both, with the foundation Corner Stone the Anointed Jesus. In this time of peril—worse within than without—let us be wise for ourselves, working out our salvation with fear and trembling. Let us be faithful with ourselves, and with each other. And, while we hold fast the truths of the word uncompromisingly, let us be filled with the Spirit. Eph. v. 18.

E. HAYES.

For ourself we have not the slightest leaning toward the unhappy error so sharply denounced by Brother Hayes. On any such hypothesis the Bible would be to us a most unintelligible book in many of its statements. We long ago learned to repose our faith on what God has revealed concerning the Son of his love, and to utterly discard all the confused and contradictory creeds that an apostate Christianity has endeavored to impose upon the disciples of the Lord Jesus. We do not even except that formulary concocted at Nice, in the summer of A. D. 325, by an assembly of poor fallible men; some of whom, if sober history is reliable, were unworthy to wear the Christian name. See Stanley's Eastern Church, Sec. III. We gladly turn from the definitions of all ecclesiastical gladiators, in their intrigues and quarrels, to what God has taught us in his holy word. No theory ever yet proposed has fully explained the relations of the Divine Father and Son and we repudiate them all. Our faith, however, embraces every text, concerning the glory of our Redeemer. The salvation of our lost world is placed in the hands of one mighty to save. We do not explain away any such texts as Micah v. 2; John viii. 58; 1 Cor. x. 9, and many others. While making this explanation for ourself, we leave each one to his own conclusions as to the teachings of the oracles of God. There has been no controversy on this subject as yet in THE RESTITUTION. We most certainly do not desire any. We shall not crowd our own views upon our readers. We will probably give a selection next week from J. B. McCulloh's Credibility of the Scriptures with whose statements we, in the main, concur.

The present number brings us to the close of our editorial responsibilities for one year. In our inexperience, we commenced the hazardous experiment of conducting a religious journal, embarassed in its finances, and supported by patrons of quite diverse sentiments, both as regards some principles of the faith, and questions of policy in regard to managing our medium of communication—THE RESTITUTION. We entered upon the work with the utmost diffidence, and under grave apprehensions as to the paper's success even for the limited period for which it was committed to our charge. We do not hesitate to say that it is our firm belief that our Heavenly Father has helped us. But we must clear. Some things that we would have said are crowded out for want of room. Correspondents and all others must be patient. The original contributions in this number are commended to our readers, with the expressed hope that the able pens that have produced them will not be laid aside.

The Great Crisis—Rainbow Angel—His Person and Message—Rev. x. 1, 2; 8, 5, 6, 7.

J. P. WEETHEE.

> And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud; and a rainbow (was) upon his head, and his face (was) as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire. And he had in his hand a little book open; and he set his right foot upon the sea, and (his) left (foot) on the earth, and cried with a loud voice, as (when) a lion roareth. And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his hand to heaven, and sware by him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven, and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer. But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets.

Such are the words of King James' Translation.

The Greek words (above translated, "There should be time no longer,") are literally rendered, "The time is not yet."

Verse 7. Alla en tais hēmerais tēs phōnēs tou hebdomou angelou, hotan mellēi salpizein, kai etelesthē to mustērion tou Theou, hōs euēngelisen tous heautou doulous tous prophētas.

But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel while he shall delay to sound the trumpet the mystery of God shall be finished, as he hath declared by his servants the prophets.

The Angel.—Some expositors, from its habiliments and powers, have called the Son of God; this, however, would seem incorrect since it is called "another angel." His oath is not in his own name.

The Greek word, translated angel, means messenger, one sent. In the Apocalypse, they are, sometimes, human beings, saints, priests, assistants of our Great High Priest, who arose after his resurrection, and ascended with him. See Matt. xxvii. 53; Acts i. 9; 1 Cor. xv. 20; Heb. xii. 1; Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 8, 9. Angels may be, therefore, of our race, or they may belong to a higher order of beings. In the revelations made to John, they appear to be of two classes, those that carry messages, and division agents. The rainbow angel belonged to the former, the angel with the trumpet, the latter class. The movement of the angels are under Divine guidance. To which order this being properly belonged, (to the priesthood, or to the higher order of creation,) is not stated. He seems to be deeply interested in his mission.

1. His Message.—"The Time is not Yet."—What time? The time when the mystery of God should be finished. It appears that the saints were expecting the consummation of all things under the voice of the seven thunders. This messenger is sent to correct this false impression, and to give its true location—under the voice of the seventh angel while he shall delay to sound the trumpet. He, therefore, corrects the error, and states the appointed era.

The seven thunders are supposed to cover the period of the reformation under Martin Luther. During that era the political and ecclesiastical heavens were exceedingly tempestuous. The Vatican uttered its thunders of excommunication. These were echoed by the Holy Roman (Romano-German) empire, when it drew its sword, and thundered forth its voice in defence of the doctrines of the Papal See.

Christians then looked for the coming of Christ to destroy the man of sin. They concluded that the gospel mission was about completed, and that the day of their triumph was soon to dawn. The angel proclaims the important news that the mystery of God was not to be finished under the closing scenes of the sixth trumpet, called the seven thunders, but under the delay of the seventh trumpet.

That "little book" of prophetic history and other records of great events to transpire before the completion of the mystery of God. The disastrous events of the Eastern Church under the Turks may already been given to John and placed upon record (Rev. ix.). A little book of the records of the trials of the Western Church is now given for John to eat renewed for future use). It was pleasing to have an open book, but its contents, containing the persecutions of the Western Christians, were painful and bitter. This book was a kind of appendix to the larger book (Rev. v. 5,) and appears to have contained the former part of the succeeding chapter, verses 1-14, which is an important supplement to the ninth chapter, as it gives a general account of the state of the Eastern Church, and all connected with it during the period of the 6th and sixth trumpets."—Baxter.

The time to finish the proclamation was to be in the days of the voice of the seventh angel while he shall delay to sound the trumpet, the mystery of God should be finished.

The message of the rainbow angel contains three distinct elements, one negative, (the time is not yet,) and two positive: (1) the voice of the seventh angel while he shall delay to sound: (2) the mystery of God shall be finished.

The first element (the time is not yet,) we have explained. We now call attention to the second element, delay.

The first five trumpets are consecutive, since no time is named as intervening. There is, therefore, no space between the first and second woes. Of the second and third woes it is said, "The second woe is past; behold, behold the third woe cometh quickly." Rev. xi. 14. The second woe terminates. A space of time follows before the third woe commences. That space belongs to neither trumpet, but is a short delay previous to the sounding of the seventh trumpet. That space has three appellations: (1) quickly, because the time is short, compared with the periods before and after it. God makes a short work of his final warnings.

2. It is called a delay since the sixth and seventh trumpets are not consecutive. Our common translation says, "Begin to sound." We render it delay. The word מחל, means delay. Matt. ii. 13; Jno. iv. 47; Luke xiii. 9; Acts xxii. 16. Mello I am about to do. I linger, procrastinate, delay, defer. The following are its definitions as given by standard lexicographers: To be about, on the point of; to design, intend, be bent upon; to be wont or accustomed; to linger, delay, loiter; procrastinate, defer; to hesitate, demur (Grove), cunctor, moror, differo, (L. S. Schehner). Parkhurst says thus, to delay (Acts xxii. 16). This is the use of the best Greek authors. See to pause With an infinitive following. "To be about to be, or to do anything." Matt. ii. 13; xvi. 27; xvii. 12; Jno. iv. 47; vi. 6. What is to come, Matt. iii. 7; xii. 32; Acts xxiii. 30; xxiv. 15, 25; see Job iii. 8; Jer. xix. 2; xxix. 10; Rev. i. 19; ii. 13; iii. 10, 16; vi. 11; viii. 13. These imply a delay of an event then future. There must, therefore, be a delay in the sounding of the seventh trumpet.

3. Voice of the Seventh Angel.—Some may understand the voice of the seventh angel to signify that the angel himself speaks, and consequently, that no particular gospel proclamation is here intended. Its true meaning will appear if we examine what is understood in other scriptures. In Acts xiii. 27, we have the following:

"For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew not him, nor yet the voices of the prophets, which are read every Sabbath day."

The Jews that read the writings of the prophets were their voices; one that utters the words of another, is his voice; those that utter in advance the events of seventh angel are his voice. We understand that God designed that the events, to transpire after the seventh angel sounds the trumpet, should be proclaimed to the world in advance, and that men selected for that purpose are truly the voice of that trumpet messenger.

It is called the voice of the seventh angel, since that body proclaims the events to transpire during the sounding of that trumpet. These events may be learned by reading Rev. xi. 15, 17, 18:

"And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven saying, The kingdoms of this world are become (the kingdoms) of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever. And the four and twenty elders which sat before God on their seats, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, and art to come; because thou hast taken to thee thy great power, and hast reigned. And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name small and great; and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth."

We learn from the passages above quoted that the resurrection, and judgment, the giving of rewards, and infliction of punishments, are events which belong to the seventh trumpet, as well as the reign of Christ. The character of the seventh trumpet will be the more fully understood by establishing its identity with certain others named in the scriptures. The seventh trumpet is the millennial trumpet as appears from Rev. xi. 15. All will agree that those trumpets, which include the same leading events, are one. We proceed, therefore, to prove that the Elect Trumpet (Matt. xxiv. 31), the Advent Trumpet (1 Thes. iv. 16, 17), the Last Trumpet (1 Cor. xv. 51, 52), and the seventh Trumpet (Rev. xv. 15) include the same leading events, and are, therefore, identical.

1. Elect Trumpet.—"They shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. And he will send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they will gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Matt. xxiv. 37. What events here take place? When do they occur?

a. The Events.—Two events are clearly defined, others are implied. Christ comes in the clouds, the elect are gathered. Multitudes of that class now sleep. This gathering, therefore, must include the first resurrection, which takes place at the coming of Christ. This series includes the advent, the first resurrection, and the gathering of the saints.

b. The Time of the Series.—When does this chain of events begin to transpire? Understanding this prediction to be a literal historic narrative, the appearing of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven in his second personal advent is its commencement.

2. The Advent Trumpet.—"The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of an archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we who are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17.

a. The Events are: first, the appearing of Christ; second, the sounding of the trump of God by an archangel; third, the first resurrection: fourth, the gathering of the elect.

b. The Time.—It commences with the second personal appearing of our Savior. The first resurrection, which is an implied event of the elect trumpet, is here distinctly stated. The elect and advent trumpets, including the same series of events, and commencing at the same time, are identical.

3. The Last Trumpet.—"We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised, incorruptible, and we shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52.

a. The Events.—The events represented are: first, the sounding of the last trumpet: second, the first resurrection; third, the change to immortality of the living saints. The events implied are: first, the second advent of Christ: second, the gathering of the elect; for when the first resurrection takes place, according to 1 Thess. iv. 16, Christ appears, and the elect are gathered.

b. The Time.—This is clearly at the second coming of our Lord, since the dead are raised to immortality at the sounding of this trumpet. The elect, the advent, and the last trumpets, including the same events, and beginning to sound at the same time, are one.

4. The Seventh Trumpet.—"And the seventh angel sounded" (see above), Rev. xi. 15, 18.

b. The Events.—The events of the series expressed, are: first, the judgment of the dead; second, the saints rewarded; third, the destruction of the destroyers. Those implied, are: first, the appearing of Christ; second, the first resurrection; three, the gathering of the elect; for Paul says, in his charge to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 1), that the dead are judged at Christ's appearing and his kingdom; and in his letter to the Thessalonian Church, he says that the dead in Christ are raised and gathered at his appearing. The dead are judged at his appearing; but the dead are judged under the seventh trumpet, consequently the appearing of Christ takes place under the sounding of the seventh trumpet. The righteous receive their reward when they are crowned, which, according to 2 Tim. v. 8, takes place at the day of Christ's appearing.

b. The Time.—The time of the sounding of the seventh trumpet is not fixed by the events themselves, but the second advent of our savior. The seventh trumpet is a woe trumpet. It is clear that the seventh is the last trumpet. There being but one series of trumpets, and seven in that series, the seventh and last are the same; it was first, second, third, for the fifth, sixth, seventh, or last. The elect, the advent, the last, are the seventh are one and the same.

5. Judgment Trumpet.—"I charge (thee) therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing, and his kingdom." 2 Tim. iv. 1. No trumpet is here named, but his appearing, the judgment of the living and the dead, and his kingdom, are to meet. But the kingdom appears also the dead are judged when the seventh trumpet sounds. During the delay, to sound the seventh trumpet, the voice of the seventh angel is heard proclaiming the coming of Christ, the resurrection, judgment, the destruction of those that destroy the earth, and the establishment of the kingdom of God. This work seems to be the finishing of the mystery of God. This work is preparatory, as it is under the voice in the days of the delay. Are we now living in those days? Are not these the themes which have commanded our special attention as "meat in due season"?

Concluding remarks on our first proposition.—We have submitted Rev. x. 6, 7, to a critical examination, and have seen that it brings to view a short delay between the close of the events of the sixth trumpet, and the sounding of the seventh, called the "days of the voice of the seventh angel." The original justifies that position. God's usual method of dealing with mankind, demands such a delay.

The sixth trumpet leaves the righteous and the wicked associated in the same communities and nations. The wheat and tares grow together till the harvest, which is at the end of the age. The final judgments do not fall on the people of God. Some agency must be employed to separate the two classes. A timely notice of the coming danger is God's method of securing the end designed. He sent Noah before the flood. Messengers were dispatched to warn Lot. Prophets were sent to the Jews before their captivity in Babylon. He sent his Son previous to their great dispersion.

Jesus makes an analogy between the flood and his second coming. He taught his disciples to look for the signs of his approach, and taught that some of his servants would proclaim an advent while others would say, "My Lord delayeth his coming."

We are fully persuaded that such a warning must be given, and for that purpose he appoints a short delay.

Sententious Paragraphs.

That pilot dies nobly, says Seneca, who perishes in the storm with the helm in his hand.

> "Thy mercies make swift wings to exalt the Lord,
> Nor will I silent be;
> O rather let the cease to breathe,
> Than cease from praising thee."

CIRCUMSPECTION.

A cautious tongue insures prosperity, and adherence to industry averts want. The unwary forfeit esteem.

RESIGNATION.

The sage observes, resignation is the crown of mankind; for avarice is poverty, resignation liberty, and suspense slavery. Regard the world as a blank, and thy share therein as an unexpected prize. The incessant solicitation of favors from mortals betokens lack of faith in God.

The beauty of holiness is a beauty that never fades. There is no decay from time, no deformity from overstrain, and no loss of form or bloom from the burden and heat of the day. And it hath not yet attained, neither is already perfect. It doth not even yet appear what it shall be. But it daily gravitates towards the great white light that is round the throne of God.

WHAT IS A LETTER?

> A silent language uttered to the eye,
> Which curious distance would, in vain, deny;
> A tie to bind where circumstances part;
> A nerve of feeling stretched from heart to heart,
> Formed to convey, like an electric chain,
> The mystic flesh—the lightning of the brain,
> And bear at once, along each precious link,
> Affection's life-pulse, in a drop of ink.

Weakness, not strength, comes from a constant survey of the hosts in battle array against you. Power comes into the palsied arm when the eye turns wholly toward the angel of Jehovah, who encampeth around about the believer. Philosophy says, "Grow strong by a downright grapple with the threatening foeman;" but the Gospel of the Old Testament, as well as that of the New, says, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength."—Contributor.

Roman Catholic Reasoning as to the Lord's Supper, Tested by Scripture.

The disciples of Christ do not often meet in argument, members of the Romish church. This is a little strange, seeing that they, like us, are quite controversial. Perhaps it is because the parties are so far apart in word and doctrine, that they hardly ever meet.

It has sometimes happened to me otherwise, and I have held many arguments with skillful and well-trained disputants, both lay and clerical of that church. In this way, some years ago, the subjoined paper came to be written, addressed to one of their most learned and able priests—a convert from the Episcopal ministry—and subsequently known as "Father Curtis," secretary to "His Eminence and Grace, Archbishop Bayley, of Baltimore," deceased.

I do not give his reply to my well-meant effort to reach his conscience, as it was a private letter—sufficient to say it was pretty tart, savoring more of pride than humility—and was sour rather than sharp.

Perhaps the reasoning and Scripture employed in the paper may prove profitable to some of your readers, although wholly lost, I fear, upon him who was originally addressed. Hence I send it to Bill, with your leave, a vacant column in THE RESTITUTION.

A. B. MAGRUDER.

Winchester, Va.

The Following is Submitted to the Intelligence and Candor of W. A. A. Curtis, in all kindness, by Allan B. Magruder.

In Acts xviii. 24–28, there is a beautiful instance and illustration of Christian simplicity and humility—of that child-like docility, without which, as the Great Teacher declared, "No man could be his disciple." Apollos, the learned Alexandrian, taught "diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John, whom, when Aquilla and Priscilla had heard, they took him unto them and expounded unto him the way of the Lord more perfectly." Though an "eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures," Apollos was not too proud to learn the way of the Lord more perfectly from the humble tent-maker and his wife, whom he found to be better instructed in that way than himself. He was not one of that large class who, wise in their own conceits, despise the simple, plain Scriptures, or "make void the Word of God by their traditions." Let us apply the wisdom which Apollos practiced to the discovery of the truth concerning one of the plainest yet most important subjects presented to us in the Bible. I allude to what the Roman Catholic and High Church Episcopalians call "the Holy Eucharist"—but the Bible calls "the communion—the Lord's Supper."

These contend that the bread and wine used, become, "by consecration," the real presence—the actual flesh and blood of our blessed Lord. Can we receive this doctrine as true, so long as it is liable to such objections as these? viz.:

1. That to interpret his words, "This is my body and this is my blood," as intended to teach a purely literal fact, would involve us, by the same mode of construction, into consequences which we plainly perceive to be absurd; for in language equally literal, he teaches "I am the Vine; ye are the branches," and "the Rock that followed them was Christ;" yet we do not maintain that the Son of God became literally a vine or a Rock; or that his disciples were literally branches. By the inexorable logic of the argument, we are bound, however, to maintain the literal signification in both instances.

2. Such a construction is forbidden by his own words when he says, in consequence of his disciples murmuring at his language, (understood by them in a literal sense) "Doth this offend you?"... it is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profit nothing; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, they are life."

Now, does not this clearly imply that his language is not to be understood literally but in a spiritual sense? If otherwise, why make any explanation of that which had offended them? And he says "the flesh profits nothing." Now, if the bread be his flesh, can it be maintained that it "profits nothing?" If so, why partake of it at all? Why do a superfluous thing? Why do that which we are assured "profits nothing?" What would our Lord say of any command of God if it at all "profits nothing?" Would he give his disciples a command which, by the enjoyment that it is the very body of our Lord and is flesh, thus "profits nothing?" Now we escape all this contradiction and dilemma by the opposite construction of his words, which above is free from contradiction and in harmony with the context.

Again, does not the argument prove too much and so is shown to be unsound? Do any really believe that the Apostles who sat with him at the table when the Supper was first instituted, actually, then and there, ate the flesh from his body and really drank the blood from his veins? Yet the exigency of the argument employed by the literalists, requires that conclusion, for he said, "this is my body, this is my blood," and these words they say must be understood in their strict literal sense!

3. But even if this was actually true and really happened when he had a flesh and blood body, it cannot be so now, for he no longer possesses such a body to give his disciples to eat, or any blood to give them to drink. He says of his post-resurrection body, "a spirit (or phantom) hath not flesh and bones as you see me have," (Luke xxiv. 39,) not flesh and blood, for, in truth, he lost all the blood from his body in the crucifixion. Pierced by the cruel nails in his hands and feet, with blood streaming from his head encircled by the sharp thorns—sweating, as it were, great drops of blood, and the long and keen spear of the Roman soldier piercing his side and his heart, all the purple current of life flowed forth from his numerous wounds, so that when deposited in Joseph's tomb, he was, as he says of himself, only "flesh and bones"—a bloodless body.

It was fit that it should be so, for, "without the shedding of blood, there could be no remission of sins;" and it is written, "He poured out his soul (life) unto death"—that is, he bled to death. The sinless life ebbs away with the vital current of the blood, for "the life (of man) is in the blood"... and we are expressly taught, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; "neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." If, therefore, there be any blood in the wine of the Supper now, it does not come from Emanuel's veins, for confessedly he does not possess it himself in his incorruptible resurrection body.

4. But, finally, if the bread be flesh, and the wine be blood, why does not the real fact appear? Why are our senses permitted to contradict the assertion? Why should this be the only one of the miracles of Christ which was not demonstrable to the senses? Why do we not see that the actual flesh and the real blood are present and can be handled? When he raised Lazarus from the dead, there was physical, sensible proof of the fact. The people, by their senses, recognized and identified the man who had been dead, then and there, alive before them. And to select a closely analagous case for illustration when at Cana of Galilee, he turned the water into wine, was not the fact literally and physically manifest to all? It was unquestionably; for in drinking the wine which had been water, the guests said to the Bridegroom, "thou hast kept the good wine until now." It was, then, evidently wine and not water—so in the case supposed—in the "Eucharist," it should be evidently and unmistakably, blood and not wine, as we see and know it is. If really otherwise, how easy to prove it?

5. But there is another and even better circumstantial proof of the error of the Roman Catholic reasoning derived from the practice of that church. They quote the words of Jesus, (to support their theory), "Except ye eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of Man, ye have no life in you" (John vi. 53,) and yet they forbid and withhold from the laity—the unofficial members—of the church—the wine—that very blood which, if they drink not, they "have no life in them," and so cannot be saved! A logical felo de se.

In conclusion, let us take heed and remember that "He that is of God, heareth God's words." "Examine your selves and see if ye be in the faith." "Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they be of God." "In vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men" (institutions merely human).

Old Families.

There are few things appertaining to the flesh of which men in my country (Scotland) are prouder than that of being members of an old family. Many a worthy tradesman there is, who has passed with great credit through all the stages of message-boy, shopman, salesman, traveler, fortunate speculator, until a retiring competency has become a landed country gentleman, with a large mansion house, park, cottar's (serfs') lodge, livery servants, and in public and fine linen fares sumptuously every day, who, nevertheless, feels those things avail nothing so long as he sits at his gate (he humbling Mordecai, who makes him feel as an upstart and not a member of an old family. He desires, therefore above all things, to be connected, even by an almost invisible thread, with some authentic piece of antiquity. He would willingly give a large sum for a drop of ancient blood, and bitterly feels that money cannot purchase it. The "old old family," again, is proud of its heraldry. It boasts of its long ancestry. "Our family came over with William the Conqueror." Is generally the extreme of their alleged origin; and that is very mythical, albeit the family pictures of large, stupid looking gentlemen with wigs, ladies in still broader, or one or two dead knights reprecenting knights in armor. As old Sir Thomas Brown says, "Gravestones tell truth scarce forty years; generations pass while some trees stand, and old families last not three oaks. The Jews are an exception. Moses, the old-clothes man, has an ancestry which puts the purest and most ancient stock of the house of peers to shame. Where was the blood of all the Howards, or of the Plantagenets, when the ancestors of "Old Cle" were defying Pharaoh or combating Sennacherib? I was forcibly reminded of this on one occasion, when standing beside a learned Jew in the Royal Museum in Berlin, and looking at the fine antique statue of Julius Cæsar, at the end of the room. I happened to remark to my friend, "Is it not strange to look at the intellectual features of that 'hook-nosed fellow of Rome,' as Falstaff calls him, and to think of his triumphant march northward and his conquest of Britain, when our ancestors were roving barbarians, painting themselves with ochre, and exhibiting all the brutality and coarseness of New Zealand savages?" "Our ancestors!" exclaimed my Jewish friend, looking at me with disdain. "Pray speak for your own, who, I have no doubt, were sufficiently savage. But as for mine, they had been singing the Psalms of David and worshipping God as members of his true church on earth centuries before Julius Cæsar was born."

I bowed my head, and felt that both I and the antique statue were of yesterday, when compared with the old blood which flowed in the veins and flushed in the face of my eloquent friend. Beautifully has Dr. Harris said of the Jews, "As the modern traveler surveys the remains of the Arch of Titus at Rome, he feels bewildered in endeavoring to realize the distant date of its erection, and yet it commemorates only the last of a long series of Jewish dispersions."

You read of the fragments of antiquity dug up from the ruins of Babylon, and your mind is carried still further back than by the Roman arch; but the Jew possibly formed the Babylonian brick, and imprinted on it those arrow-headed characters. The Pyramids of Egypt take your imagination still further back; the Jew, not improbably, helped to build the oldest of them. Enter the most ancient of the royal tombs at Thebes, and mark the national physiognomies painted on the walls. You recognize that of the Jew, unaltered to the present day. Time was young when the Lord said to Abram, "I will make of thee a great nation." Strong faith has never ceased to exist among the great rabbis of the Jews, and in the coming of a day when the once noble but now rising race shall have their own again, and be no longer despised and trodden down by the Gentile nations. What an abiding hope in the restoration of a kingdom to Israel is expressed—what indomitable pride and ambition, which the sorrows of eighteen centuries have not crushed, is confessed in the commentary of an old Jew upon the promise made by God to Abram. "I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth." "Yes," he says, "as the dust of the earth, which for a time all men tread under foot, but, nevertheless, in the end covers all men overhead."

"When Zion by the mighty Lord
Built up again shall be,
In glory then, and majesty,
To men appear shall he."

Something Rich.

Editor Restitution:—I meet with and send you an item clipped from one of your cotemporaries, that speaks for its author as well as for itself. It says:

"Daniel, while 'in the province of Elam,' on the further side of the Tigris, away in the East, speaks of the extreme eastern part of Europe as the west, (viii. 5,) and of Northern Asia, exclusive of nearly all of Asia Minor, as the North, (xi. 18-30,) and of Egypt as the South for Egypt was called 'the king of the south' because the throne of the Ptolemies was here. And the seleucids was called the king of the North because the seat of government was at Antioch, north of Egypt. If expositors would mind these facts they would prevent confusion and misapplication of prophetic truth."

The above reminds us of what a very credible preacher is reported to have once said to his congregation in Cincinnati, Ohio, that so evincing the wisdom and goodness of God in his special providences to man, he had noticed that "God had almost invariably made commodious harbors contiguous to, and deep navigable rivers to run by large cities! Able divines would avoid misinterpreting Scripture and preventing confusion if they would heed these facts." Of course the formation of the rivers and harbors was the result of the pre-existent cities, and there never was "the South" until Ptolemy's throne made it, nor a North until the Seleucids had their seat of government at Antioch! "The north and the south thou hast created them. Tabor Hermon shall rejoice in thy name." Psa. lxxxix. 12. The land that should not be sold, and the city called after his name, was and is "center!"

LONDON, Dec. 24.—A correspondent at Bucharest telegraphs: "It is impossible to find out anything concerning the condition of the Turkish prisoners en route from Plevna, or the Russian troops caught on the march by the snow storm."

"The cold weather and driving snow produced a terrible effect upon the transport train, which halted near Cotracenci, a suburb of Bucharest, to await the cessation of the storm Sunday. The wagons and horses were entirely buried in the snow, and working parties were extricating the train. Fifty horses and twenty-nine men had been found dead. The men had sought shelter in the wagons, and were frozen within half a mile of Cotracenci."

It is said that 25,000 men, with seventy cannon, have lately passed Galatz. Part of these crossed the Danube by the Ibrail bridge, while the rest went in the direction of Kalarash. It is thought that those reinforcements will join General Zimmerman and operate against the eastern side of the quadrilateral, primarily against Silistria, while a division of grenadiers and a division of reserve, formerly before Plevna, will go to Biela and join the Twelfth Army Corps, for the siege of Rustchuk.

A dispatch from Constantinople says the Servians attempted to carry Vaire by assault, and had been repulsed with an immense loss. They were pursued by the garrison to Yavor, about five miles distant.

A portion of the British fleet in Besika Bay is expected to proceed to the Gulf of Volo.

BUCHAREST, December 24.—It is expected the Russian headquarters will shortly be transferred from Bogot to Selvi, which is about twenty-five miles southwest of the former place.

ALEXANDRIA, Dec. 24.—Half of the Egyptian contingent, destined to reinforce the Turkish army, left here this morning, it is rumored, for Crete. The troops were mostly blacks.

ERZEROUM, Dec. 24.—The snow has ceased. The weather is now fine, and will facilitate the operations of the Russians. Reconnoitering detachments of the Russian cavalry frequently appear in the villages in the plain of Erzeroum.

The Turkish telegraph communication is threatened. It is believed the siege of this place will soon begin, as the Russian forces are overwhelming, and Russian infantry is advancing into the plain of Erzeroum.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Bradshaw, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, real minister of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a sleeping, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever, and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 350 pp. postage 10c. Paper cover, 35c; postage 5c.

Durable and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A. late Prebendary of Cork, Ireland. 250 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly due to its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words translated by forms referred to to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 10c.

We have had this book with freely satisfactory. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has held hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is certainly proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance.... We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will speedily be much more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this gradually enlightened department of Christian theology.—The Rainbow.

Mystery, or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 2d edition. Price $1.25; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, much logic, and a clear and readable style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Monopoly.

Bible Echo. Volume I., May to December, edited by W. Kelloway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the news concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of Immortality. Price $2.75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II., January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III., July to September, 1875. This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo, New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 3 numbers of last year, is $2.50.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Enquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, to the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the gardener, and the household. 328 pp. Price 60c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Sunset Words for Home Scenes. Nearly 300 pp. Well printed on heavy tinted paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 60c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of none other in every way so pleasing to those who see the necessity of maintaining the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be more than content, we would be proud, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and gifted lady, the author.... Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so original, so forcible, we consider, it will readily be seen, far more extensive will sell. Everybody should possess a copy."—The Bible Echo.

Bible Triumphant. A new supply is expected. Price paper covers, 50c; cloth 75c.

Stanzas.

BY REBECCA THE JESTER.

If I had Judah's cordial shall,
O'er which the first born made to'ld,
In burning tones that loved to dwell
Amongst those vases of trembling gold;
Is to my soul one note were given
Of that high harp, whose sweeter tone
Caught its mighty strain from heaven,
And plowed like fire round Israel's throne.
Up to the deep blue starry sky
Then might my soul aspire, and hold
Communion fervent, strong and high,
With Israel and King and prophet old:
Then might my spirit dare to trace
The path our ancient people trod,
When the cray pillar of Jacob's race
Like faithful servants, walked with God!

But Israel's song, alas! is hushed,
That all her tales of triumph told,
And mute is every voice that gushed
In music to her Harp of gold;
And could my lyre attune its strings
To lofty themes they loved of yore,
Alas! my lips would only sing
All that we were but are no more!
Our hearts are still by Jordan's stream,
And there our footsteps fain would be;
But oh, 'tis like the captive's dream
Of home, his eyes may never see,
A cloud is on our father's grave,
And darkly spreads o'er Zion's hill,
And there their sons are not found like slaves,
Or roam like homeless wanderers still.

Yet, Where the rose of Sharon blooms
And cedars wave their stately head,
Even now, from out the place of tombs,
Breaks a deep voice that stirs the dead.
Through the wide world's tumultuous roar
Resounds clear and sweet the solemn word—
O, lo, virgin daughter, faint no more,
Thy fears are seen, thy prayers are heard.
Wait, though with spirit crushed and broke,
Thy tribes like desert exiles rove.
Though Judah feels the stranger's yoke,
And Ephraim is a home less dove;—
Yet, yet shall Judah's Lion wake,
Yet shall the day of promise come.
Thy sons from iron bondage break,
And God shall lead the wanderers home!"

—New England Magazine.

Selections.

The Theological Thermometer Falling.

The Ecclesiastical Council of the Congregational Church at Indian Orchard, Massachusetts, recently declined to install the Rev. Mr. Merriam because he could not conscientiously give his assent to the doctrine of everlasting punishment. It having been insinuated, if not boldly asserted, that Congregationalism was drifting away from this dogma and rather leaning to the Universalist view of the future life, the editor of the Congregationalist addressed a circular letter to one hundred representative Congregational clergymen in the North, East and West, wanting to know of them: First, whether, in their judgment, there was in their own churches and neighborhoods any essential departure from the received faith touching everlasting punishment; and, second, whether belief in the doctrine should be insisted on as a pre-requisite to the ministry to the Congregational Church.

Replies to these inquiries were received from eighty of the clergymen addressed. Sixty-seven of these testify, according to the editor's analysis, that there has been no "essential" departure from the faith on this subject, and thirteen are of the opinion that there has been considerable modification of opinion among Congregationalists. Sixty-three insist upon belief in the dogma as prerequisite to the ministry; eight are not prepared to say they might not vote for Mr. Merriam: six would judge each case by itself, and three would have voted for Mr. Merriam, notwithstanding his views of future retribution.

This is an agreeable surprise to the editor of the Congregationalist, who holds fast to the idea of eternal punishment for the wicked, but who feared the minister reports of looseness of faith among Congregationalists might have some foundation in fact. He admits that the medieval idea of a place of material torture has "gradually faded out of our theology," and given place to ideas "less sensuously terrible and more purely scriptural," but, with Professor Shedd, the majority of Congregationalists hold that "it is impossible to eliminate the tenet (of future punishment) from the Christian Scriptures, except by a mutilation of the canon, as a violently capricious exegesis."

The value of the testimony accumulated by the Congregationalist, and which it publishes as editorial, depends upon the meaning given to the phrase "essential departure," as applied to the modification of ideas touching the nature and duration of the punishment of the unrepentant—the non-believers in what are called the essentials of Christian faith and practice. Here is the Rev. Dr. Burton, of Hartford, Connecticut, for example, saying that "where the traditional conception is still held in its full conception, it is held more as an abstraction than it used to be;" and Dr. Noble, of New Haven, answering that "it is true beyond question that the doctrine is not held with the same intensity it once was;" and Dr. Dana, of Norwich, admitting that, while it is an article to which assent is required in a public confession of religion, "it is far less prominent in the beliefs and preachings of the ministers than it used to be."

In the West, too, the process of "fading out" of the old dogmas is as marked as in New England. Dr. Bascom, of Hinsdale, Illinois, writes that while the Churches required assent to this, among other articles, probably a larger proportion of hearers than formerly are unsettled in their belief on this subject; Dr. Adams, of Iowa, that "most of our members are not indoctrinated;" Dr. Slaney, of Monmouth, that it is not held as firmly as formerly, and, while there may be no essential departure, there is less intensity of conviction; Dr. Wolcott, of Ohio, that the people, while clinging to the dogma, "appreciate the moral difficulties of a doctrine which appears to antagonize the humanity of Christendom;" and Dr. Twitchell, of Cleveland, that "there is evidently in the churches somewhat of a wavering in, if not a departure from, settled belief in the doctrine of everlasting punishment."

It is not necessary to go into further details of this mass of testimony. The most significant thing in it is, that the ministers who preach, as well as those who do not preach everlasting punishment; those who hold belief in it essential, as well as those who do not think it essential to the ministry, all agree that the views of the Church on the subject have undergone material change, but that this change does not const itute an "essential departure." Such a confession would have been an unspeakable shock to orthodox Christendom thirty years ago. There is another suspicious feature of this evidence, namely, that the acceptance of the dogma is rather on its historical and traditional authority than on any intellectual correspondence to it on the part of those who subscribe to it. It is taken as a part of the creed, if properly sugar-coated, but in its naked hideousness is rejected. As an abstraction it will go through, like an unpalatable measure tacked on to an appropriation bill. There is no particular enthusiasm to bear about it, and the ministers, therefore, do not deal largely in it from the pulpit. It is one of those dogmas that will bear letting alone severely; all that is really necessary in the minister is to accept it because it is a part of the standard of the Church.

Such, in substance, is the evidence accumulated by the Congregationalist, and spread out upon its ample pages. Some of the stouter believers hold to it as essential, and take the old-fashioned materialistic view of it; but by far the greater majority have vague ideas as to what will be the nature of the punishment of the wicked; they simply eliminate the pitch and brimstone, and convert the imps and devils with red-hot pokers and pitch-forks into medieval phantasmagoria the creations of distempered imaginations in an age when inexpressible cruelty was the usual evolution of robust faith.—Cincinnati Commercial.

The Age of the Sun.

While some are sedulously employed, endeavoring to show from scientists that our sun is a central furnace to our planetary system, fed by the fuel of aerolites and other opaque bodies falling into it, and that our earth may sooner or later, be added, as a lump of coal, to feed the fire, it might be well to let your readers know that all scientists do not endorse this theory of "combustion." I therefore send you the annexed, to use or not, as you deem best. G. W. STETSON.

Editor.

There has been a long dispute between the physicists and mathematicians on the one hand, and the geologists and biologists on the other, as to the age of the earth, or rather, since that is equally involved, the age of the sun. Dr. Croll, the distinguished Scotch geologist, has recently offered a theory which is not altogether new, but admits of some novel arguments, and which may serve all parties to the dispute. Beginning with a review of the different theories as to the sun's heat, he rejects the combustion theory as totally inadequate, since if the sun were all a mass of burning coal it would not last over 5,000 years; the chemical theory does not prolong the duration sufficiently; the meteoric theory will not serve; the only remaining explanation is the gravitation or condensation theory. This supposes that the materials of the solar system were originally a nebula, extending through a space many times greater than the orbit of Neptune. The falling together, the condensation of this amount of matter, it can be mathematically shown, would supply enough heat to keep the sun at its present temperature for 20,000,000 years. Unfortunately, that period is not sufficient for the geologist. He demands at least 100,000,000 years for the changes of the earth's surface, and would prefer twice that length of time. The arguments of the geologists are almost unanswerable. Those of the biologist who believes in evolution tend to the same point so far as they go. Prof. Croll says that there is a way out of this difficulty by supposing that the nebula was not cold but hot. If you suppose it hot enough to start with, you will have heat enough to carry you through. Obviously it is just as easy to suppose a hot nebula as a cold one. But Prof. Croll proposes to provide for this original heat. If the solar system had originally consisted of two masses, each of half the density of the whole, at some immeasurable distance apart, and they fell foul of each other owing to their mutual gravitation, they would strike with a speed of 254 miles per second. If their motion was stopped by the concussion, an amount of heat would be developed sufficient to convert the whole into a nebula that would take 50,000,000 years to cool. This is decidedly an improvement on the cool nebula. But it supposes that the component halves before they started on their way to a collision, had no motion. Let us suppose, then, they were moving beforehand at the rate of 205 miles per second, and that this speed was added to what they got by gravitating towards each other; then we get, when they struck, a nebula extending beyond Neptune, and with heat enough for a sun for 100,000,000 year's duration. If you insist upon 200,000,000, you must give the original masses a speed of 575 miles per second beforehand. It will be objected that no such motion has been observed in space. Even the planets do not make such fast time; the earth, for instance, going only 1,000 miles in a minute. The fixed stars whose motion has been ascertained travel very much slower. But Prof. Croll says the fixed stars are those that have gone through the collision process and have lost their motion. The new hypothesis gets behind the ordinary nebular theory in point of time, giving an explanation for the formation of the nebulæ. But it presupposes that there may be vast, cold, invisible masses of matter rushing through space with such velocity that their mere touch would convert our globe into red-hot gases and distribute it through infinite space. The conception is not incompatible with the sudden flaming out of a new star and its convertion into the nebula, as seems to have been the case with the Schmidt star in Cygnus; but the facts in that remarkable case were probably not known to Prof. Croll at the time his essay was written.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Perihelion and Pestilence.

If there is anything in "astrological eriology," we are approaching one of the most pestilential periods in earth's history. Since the commencement of of the Christian era, the perihelia of the four great planets of the solar system—Jupiter, Uranus, Saturn and Neptune—have not been coincident. But this is about to occur, and, in the language of Dr. Knapp, who has traced the history of the greatest epidemics that ever afflicted the human race to the perihelia of these planets, there will soon be "lively times for the doctors." The theory is that when one or more of the large planets is nearest to the sun, the temperature and condition of our atmosphere are so disturbed as to cause injurious vicissitudes, terrible rains, prolonged droughts, etc., resulting in the destruction of crops, and pestilences among human beings and domestic animals.

Dr. Knapp has collected a mass of statistical data, all going to show that perihelion periods have always been marked by unusual mortality, and that sickness and death have invariably corresponded with the number of planets in perihelion at the same time. The revolution of Jupiter around the sun is accomplished in a little less than twelve years, of Saturn in a little less than thirty, of Uranus in about eighty-four years, and of Neptune in about a hundred and sixty-four years. If it be true, therefore, that the perihelia of these planets occasion atmospheric conditions unfavorable to life, pestilential periods should occur once in a dozen years, and aggravated and still more wide-spread epidemics at longer intervals. In tracing the history of epidemics for more than two thousand years, Dr. Knapp finds the facts in all cases to validate his theory. Thus, in the sixth and again in the sixteenth centuries, three of these planets were coincident in perihelion, and those were the most pestilential times of the Christian era.

But soon we are to have, for the first time in two thousand years, all four of these planets against us. They will be at their nearest approach to the sun in or soon after 1880, so that for a few years, say from 1880 to 1886, the vitality of every living thing will be put to a severe and trying ordeal. Some persons think they see in the signs of the times, evidences of the great disasters in the immediate future.

The excessive heat, the unprecedented cold, prevalence of floods, and disasters at sea, the general failure of the grain crops, the wide-spread chill fever among human beings, and the equal prevalence of the epizootic among animals, are mentioned as among the premonitions of the rapidly approaching period of the perihelion. Well, "to be forewarned is to be forearmed." Accidents excepted, we know very well that the persons of more vigorous constitutions and more hygienic habits will have the better chance to survive whatever adverse influence the extraordinary perihelia will occasion. It is well known to physicians that, in all pestilences, plagues, typhus, small-pox, cholera, intermittents, etc., the intemperate, the dissipated, and those whose sanitary conditions were bad, furnished the victims.

We do not write to alarm any one, nor to make a sensation. We state the fact which all history attests. Readers can judge for themselves what importance to attach to the subject. That the conjoint perihelion of all the large planets of the solar system, one of which, Jupiter, is a thousand times as large as the earth, must disturb our atmosphere and temperature very considerably, is probable; that this disturbance must be injurious to health and life is certain; and that these periods have heretofore been pestilential, is a matter of record. How much we shall suffer during the next dozen or fifteen years, depends very much upon how nearly we live a life in accordance with the laws of life.—Science of Health.

Coming of Christ.

Is the second coming of Christ before or after the millennium? What saith the Scriptures?

That the Lord Jesus will come personally a second time, is firmly believed by all christians. It is almost, as generally believed, that there will be a period when holiness will fill the earth. This glorious state is often called "the Millennium;" the Scriptures speak of it as "the kingdom of God and of his Christ."

The point to which we now request attention is this, which of the two events just mentioned will occur first? Will the universal kingdom be established, prosper, and come to an end, while the Savior remains in heaven; or will Christ return in person, and rule the world in righteousness? Psa. xcvi. 10-13.

If we ask this question of the professing church, or inquire of her teachers, the answer generally is, "We look for the millennium first; we do not expect that Christ will come in person for many hundreds, or perhaps many thousands of years." If we turn from man, and inquire at "the oracles of God," we find that the personal advent of the Savior is the great event predicted. For this the people of God are directed to wait, to hope, and to watch. All the sacred writers who treat upon the subject, and who point out the relation between "the coming and kingdom" of Christ, agree with the Prophet Daniel, who testifies that he "saw in vision one like the Son of Man come in the clouds of heaven," at the time of the destruction of the fourth beast, or the Roman power. Nothing intervenes between that dreadful tyranny and the peaceful universal kingdom of Christ, besides his coming and acts of judgment. He comes, he judges, he reigns!

That this coming "in the clouds of heaven," before the kingdom, is a personal coming, is evident from our Lord's own words in his last prophecy, (Matt. xxiv. 30;) his testimony before the Jewish High Priest, (Matt. xxvi. 64;) the declaration of the angels just after the resurrection of Christ, (Acts i. 9-11;) and the prophecy of John, (Rev. i. 7,) "Behold, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him."

This one passage in Daniel 7, compared with the texts above referred to, is sufficient to prove that the personal advent of Christ is before the millenium. O that christians would ponder God's simple testimony, and compare one portion of Scripture with another, in order to see whether these things are so.

I have searched the New Testament in vain to find one passage which asserts, or even fairly implies, that there will be a period of universal blessedness before the coming of the Savior. I can find no single instance in which the apostles expressed any hope that the whole world would be converted by the preaching of the gospel during the Savior's absence; but I have found many passages which, understood in their literal meaning, and interpreted in the same way as events have already interpreted other prophecies, directly oppose any such expectation as a universal conversion of the nations before the Lord's coming.

Expository.

In Dan. xi. we have a concise but comprehensive account of the most prominent and influential movements of the times of the Gentiles. It is clear that the seventh is the last of the seven historical maps on a condensed scale, in which only the seventh and last are the same; important events can be noted.

It is generally accepted that in vessels, seventh, or last. The elect, the [illegible] the introduction and establishment, the last, and the seventh are ment of the Roman authority is one and the same. dicted.

In endeavoring to identify the evil Judgment Trumpet.—"I charge ence specified in the passage beginning therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the verse 40, the expression, "at the quick and the dead at his appearing, at the end," arrests attention, which has kingdom." 2 Tim iv. 1. Neither trumpet is here named, but his appearance, the judgment of the living and is, and concurrent with the time he dead, and his kingdom, are named. Gentile privilege.

It appears out of all proportion to the map, both in order of time and magnitude, to elevate a temporary insurrectionary incident, as practiced by the viceroy of Egypt, Mehemet Ali, into the king of the south, pushing at him—the occupant of the Roman imperial throne, the subject spoken of in the previous verses.

However, at the time of the end of the prosperity of the Roman empire, a power of the first magnitude does arise, which has exerted a world-wide and permanent influence upon society. In the seventh century the Saracens, from Arabia, the south, made war on the eastern division of the empire, and seized on some of its finest provinces. Within fifty years of the death of Mahomet, they had raised an empire more extensive and more powerful than what remained of the empire at Constantinople. The king of the south pushed at him, but though the Saracens dismembered and weakened the empire, it was the Turks from Scythia, a northern region, that overflowed and passed over, taking possession of the capital, Constantinople. This king came like a whirlwind, with chariots and horsemen, of which the army was chiefly composed, and with many ships, without which he could never have got possession of so many maritime countries. They overspread Western Asia, and then passed into Europe and fixed their empire on the ruins of the Eastern Roman empire. Among his conquests the king of the north would enter into the glorious land, Canaan; this he did, and is master yet to this day. But they were never able to subdue the Arabian tribes, or mixed people who inhabited the region formerly occupied by Edom, Moab, and Ammon, whose posterity are probably incorporated with the Ishmaelites and Midianites; and until recently if not to this day, Ottoman emperors pay the Arabs an annual pension of 40,000 crowns for the safe passage of their pilgrims and caravans, and even this often fails to protect them from plunder.

We understand the pushing of the king of the south, the Saracens from Arabia, and the overflowing and passing over of the king of the north, the Turks from Scythia, as accomplished facts. And now the Turk is troubled with tidings out of the north, Bulgaria, and out of the east, Armenia, and Persia may yet add to his trouble. And he has gone forth with great fury to destroy and utterly make away (curse, indicating the religious element) many, as witness the horribly vindictive brutality as perpetrated in Bulgaria.

Whether the expression, "Plant the tabernacles of his palaces," simply expresses the present occupation, or making a final stand in battle array, yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him. How truthfully and forcibly this expresses the policy now in vogue—non-intervention.

"Selah."

The Bibliotheca Sacra, in referring to the meaning of the Scriptural word "Selah," says that the Targums, and most of the Jewish commentators, give the meaning of eternally, forever. Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical or rythmical note. Hender regarded it as indicating a change of note, Matthewson as a musical note, equivalent perhaps to the word repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence. Gesenius explains it to mean, "Let the instruments play and the singer stop." Sumner, after examining all the passages in which the word occurs, recognizes in every case "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah."

In preaching the word, Christ Jesus himself is the object of faith. The truth or gospel of Christ is the matter of faith: the divine evidence of the truth is the ground of faith; the declaration and hearing the truth is the medium of faith; and the spirit of truth is the author of faith. Samuel Tyler.

The Seventh Trumpet.

The seventh trumpet is a woe trumpet. It is clear that the seventh is the last trumpet. There being but one series of trumpets, and seven in that series, the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, is the last, and the seventh is the last of the times of the Gentiles. It [illegible] historical maps on a condensed scale, in which only the seventh and last are the same; thus first, second, third, fourth, fifth, important events can be noted.

Peaceful Intentions.

A Berlin paper says that Germany in 1880 will have a fleet which, although inferior in the number of vessels to those of either France or England, will be superior in the quality of material and artillery, in the education of officers, and in the completeness of its equipment. The construction of vessels proceeds rapidly.

Curious Sect.

At the end of the last century a new sect appeared in Paris under the name of Theophilanthropists, of whom Lavevilliere, one of the Directory, avowed himself a patron. Its members rejected revelation, but worshipped a Supreme Being. They were allowed to take possession of several of the deserted churches, where they worshipped without any prescribed formulas, and brought oblations in the shape of the products of the earth—flowers, fruit, etc.

Decrease of Negroes.

It is the opinion of Southern papers, almost without an exception, that the negroes in the South are dying almost at the rate of four to one as compared with the whites. The causes are uncleanliness, lack of proper food, clothing, shelter, and cooking, sensual excesses of all kinds, drunkenness, neglect of the sick, the preference of "conjurors" to physicians, and absence of proper precautions against contagious diseases.

Curious Medal.

M. L. Sheets, of Baltimore, Md., has in his possession a medal, supposed to have been struck in 1530, in honor of Martin Luther's labors. It is of silver and about the size of a five-cent piece. On one side is a design representing the hand of the Lord holding the seven candles, and the people reading by their light the Bible; on the reverse is a representation of the covenant of Elijah with the Lord and the new covenant of the reformation, and around the edge there is a German inscription.

Largest Bell in the World.

The largest bell in the world is in the temple of Ciara, in Kioto, Japan. Unlike the great bells in Pekin and Moscow it is whole, and its tone is as perfect and as sweet as when first suspended. Where and by whom it was cast is not known. Chinese and Sanscrit characters completely cover it; but they are not translatable by Japanese scholars. It is twenty-four feet high and sixteen inches thick at the rim. It has no clapper, but is struck by a sort of wooden battering ram on the outside.

Death of a Centenarian.

Rev. S. B. Bailey, of Mystic, Ct., was called upon Sunday, Dec. 2, to attend the funeral of, probably, the oldest person in New England, Mrs. Elizabeth Gates Allen, widow, of Abram Allen of Charlestown, R. I., aged 105 years, five months and seven days. Her death occurred on Thanksgiving Day. Her mind and memory were good to the last, as she made all the arrangements for her own burial, requesting Mr. Bailey to preach the funeral sermon. She had been an exemplary member of the church since 1827, fifty years ago, and a widow for nearly half a century. She well remembered many incidents of the Revolutionary war, particularly the burning of New London, September 6, 1781.

Mennonite Settlements.

There are two large Mennonite settlements in the province of Manitoba. One of these is known as the Rat River Reservation, comprising a tract of eight townships, which contain an aggregate of about 174,000 acres. Within the bounds of this reserve are thirty-two villages, with a population of nearly 4,000. The tract lies east of the Red River, and begins about twenty-two miles southeast of Winnipeg. The other reservation lies west of the Red River, and is known as the Dufferin Reserve. It adjoins the boundary line between Manitoba and the Territory of Dakota, and extends eastward to within a short distance of the river. It consists of seventeen townships, containing over 370,000 acres, eighteen villages, and about 2,600 inhabitants. In addition to these two settlements, a few Mennonites have settled on the Scratching River, a few miles south of Winnipeg. The population of the last named settlement is about 250.

Inherent Immortality.

The heathen dogma of the soul's immortality is untaught in the sacred scriptures. Although the idolatrous Egyptians originated and taught that doctrine long before the days of Moses, yet we are taught in the Bible that Christ hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.

Mr. Bartlett, in alluding to the belief of immortality prevalent among the Egyptians, says: "Incredible that the long series of inspired men from Moses to Malachi should have been so far below Egyptian priests and kings as never to have alluded to a great truth which had been published to the empire long before the days of Moses." Mr. Bunsen, in "Egypt's Place in Universal History," vol. 4, says: "The Egyptians were the first who taught the doctrine of the immortality of the soul—a fact mentioned by all Greek writers from Herodotus to Aristotle."

Says Herodotus, the father of history, in Bodloe's "Herodotus," b. 4, pp. 203-4: "They (the Egyptians) are the first of mankind who have defended the immortality of the soul. They believe that, on the dissolution of the body, the soul immediately enters some other animal, and that after using as vehicles every species of terrestrial, aquatic, and winged creatures, it finally enters a second time a human body. They affirm that it undergoes all these changes in the space of three thousand years. This opinion some among the Greeks have adopted as their own."

The Egyptians were such an idolatrous and superstitious people, that surrounding nations looked upon them with disdain. According to Tytler's History, vol. pp. 46-7: "The extravagant length to which the Egyptians carried their veneration for their consecrated animals exceeds all belief. The sacred crocodile, the dog, or the cat, were kept in an inclosed space set apart adjoining to the temples dedicated to their worship. They were constantly attended by men of the highest rank, whose business was to provide them with the choicest victuals, which they were at pains to dress in the manner they supposed most agreeable to their palate. They washed them in warm baths, and anointed them with the richest perfumes. The finest carpets were spread for them to lie on; chains of gold and circlets of precious stones were hung around their legs and necks; and when the stupid animal, insensible of the honors that were bestowed on him, died, like the rest of his kind, the whole province was filled with lamentation; and not only the fortunes of the priests, but the public revenue was without scruple expended in the performance of the most sumptuous funeral obsequies."

To such an idolatrous people are the religionists of the nineteenth century indebted for the origin of one of the fundamental principles of their theology—the natural immortality of the soul; a doctrine that is as delusive to-day as it was when uttered in the garden of Eden, six thousand years ago. "Ye shall not surely die." Gen. iii. 4. This doctrine, when associated with Bible truth, is like ink mingled with water; but the dogma of natural immortality gives an entirely different meaning to the language of scripture. It permeates or pervades the entire plan of redemption, with its destructive influences. It puts darkness for light, and light for darkness. It destroys the primary and obvious import of Bible terms. Take, for instance, the terms "life" and "death," that are used so frequently to express the reward of the righteous and punishment of the wicked. The advocates of natural immortality, in order to bolster up their tottering theory, say that life means happiness, and death means misery, thus attaching an unnatural meaning to these terms,—a meaning that would not have been thought of, were it not for this figment of heathen mythology—natural immortality.

This doctrine defies man, and robs Christ of the honor of conferring eternal life in the world to come. It not only robs our Life Giver of the honor that is due him, it feels infidelity. It is the corner stone of spiritualism, Catholicism, Mohammedanism, Swedenborgianism, Mormonism, and almost every other "ism" but is rife in the world to-day. Remove from the minds of the masses everywhere the belief in natural immortality, and these monstrous systems of error would sink to rise no more. They would pass down under the dark waves of oblivion's sea.

Inherent immortality is the parent stem of Universalism. The God-dishonoring doctrine of endless misery is based upon this fundamental error of theology. The doctrine of the atonement is nullified by this spawn of heathenism. The resurrection of the dead is ignored by it. In fact, it leads to infidelity. Dr. Hodge, a believer in inherent immortality, in his Biblical Cyclopedia, under the word "Idolatry," says: "The pride and pomp of the great and the abject spirits of the mean, occasioned first the flattery and then the worship of kings and princes as gods upon earth. Men, famous for their adventures and exploits, the founders of nations and cities, or the inventors of useful arts and sciences, were reverenced while they lived, and after death canonized. The prevailing notion of the soul's immortality made them imagine that the spirits of such excellent powers, either immediately ascended up into heaven, and settled there in some orb or other, or that they hovered in the air; whence by solemn invocations, and by making some statue or image to re-emble them, they might be prevailed with to come down and inherit it."

Such are the legitimate fruits of this soul-destroying doctrine,—a doctrine that was conceived in ignorance, and brought forth in idolatrous superstition. In the language of another, "The belief of this popular falsehood has done more to corrupt religion and defy men than all other heresies put together; nor is there an error promulgated that may more justly be named 'legion' than that of man's possessing an 'undying spirit;' it is a plain and palpable denial of the testimony of God, of certain death to the sinner. 'Thou shalt surely die,' and 'the soul that sinneth it shall die,' is the plain testimony of the truth-speaking God."

Kind reader, if you are a believer in inherent immortality, imitate the noble Bereans of old, who, when they had heard the preaching of Paul and Silas, "received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the scriptures daily, whether those things were so." Jno. v. 39, 40; Acts xvii. 10-12; Isa. viii. 20. Be not indifferent to a subject which involves your future welfare. Eternal life is at stake! "Seek for glory and honor and immortality." Rom. ii. 6, 7. "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called." 1 Tim. vi. 12, 17-19. For,—

"'Tis a priceless boon, 'tis wealth untold,
The choicest diamond, the purest gold;
Ah! better the world and all its toils
To lose, if so doing, the prize we win!

"The Mighty God, who's enthroned on high,
Whose glory beams from sun and sky;
Who all creation's wonders planned,
And wrote it with his own eternal hand,
This treasure gave; that 'tis He alone
Who deals inherently this treasure own.

"The straight throng, who before Him bow
In adoration, who see and know,
The fulness of His transcendent love,
And the joys that are centered above;
He received this gift from His bounteous hand
And in his immortal home shall stand.

"In the creation of wonders is His plan—
To the low open fallen, immortal man;
The powerless born of dust, sinful to love,
To become only their gods from above,
And [illegible] the savage birth
By "Good will to men, and peace on earth."

"And he, who with a heart sincere,
Loves the Lord with a holy fear,
Obeying him will be made given
Through Jesus Christ, God's Son from heaven."

I will now close this article, by appending the following appeal (by some anonymous writer), which I copy from an old magazine. It is too good to be lost:

AN APPEAL TO MEN OF REASON AND COMMON SENSE.

Friends:—If you lay claim to the above characteristics, then give attention to the following points:—

Is it reasonable to suppose, that God created man an immortal being, and yet never once, in his holy word, informed us of the fact?

Is it reasonable to suppose, that if man naturally possessed immortality, God's word would recommend us to seek for it, as it does in Rom. ii. 7?

Is it reasonable to suppose, that if men were naturally immortal, God's word would so plainly assure us that "God only hath immortality?" 1 Tim. vi: 16.

Is it not far more reasonable to believe that immortality is the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord? as saith the apostle, Rom. vi: 23.

Is it reasonable that words, when found in the Bible, must have a meaning attached to them, which no man in his senses would ever think of attaching to them in any other book? For instance—that the words life and death, when found in the Bible, must (as theologians tell us) mean happiness and misery; but, if found in any other book in the world, would, simply mean "living existence" and "cessation of living existence"?

Is it reasonable to suppose that, in all the vast multitude of passages in which Christ promised life, eternal life, to his followers, that he did not literally mean what he said? This he could not, if all men have immortal life by nature. In that case the wicked will live eternally as truly as the righteous.

Is it reasonable to suppose, in all the vast multitude of passages in which death is threatened as the punishment of the sinner, that loss of happiness is all that is meant? An unhappy man is as truly alive as the most happy being in existence; and if he be immortal by nature, will continue alive to all eternity. In no plain common sense manner can an immortal being be said to suffer death.

Is it reasonable to suppose that infinite wisdom would invariably use language which is only calculated to mislead His creatures? or which none but Doctors of Divinity could unravel? Would God speak in riddles to men, in the great matters which concern their salvation?

Is it not more reasonable, and more in accordance with the wisdom and love of God, to suppose, that he would give His creatures such revelation, as plain common-sense people could easily understand? He has done so: if men would but use their reason in reading the Bible, as they would do in reading any other book.

Is it reasonable to believe, that men go to heaven or hell immediately at death? and then, hundreds or thousands of years afterward be taken out to be judged, and to see which they deserve to be sent to? Should we deem a right to send a man to the State's Prison for ten years, and then bring him out for trial, to see if he deserved such a punishment? And "Shall not the Judge of the whole earth do right?"

Is it reasonable that such prominence should be given in Scripture to the doctrine of a resurrection from the dead, if that event only means a "reunion" of a lump of clay, with the conscious, thinking, and real man, called "the soul"?—and which is said, by theologians, to be as capable of happiness or misery without the body, as with it?

Is it reasonable to talk about a "Death that never dies," when there is not a word in Scripture to sanction such a contradictory phrase? Would it not be equally reasonable to speak of the reward of the righteous, as a "Life that never lives"? Is there not as much common sense in the one as in the other?

Is it reasonable to be so constantly, both in sermons and prayers, talking about "immortal souls," "never dying souls,"—"deathless spirits,"—and such-like expressions, when there is not, from Genesis to Revelation, one single passage to warrant the use of such language?

Is it reasonable to say, that "eternal death, and eternal torment, are synonymous expressions"?—as theologians affirm—for, how then can it be said, as in Rev. xxi: 4, "There shall be no more death"?

Is it reasonable to believe, that a hell of fiery torment, and ceaseless misery, is to exist forever, when God says, Rev. xxi: 5, "Behold, I will make all things new"?

Is it reasonable to believe that a God of infinite love and mercy would ever have given life to a being whom He foresaw would be miserable to all eternity?

Is it reasonable to believe in the eternal torment of the wicked, when more than two hundred passages of Scripture plainly affirm that they shall "die,"—be "consumed,"—"devoured,"—"destroyed,"—"burnt up,"—"be as though they had not been," &c., &c.?

Is it reasonable to believe that the righteous, in their glorified state, can be indifferent to, and unaffected by, the endless sufferings of countless millions of their fellow beings—among whom would probably be found parents, children, husbands, wives, &c.? Is it possible that they will be destitute or deprived of qualities which are considered most lovely and God-like in this life—viz., pity, sympathy, compassion, commiseration for others' woes, &c.? Will insensibility to the woes of the wretched ever become a virtue? Will that which is a vice in this life become a grace in the glorious future life? Is the standard of virtue thus variable, that what is vicious here, is to be gracious hereafter?

Is it reasonable to believe that a God of infinite rectitude will punish with eternal torment the heathen who have never heard of Christ, and who therefore could not reject him? It is also possible that God can [illegible] and report the same to indiscriminate mass of [illegible]. It was also agreed that the least wicked among them [illegible] keep a record of all moneys together with the most guilty [illegible] him and to whom paid Christian land? for such mo[illegible] the same to the ease, if their souls are immortal[illegible]. It was further their torment is to be eternal, [illegible] evangelist receipt for can be no degrees in that which [illegible]ived by him of the finite.

Is it reasonable to believe that G[illegible] to annual confer- is such a vindictive being, that His justice cannot be satisfied with the death of the offender?—but that He must be constantly pouring floods of fiery wrath upon the wretched being through the ever-rolling cycles of eternity?

We might multiply questions of this kind, but forbear.

Men of reason and common-sense, give your serious attention to these points. Read your Bibles again,—do it carefully,—do it prayerfully. See if these things be true or not. Dare to think for yourselves. If other men should attempt to dictate a political creed for you, would you not indignantly spurn their interference? Do the same in religious matters. Dare to be independent. Do not trust to commentaries. Do not build your faith on "Bodies of divinity." Do not surrender your right of private judgment to any class of men. Go at once to the fountain head of truth. "The words of the Lord are tried words." "The law of the Lord is perfect." This cannot be said of the writings or opinions of any man, or number of men, however wise or holy they may be. To err is human. God and his truth alone are infallible. Show yourselves true Christians, and cast away the "traditions of men." You have the Bible. The wisest and holiest of the "fathers" had no more. Your ministers have nothing else to guide them—at least they ought not. The Bible, and the Bible alone, is the book for Christians. Go then to your Bibles, and see if the God-dishonoring doctrines to which we have directed your attention are found there or not. Excuse us, if we tell you, that, however full of these doctrines human books and human sermons may be, God's Bible does not contain them.

Rather believe, that man is mortal, and condemned to die; but Christ is "come that men may have life, and that they may have it more abundantly:" John x: 10.

"The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vi: 23.

"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him."—John iii: 36.

"And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand."—John x: 28.

"He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."—1 John v: 12.

"Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die. I am the living bread which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever."—John vi: 49-51.

The Miraculous Incarnation.

Law is of the Creator, but God is not necessarily restricted to the observance of laws framed for a creature. He reserves to himself the right of masterful interposition when he sees fit. He does so interpose whenever a competent reason exists. He is the Prince-Author of all life, and if in its production he chooses to go back of secondary laws and bring forth being by his own original methods, who shall dispute his right, or challenge his chosen methods?

Human birth is the result of recognized law in process of natural working. The production of living beings is by delegated power in the order of reproductive generation. This is the only method within the power of man. But this has not always been the rule by which individuals have been brought into existence upon the earth. God has other means and [illegible] and none are [illegible] he has employ[illegible] dom has [illegible] dugerstain the [illegible] will offering" of therefore could not reject him." [illegible] and report the same to [illegible]elist and treasurer as soon as [illegible] keep a record of all moneys [illegible] him and to whom paid [illegible] the same to the ease, [illegible] It was further [illegible] evangelist receipt for [illegible]ived by him of the [illegible]rt to annual confer- [illegible] Harvest. [illegible] Go to Work by. Human folly charges that unless God work alone by one plan he is unscientific, hence unreliable. Perverted human understanding argues that unless God produces all men by established human rules, his methods are unharmonious, and cause discord in nature's realms. God does not agree with himself, says the skeptic. Nay, but we reply, God does agree.

Difference is not discord. Because the first hen came into being without the egg, and all other hens since then by the egg, is this variety of necessity discordant? Cannot the Creator produce the hen with the egg or without it? Cannot a well-tuned set of instruments differ one from another, and still there be a perfect harmony in their blended sounds? And when a merciful and patient Deity suffers a caviling infidel to come into being, and have a place upon his footstool, are then his creative energies exhausted? As if Omnipotence were puzzled for ways! As if the Almighty were limited in his powers! What if Jesus, "born of a woman," was also "begotten of God?" The Father had quickened one long years before, and she, "as good as dead:" Sarah, the wife of Abraham. Gen. xxi.; Heb. xi. 11, 12. Through human generation, but by suspension and breach of human law, Isaac was produced. Why doubt, then, if without man, and by direct interposition of reserved life-producing power, God sent forth the "holy child Jesus?" Could not the Giver of all life, without secondary cause, implant the vital germ? Is this discord? Nay, verily. To reason thus, would forbid all Divine action and reduce Deity to the level of human weakness and ignorance.

If we had never heard but one means of bringing a man-child into the world, we might then have ground of stumbling over Christ's incarnation. But we have shown three ways, even more, that God ordained them all. Let him choose a fourth, if he please, and let us be still before his marvelous power. It was his way. It was the most gracious way. It was the grandest way. It united, in its excelling wisdom, God and a lost race. It wedded Deity to humanity. Had the world's Redeemer sprung from mankind alone, he would have been but a man, and unable to claim affinity with God. Had he sprung alone from God, he would have been too distant from fallen humanity to grasp it and lift it up. The God-man unites the two. Happy union for ruined race!

By this plan Jesus becomes a second Adam. As Adam was called a "Son of God, because God created him without natural intervention or process of human law, so Jesus is par-excellence, and pre-eminently by an analogous act of almighty power, made the "Son of God." Adam's creation was a miracle; so was Eve's; so was Isaac's; so was Jesus Christ's. It was fitting that two such noble sons as the First and Second Adam should trace in God the primordial cause of their existence on earth in the flesh. But whether the womb from which they sprung were earth's or Mary's, what mattered it to the Omnipotent? It is written "He doeth according to his will." Let us say, "Thy will be done."—*D. T. DIED.

TABER.—Thursday morning, Dec. 27, 1877, Cyrus Taber, at his home five miles south of Plymouth, of consumption.

Our brother, the deceased, was born June 20, 1844, and was the first white child born in Marshall County, Ind. He was a resident of this county during his life but was not at home at the time of his death, when he sojourned in Magnolia, Miss., for about three months, seeking for health, though without any advantage. He embraced the gospel about fourteen years ago, and was baptized by Brother Coolsley. He was a man of earnest convictions, and decided force of character, and strictly honest in all his dealings with mankind. He was liberal in the support of the truth, both in regard to the living proclaimer of the word and in sustaining THE RESTITUTION. Having honored his profession with [illegible] Work by. The removal of the mound of earth and debris to the east of the railway station on the Esquiline at Rome has lately disclosed a magnificent piece of the ancient walls of the time of the kings. It is hoped that this splendid fragment, which cannot be less than thirty feet high, will be preserved. Built against it were found the walls and other [illegible]

Wis, on Koshkonong Lake. The pottery differs from that usually found in mounds. Among other curiosities found is a tablet inscribed with strange characters, somewhat resembling Sanscrit. The mounds were about seventy feet in diameter each, and made of different material from the ordinary mounds found in the West.

Russia has to contend with famine. Dearth is reported to prevail to a serious extent in the province of Kazan in Eastern Russia, the province lying to the northwest of and adjacent to the province of Samara, which suffered so disastrously from famine a short time ago. The city of Kazan is said to be crowded with famine-stricken persons who have flocked into it in search of food, and the peasantry in the outlying districts are reduced to great straits. An imperial commission has been appointed to organize the means of relief.

Gen. Grant, in company with the officers of the U. S. steamer Vandalia, has been making a visit to the ruins of the ancient city of Pompeii. The government had made arrangements for a special excavation in honor of General Grant, so that he might see how the work was done and see some of the curiosities recovered just as they were placed when the city was so suddenly ruined. The workmen proceeded to dig out a chamber of a buried house and discovered some fragments of a table made of wood and bronze. The workmanship was very curious and elaborate. The next object of interest discovered was a loaf of bread, wrapped neatly in a cloth, and perfectly distinguishable. Many other curious and interesting articles were found. On Thursday, the 20th Gen. Grant returned the official visits of the civil and military authorities of the city of Naples.

The Restitution.

S. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JAN. 9, 1878.

WE owe letters to some who have sent help, which we will write as soon as the pressure of our business will permit.

WE would say, for the information of all our readers, that Sunshine was suspended some months ago, for want of adequate support.

OUR cause will still demand aid. We want to print and issue tracts, that we have not on hand for want of means. For outreach, we will do what we can.

SOME mistakes have occurred which we will cheerfully correct. Should others occur, will our friends please inform us at once, and all shall be made right.

TRACT orders will be delayed a little on account of some being out of print, which we hope to have reprinted in a few days. We are also out of some books, which we will have to order from elsewhere.

WE owe many thanks to kind friends of the cause for their sacrifices in behalf of THE RESTITUTION. May God abundantly reward them in this world, and in the world to come grant them life everlasting.

SOME communications intended for this number are deferred to future issues. We have to use those that are fully prepared for the press, as we have not the time to copy at this season of the year, when the business requires so much of our attention.

WE express our gratitude to our correspondents for their kind words of cheer. Perhaps some extracts that appear in our Letter Drawer, were designed as strictly private expressions of good will. It is so encouraging to learn that our humble efforts are appreciated, that we must be excused for submitting some of these letters to our readers, whether written for this purpose or not.

[illegible] week in [illegible] evangelists, and on the etymology, application, and signification of the term Jehovah.

THE latest news is that the Schipka Pass, through the Balkans, has fallen into the possession of the Russians, and that the Russian General Radilsky has crossed the mountains through this pass. The Turks were driven out by extreme cold more than by the force of the invaders. The call for the meeting of Parliament at an unusually earlier date than is common excites apprehensions and alarm in England, which is spreading and becoming intensified by the movements of the government in its military preparations, and orders for army supplies altogether out of proportion to the necessities of the army in times of peace. The report is that Lord Carnarvon, Secretary of the Colonies in the British cabinet, has resigned, owing to his strong opposition to war with Russia on Turkey's account, and a ministerial crisis is looked for. The Queen seems in full accord with her Prime Minister, Lord Beaconsfield, in his eastern policy of resisting arrangements for peace between the belligerents without consulting England and other European nations. As an additional item of foreign news, comes the intelligence that Victor Emanuel, King of Italy, is in a very precarious condition of health. On the 7th his fever was increasing with further extension of pleurisy. It would be a remarkable circumstance if the king and the pope, as heads of two rival governments at Rome, should both die about the same time. What effect the death of both might have on renewing pretensions to the temporal as well as the spiritual power is impossible to determine. Europe is at present under darkly beclouded political skies, and we await future developments with the greatest interest.

The Man of Sin.

BY R. WILSON.

"Let no man deceive you by any means; because the apostasy must come first, and there must be revealed that man of sin, that son of destruction, the opposer, who exalteth himself above everything called Divinity or Majesty; so as to sit himself in the temple of God, exhibiting himself that he is a god. Do you not remember, that while I was yet with you I told you these things? And now you know what is restraining, to the end he may be revealed in his season. For the mystery of lawlessness is already working; only there is one restraining now, until he be taken out of the way. And then will be revealed the lawless one, whom the Lord Jesus will consume with the breath of his mouth, and annihilate by the appearing of his presence; whose coming is according to the energy of the adversary, with all power, and signs, and wonders of false hood, and with every deception of iniquity to those who are perishing, because they received not the love of the truth in order that they might be saved. And on this account God will send them an energy of delusion, to cause them to believe falsehood, in order that all those may be judged who believed not the truth, but approved the iniquity." 2 Thess. ii. 3-12. Emphatic.

Some of the readers of THE RESTITUTION are asking for more light from the prophetic word on the Man of Sin, and especially as to his sitting in the temple of God. They desire the matter to be definitely settled. This is asking too much of fallible man, whose knowledge is limited, and who is liable to errors of judgment. Writers on prophecy are not all agreed, either as to who the Man of Sin is, or as to the time of his manifestation; and, consequently, differ about the temple in which he is said to sit. This difference of opinion would not exist if this prophecy had already been fulfilled. But this ought not to deter the Bible student from a fair and candid investigation. Truth on this as well as every other subject is what we should seek; then let us endeavor to lay aside preconceived ideas, and with a child-like simplicity receive light from the Scriptures of divine truth.

From what the Apostle Paul says about the Man of Sin, I understand a personal being is intended, and not merely a personification of a certain system of things. He calls him not only a man, but also the son of perdition or destruction—the opponent—the lawless one. What is also said of his coming, pretensions, career, and end, prove him to be a man. Some writers think they find a fulfillment of this prophecy in the Papacy, which was fully developed about A. D. 606-8, and which was to exist for 1260 years. But Catholicism, whether Roman or Greek, does not fill the bill. The Man of Sin will exist up to the glorious appearing of the Lord, when he will be destroyed, [illegible] Babylon the[illegible]nal, the Mother [illegible] with her over- [illegible] powers which [illegible]re that event [illegible] is the apostasy? Let Paul describe it in his own graphic language—"For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap up to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables." 2 Tim. iv. 3, 4. When men are turned from the truth to fables, they soon develop the following traits of character, another mark of the apostasy: "For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; from such turn away." 2 Tim. iii. 2-5.

The Apostle Peter also says: "There shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you." 2 Pet. ii. 1-3.

Are we not now in the days of this departure from the truth? Look around you on every hand, and you will find full proof that these predictions are verified. Catholic and Protestant are both guilty in the presence of these indictments. Is not the professedly Christian world ready for the last grand deception—the masterpiece of Satan?—who will be revealed to the world "with all power, and signs, and wonders of falsehood, and with every deception of iniquity?" The Man of Sin, in fact, will be the outgrowth, the sum total, the legitimate child of the apostasy.

The Apostle says that the Thessalonians know what it was that restrained the development of the Man of Sin, in order that he might be revealed in his own season. From this it appears that there is a time appointed for his manifestation and work, called "his own season." The secret of lawlessness was working even then; and would continue to work till the restraining influence should be removed; and then "the lawless one" shall be revealed. If the church had always been subject to Christ, as the head of the body, there would have been no room for this lawless spirit to work; but she soon forgot her vows, and followed human leaders. The Corinthians were reproved for choosing apostolic leaders, such as Paul, Apollos, or Peter; and were exhorted not to glory in men. This has been discounted. Like the Jews of old, the professing church has "transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, and broken the everlasting covenant." Yet she says, "I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing." How deluded! The Master says to her, "thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

Being in this poor deluded state, blind as to her own condition, and following blind leaders, both the leaders and those who are led by them, will fall into the ditch. They will become the dupes of the Man of Sin when he comes. He will not be of the truth, nor influenced by it,—and they have already forsaken it—both lawless in character with respect to God, therefore they will readily unite as Christ is the head of the body—the true church; so will the Man of Sin be the head of the apostate church. The Pope of Rome assumes to be the head of the universal church, and has done so for a long period; but he is only acknowledged to be so by Romanists—one section of the apostasy. All sections will unite under the coming lawless one.

The restraining power or influence which keeps this mystery of iniquity from being revealed, is the presence of the truth in the church. There is some truth in the church, though she has departed in a large measure from it. A remnant only keep Christ's word faithfully; the rest hold the truth in unrighteousness. The church is "the pillar and support of the truth," according to Paul; but at the present day it can only be applied to the remnant who keep it. Let this restraining influence be taken out of the way, and then will be revealed the lawless one, [illegible] be removed when the faithful [illegible]ered together unto our [illegible]rist at his coming—not [illegible] with his saints, but for [illegible]n they shall be taken to [illegible] in the air. Let all the living [illegible]g, waiting, faithful ones be re- [illegible] and lawlessness will have a [illegible]rse. Take the salt away, and [illegible]ption will soon develop and [illegible]d. Take away the true light, and how great will be the darkness!

The Apostle John also speaks of a certain character whom he styles "the anti-christ," who shall come. This is the same as the "Man of Sin." "This is the anti-christ, who denies the Father and the Son." The Man of Sin arrogates to himself divine honors and titles, and consequently denies both the Father and Son. John says that they had heard that the anti-christ shall come; and Paul had told the Thessalonians that the Man of Sin would be revealed; were these special revelations to each of these Apostles, or did they learn about this from the prophets of the former dispensation? True, both of these Apostles were under the guidance of the spirit, and thus directed, they could read and interpret the prophets correctly. Let us refer to a few prophecies which they had read, and which, as I understand, they reproduced and applied in their letters. I refer to the prophecies of Daniel more particularly. In a former article I quoted some of these which have a bearing upon the closing scenes of Gentile supremacy, more from a secular than an ecclesiastical standpoint. At present, let us look at them from the latter point of view.

In Dan. vii. 8, a little horn appears among the two horns of the fourth beast, which had "eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things." The aspect of this horn, Daniel says, was more stout than his fellows, and he made war with the saints, and prevailed against them. In the interpretation given to Daniel, this little horn is called a king, who "shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times, and the dividing of time." Verses 24, 25. This king is blasphemous, persecuting and arrogant; the saints (Jewish) are under his power for three years and a half; and their judgment overtakes him, and takes away his dominion. Daniel is told "till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." Verse 11. This destruction occurs at the time when the Man of Sin comes to his end, and appears to be the same.

In chapter viii, we read of another vision, to which a little more appears, which "waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land." Verse 9. This horn became very powerful, and magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by (margin, from) him the daily was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down, etc. Verses 10-12. Gabriel was sent to make Daniel understand the vision. He said to him, "understand, O Son of Man; for at the time of the end shall be the vision." Verse 17. That is, the fulfillment of it. Some writers endeavor to find the accomplishment of this prophecy when Antiochus came against Jerusalem, and took away the daily sacrifice, etc. If it applies to him at all, it can only be in type, as what Gabriel said places the fulfillment at the time of the end. "And he said, behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation; for at the time appointed the end shall be." Verse 19.

The interpretation which applies to this appointed time is contained in verses 23-25, and contains the following points:

1. A king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, or deep schemes, will stand up.

2. He will be mighty, but not by his own power. His authority seems to be derived from another.

3. He practices and prospers among "the mighty and holy people," or the Jews, and destroys them wonderfully.

4. Magnifies himself in his heart.

5. Though of "fierce countenance," and a destroyer, yet he principally succeeds through policy, craft, and profession of peace.

6. He finally stands up against the Prince of princes, and is broken without hand.

There are traits of character set forth here which connect this king with the Man of Sin very closely, either as being the same or in his service. He is in some way connected with the Jews, and a persecutor and destroyer of them, and will come to his end without human intervention. I wish the reader particularly to notice that the time when the king stands up is specially set forth. It is at the appointed time—the time of the end—the last end of the indignation, when the transgressors are come to the full. It is when he can exercise his power upon the Jews—called the mighty and holy people, consequently they must be in the land; nor could he stand up against Messiah, the Prince of princes, unless it be at the time of his coming. This terminates his career—he is "broken without hand." So also of the Man of Sin.

The "man Gabriel" was again sent to give Daniel skill and understanding, with reference to the vision and his people. Dan. ix. 20-27. This is a revelation to him as to time especially. I have given this in a former article, and shall only refer to verse 27, as to the point, at present. This is about the transactions of "the Prince that shall come" during the last week of the seventy. It is said, "and he shall confirm a covenant with the many for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," etc. "The week" is seven years—"the midst of the week" is the half of it—"the prince" is the last head of the Roman empire—"the many" with whom he makes a covenant are the Jews. This covenant probably includes a guarantee of protection, the erection of a temple, the establishment of sacrifices, etc. But in the midst of the week he breaks faith, and causes the sacrifice and oblation to cease.

Dan. viii. 11, 12, speaks of the daily sacrifice being taken away, and the place of the sanctuary cast down. Also Dan. xi. 31, shows that a certain "vile person," (verse 21,) by military power "will pollute the sanctuary of strength, and take away the daily sacrifice, and place the abomination that maketh desolate." If the Jews are partially restored in unbelief, as it is evident they will be, they will seek to re-establish their ancient rites and ceremonies, and be ready to receive a false Messiah, if he only fills up their expectations. Jesus of Nazareth was too poor, humble, unambitious for them. His doctrines were too pure and holy for their corrupt hearts. They looked for a military chieftain, with a character like their own, who should raise up their nation to more than its former greatness. Hence they rejected Jesus. They knew not the day of their visitation. They are yet full of unbelief and bitter hatred of anything pertaining to the Nazarene. Yet they will surely prove him a true prophet in respect to themselves. He said, "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." John v. 43.

The Jews are ready to receive such a Messiah as king, if he only meets their expectations. Let him flatter and honor them, and promise protection in their land and worship, and they will make a league with him. It appears to me that some influential person amongst them will be acknowledged as their prince, and he, on behalf of the people will make this covenant for them. On this account he is called "the Prince of the host," and "the Prince of the covenant." Dan. viii 11; xi. 22. This covenant will be confirmed for one week of seven years by "the Prince that shall come,"—or Paul's "Man of Sin,"—who shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease in the midst of the week; who shall "magnify himself even against (margin) the Prince of the host, and from (margin) him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down." As the Jews will return in unbelief, still rejecting Jesus as the Messiah, and claiming Cæsar as their king, (John xix. 15,) Cæsar they will have—the last head of the fourth universal empire. They once had a king of their own choice,—Saul, whom Samuel anointed,—and rejected the Lord their God when he was their King. Saul was chosen on account of his personal appearance, but he soon proved to be an oppressor of the people. See 1 Sam. viii. 10-18. Then the kingdom was given to a better man than he, even David—a fit type of Jesus Messiah, both in his sufferings and kingly power. Saul also fitly represents this last king whom they will choose, and with whom they will make a covenant. But this will be "a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell," which shall not stand." Isa. xxviii. 14-22.

In the midst of the week it will be broken, by this king of their choice causing the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and setting up the abomination that maketh desolate. Then he magnifies himself, and seats himself in the temple of God, exhibiting himself that he is a God. We cannot suppose that the erection of a temple, and the re-establishment of sacrifices, etc., while the Jews are in unbelief will be acceptable to Jehovah. Indeed, he tells them otherwise by Isaiah. He asks, "Where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest?" And with reference to their sacrifices, he says: "He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol." Isa. lxvi. 1-4. And why does the Lord thus address them? Because "they have chosen their own ways." They do these things without Divine authority, so in vain do they offer worship. He says, "I also will choose their delusions, and will bring their fears upon them." The Jews will not be alone in this, but many of the Gentiles also who "teach for doctrines the commandments of men," will be permitted to fall into this deception of iniquity, when this Man of Sin shall be revealed according to the energy of the adversary. Let the reader carefully read Isa. lxvi., and he will find two classes portrayed—one as already described, and another to whom the Lord will look,—the poor and contrite in spirit, and who tremble at his word. This class are hated and cast out by their brethren for his name's sake, and they will do it that the Lord may be glorified. But for the encouragement of these persecuted ones he says, "but he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be ashamed."

Dan. xi., has already been referred to in part; but I would particularly call attention to a certain king, (verse 36,) who, "shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for that which is determined shall be done." This is undoubtedly the same character as is described by Paul as the Man of Sin, or the lawless one. His character and actions are described from verse 36 to the end of the chapter. Suffice it to say, that at the time of the end the king of the south pushes at him, and the king of the north comes against him, both with sea and land forces, but he overflows and passes over, and enters the glorious land, (Palestine) etc., and finally plants the tabernacle of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; "yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him." Dan. xii. 1, 2, marks the epoch when this willful king will flourish, and be destroyed. It is when Michael stands up for the deliverance of the Jews—when the great time of trouble takes place—and when the resurrection of the dead occurs.

I must now draw to a close. I have confined myself to the book of Daniel for prophecies about the vile character of which Paul and John warned their brethren. And do we not find enough in them to prove that these apostles understood these prophets with care, when they thus unfolded the Church of the age of Antichrist, his character, career, and end, at the appearing of the Lord Jesus? But, as though this was not enough, the beloved disciple is favored with visions of this same blasphemous infidel and persecuting power, and is commanded to write what he saw, for the instruction and warning of all who read and understand. Rev. xiii. describes the rise of two beasts,—one having seven heads and ten horns, and the other, two horns like a lamb, and a voice like a dragon. The first beast had a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies. He blasphemed God, his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. He also made war with the saints, and overcame them, and his power was to continue forty-two months. The two-horned beast exercised all the power of the first beast in his presence, causing all to worship the first beast; by means of the miracles he had power to do. Have we not here the Man of Sin who lifts himself up above everything and every one—the lawless one, (whom the Lord Jesus will destroy,) whose coming is according to the energy of the adversary, with all power, and signs, and wonders of falsehood? This politico-ecclesiastical power represented by the beast and false prophet will be found arrayed against Christ and his saints at his coming, and then and there will meet with a final destruction. See Rev. xix. 11-21.

May we be of those who shall be kept from that hour of temptation which shall come upon the whole habitable, to try those who dwell upon the earth. Amen.

The Christian Publishing Association.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, by whom The Restitution is published, was held at the Christian Chapel, in this city, on Monday last. The meeting was called to order by C. Palmer, vice president of the association; Ezra K. Barnhill acted as secretary.

The following stockholders were present, each one representing the number of shares named, each share being $10:

NAMES.	SHARES.
S. A. Chaplin	15
Platt McDonald	101
Joel A. Simonds	10
C. Palmer	10
Hugh Barnhill	15

No. shares represented	220

Reports of secretary and treasurer were read and approved, showing the affairs of the Association to be in a satisfactory condition. Business of a miscellaneous character was transacted, when the meeting proceeded to the election of directors to serve during the year 1878, as follows: C. Palmer, Platt McDonald and I. G. Roberts, Plymouth, Ind.; Wm. Ralfsback, and Richard C. Ralfsback, Argos, Ind.; Joel A. Simonds, Grand Rapids, Mich.; F. Miller, Meadon, Mich.; Wm. Mills, Goodland, Ind.; H. S. Dwiggins, Rensselaer, Ind.; A. D. Eshelman, Canton, Ohio.

The Board of Directors organized by the election of H. S. Dwiggins as president; Charles Palmer, vice-president; S. A. Chaplin, treasurer; E. K. Barnhill, secretary. S. A. Chaplin was re-elected editor of The Restitution for the ensuing year. A new contract was made with D. McDonald for printing The Restitution for another year. The election of a business agent was postponed until the next meeting of the board, which will be on Saturday, January 12. S. A. Chaplin will act as business agent until that time.

E. K. BARNHILL, Secretary.

M. Figuier, in a paper read before the Anthropological society of Vienna, thinks that the lands now known as Turkey and Greece were first peopled by the Iberians, and that they were succeeded by the Illyrians and Thracians—the two races call Pelasgians in ancient authors. The Hellenes conquered them but adopted from them what advancement had been made in art and science, and thus secured a credit for progress which is rightly due to the Pelasgians.

Better Days to Come.

The heart may bend with weight of woe,
And all the world look drear.
While o'er its careworn path we go
With nothing bright to cheer;
Yet, in the bosom ever dwells,
Though all things else are numb,
A low, sweet voice, that whispering tells
Of better days to come.

Though mutter'd ills may loom along;
Foul wrong may crouch in sight;
Some hurt it does from right to right,
Still, let a cool and spark
That glows through life in profound,
Be seen and heard in the dark
Till brighter times are found.

There is no evil that can slay
The faith begotten the grave;
There is no might to bar its way
The spirit that is brave;
And, come what will to stay its wings,
First seek a better home,
Within it dwells the sweet voice sings
Of deathless days to come.

Recent Trip Through Indiana and Ohio.

I reached Indianapolis on Friday evening, and called on brother Cox, at his place of business on Indiana avenue, where I also met my old friend and brother, William Conkley, with whose pleasant home was my home during my stay in the city. I also had the pleasure of visiting at the pleasant home of Sister Sharp and her estimable daughter, who is also a sister in Christ, and our beloved Sister Walker, now Sister Hornaday, and also several friends attended the meeting, with whom I was associated in the gospel in former years. I enjoyed walking visits with J. K. Speer and Mr. Heightshew, of North Liberty, who is a hopeless infidel. J. K. Speer is a fatalist, and ignores all human responsibility. This is the only way by which he can screen himself from the fearful responsibility for the sad havoc he has made of hope and happiness at Old Union and North Liberty.

Our meetings were held in Progressive Hall, commencing Sunday morning and continuing over Monday evening. There were fair congregations, and the best interest. The subjoined synopsis of the Sunday morning and evening discourses appeared in the Monday's Sentinel. An outline of Monday evening's discourse was published also in Tuesday's issue of the same paper, but not having preserved it, I will not attempt its reproduction from memory. The following is what appeared in Monday's issue:

"MISSION OF THE GOSPEL.—THE FOLLOWERS OF THE SAVIOR TO OCCUPY AND RULE THE WORLD.

"Elder J. M. Stephenson, of Chicago, preached in Progressive Hall yesterday morning and last evening on 'The Mission of the Gospel in the World,' and 'The Mission of the Kingdom of God in the World,' to an attentive audience, composed of nearly every kind of belief.

"On the first proposition he showed the design of the gospel through the ages to the close of the present dispensation will have been to select, discipline and educate joint heirs with Christ to rule and bless the world.

"On the second proposition he showed that the kingdom of God will subjugate all earthly kingdoms and bless all nations through the reign of Christ. He showed also that the kingdom of Christ will be the fifth universal empire of earth. He also showed that when Christ, the great restorer, returns from heaven, He will awake from among the dead all His saints, who will be clothed with immortality, and thus qualified to reign with Christ on the earth for the ages of ages. That Jerusalem will be the metropolitan city of the world, from whence laws shall radiate for the government of the nation, and that the nations of the world will be the subjects who will serve and obey. He read the song of the redeemed as recorded by the revelator, saying: 'Thou hast redeemed us by thy blood out of every known tongue and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth.'"

I would not omit to note the kind remembrance of my very pleasant acquaintance and interviews with Brother Cox. He is a zealous advocate of the truth, and exemplifies his preaching by his daily walk and conversation—the most efficient preaching in the world.

I spent two days at Old Union, visiting my old friends and the few brethren and sisters left after Hymenus and Philetus have turned away the faith of some, teaching that the resurrection is past, and greatly erring concerning the truth. These two men have not only greatly erred concerning the truth of a future resurrection, but have blotted from the minds of many in that community all faith and hope in God, Christ, or the truth of revelation. In the language of the prophet, when referring to the leader of this departure from the right way, I would say, "One sinner destroyeth much good."

I enjoyed a very pleasant and, I trust, profitable visit with Brethren and Sisters Nelson and Pugh. I know of but one other sister left of the once flourishing churches at Old Union and North Liberty. The Lord reward those who have caused this dissolution according to their work.

By request, I will give an outline of my arguments with Josiah Hornaday. He denies that Gentiles are included in the plan of Deity; that none except those evangelized by Jesus, or called as Abraham was, will have any part or lot in the plan of salvation; that Christ came the second time, raised the righteous dead, and established his kingdom at the destruction of Jerusalem. It was shown that the covenant was made with Abraham before he was circumcised, that he might be the father both of the circumcision and uncircumcision, or Jews and Gentiles, as distinct classes or nationalities; that the gospel was to be preached to Jews and Gentiles, as classes, offering the same promises and privileges to both. Rom. i. 16, 17. That the partition wall was broken down between Jew and Gentile, thus annihilating all national distinctions; that both might be reconciled to God on the same terms. Eph. ii. 13-17. In this dispensation no difference is made between Jew and Gentile. Acts xv. 8, 9. But the Jews, by rejecting the gospel, were rejected as a peculiar people, and the Gentiles, as a class, became God's chosen people from among whom to select his rulers. The period measured off for the work of selecting the quota of kings and priests extends over the present dispensation, commencing with the conversion of Cornelius and ending with the return of the Lord from heaven to rebuild the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down, that the residue of the men—the Jews—might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom the name of the Lord might be called. Acts xv. 13-17. This work will span the entire Gentile dispensation. David's royal tabernacle is still in ruins, and the residue of the Jews dispersed all over the world; therefore the return of the Lord is yet future.

Christ did not return at the destruction of Jerusalem to build up or restore; but the Roman army invaded to tear down and to destroy. By the fall of the Jews, as a nation or people, a breach was made through which the Gentiles, as nations or people, could pass to the favor of God, and through which the Gentile world was reconciled to God. Rom. xi. This favor and these offers of reconciliation run co-extensive with the blindness and dispersion of the Jews and the return of the Redeemer to Zion, and the turning away of ungodliness from Jacob. This people are still in their blindness, ungodliness and captivity, therefore the Redeemer has not returned to Zion or Jerusalem. The period between their captivity and restoration, their being blinded and their blindness being removed, is called by the apostle "the times of the Gentiles," thus clearly teaching that this entire dispensation is set apart for offering mercy and salvation to the Gentiles. This dispensation is peculiarly Gentile just as much as the former dispensation was Jewish.

The teachings of Christ harmonize perfectly with the foregoing in his discourse upon the mount. In reply to the question, when he would return and what should be the signs of his coming, he began with the tribulation upon that land, city and people, with the investing of Jerusalem with armies, and terminated it with the close of Gentile times, and the signs of the restoration of Jerusalem and the Jews to their own land.

1. He told them that there should be great distress in the land, and wrath upon that people; thus teaching that the Jews were to be the subjects of all the threatened judgments to be inflicted by the Gentiles.

2. That they should be led captive into all nations, and Jerusalem should be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled; thus commencing "these days of vengeance," or "tribulation" with the destruction of Jerusalem and dispersion of the Jews, and terminating it with the close of Gentile times and the restoration of Judah and Jerusalem.

Now, according to Matthew, xxiv. 29, the first of the signs of Christ's coming was not to be seen until after the "tribulation of those days;" but according to Luke, this tribulation was no. to terminate until the times of the Gentiles should be filled full, and the people who had been led captive into all nations should be rest red. Thus Christ, having traced the history of Jerusalem and Juda through their captivity to the time of their restoration, gave the signs by which they might know that their deliverance was at hand; and told them when they should see these signs they might know that his coming and their deliverance were nigh,—even at the door. According to Matthew's account, Christ told them that "immediately after the tribulation of those days," (which, as has been shown, measured the times of the Gentiles,) the sign of the Son of man would appear, and that then they would see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven. Hence, so far, from Christ having returned at the destruction of Jerusalem, the signs of his coming have not yet been seen. Christ, when denouncing judgment upon the generation living contemporaneously with him, said, "this generation." The demonstrative adjective "this" denoted the generation then living; but having traced the history of that race down to the close of this present dispensation, and having given the signs by which the generation living synchronously with these signs, he uses the phase "this generation" to denote the generation living and seeing these signs. If, from this standpoint, he had wished to speak of the generation living at the other end of this chain, he would have said "that generation." "This" denotes the event nearest by, and "that" the event most remote.

Christ assured the generation who would be living when the signs of their deliverance should be seen by the people in slavery, that this generation (not that) should not pass away until their deliverance should take place; that is, the generation who shall see the signs of their deliverance, will be the subjects of this deliverance, the same as the generation warned by Noah. There would be no object in warning a generation that would be mouldering in the dust when the deliverance would occur. There are no two events revealed in the Bible more unlike in all their parts, than the coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, the establishment of his kingdom; and the invasion of the Roman army, the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the Jews among all the nations of the earth.

What analogy between such events, and the return of the same Jesus in the same manner in which he went up into heaven? He ascended personally and visibly, and will return to build up Zion, restore and turn away ungodliness from Jacob, unite the two nations in the land, never to be separated or plucked up out of the land. The Lord himself, returning with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, to raise righteous dead and change the righteous living—returning to build up the tabernacle of David and establish it as in days of old.

The two events are just the opposites in every respect. The prophet, having foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, and the plowing of Zion as a field, predicts what shall occur in the last days of the dispensation subsequently. He says: "But in the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and all people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come and say, "Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for the law will go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Micah. iii. 10-12; iv. 1-5. The prophet used the future tense of the verb at the destruction of Jerusalem, thus teaching that the very work will be accomplished at the close of the present dispensation, which all the prophets and Christ foretold will be accomplished at his second advent.

Mr. Hornaday could not give a text of scripture teaching the coming of Christ, and resurrection of the dead, at the destruction of Jerusalem. As to his invisible advent and reign, the language of the Bible plants these questions without the domain of controversy. It is affirmed that "they shall see the Son of man coming;" that "every eye shall see him;" that "they that pierced him shall look upon him," Christ told the Jews that they should not see him again until they should say "blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," thus teaching that when he comes again they will see him again.

Editor Restitution:—Who of us will live to see the end of the year 1878? Or will our blessed Lord come and restore all things back to their former beauty? Can we say with Paul, "We have kept the faith?" Have we set a godly example before the world? Brethren, let us be more earnest in the cause of our Lord. For in many parts of the country we are looked upon as unworthy of the Christian name.

ROBERT BAKER.

Olivet, Kansas.

Editor Restitution;—I am very much pleased with the contents of the paper in general. The letters of encouragement from the brethren and sisters are like pools of water in the desert. I am very much pleased with the subject of the Great Pyramid. It seems to be creating quite an interest. It and the war in the east are causing people to look into these things as they have never done before. We do not have any preaching in this place except that heard in the popular churches, as there are none of the Abrahamic faith here with the exception of my own family, and we are poor in this world's goods. If any of the preaching brethren should be traveling this way, we would be very happy to have a call from them, and we will try to make them feel at home. I believe the time has come when we may look for the Master at any moment. Brethren and sisters, let us all have our lamps trimmed and burning, that when He does come we may be ready to enter into the marriage supper of the Lamb. This is the prayer of your brother in Christ.

JOHN B. LENT.

Editor Restitution:—It is with pleasure, my dear brother, that we see no intimation in last paper that you intend resigning the its editorial charge. It has been a source of so much comfort and instruction to us throughout the year past as in many previous years, that we can not fail to feel the deepest interest in its success. You surely can not be placed in a more useful position than that which you now occupy. You are by your labors enabled to profit the brethren from one end of the Union to the other. It may not be long that you are called to stand as on the watch-tower to cry out to the perishing world their danger. We hope you may still continue your faithful labors and be found watching when the Master comes to enter into the marriage supper of the Lamb, when the followers of "Him who died for us" will remember in His glorious presence their trials and fightings no more. That we may meet at that glorious feast is the earnest prayer of your sister in Christ,

Conference Report.

The Church of God, in south west Mo., met pursuant to appointment near the house of Bro. Robertson in Polk Co., Mo., Nov. 10th, 1877. Although there were not as many brethren in attendance as was expected, yet in every other particular the meeting was a success throughout. In the absence of Bro. Finn, the writer was requested to report the meeting to THE RESTITUTION. Bro. Butt did most of the preaching, and from his invincible manner of reasoning held large and attentive congregations.

While in conference it was agreed that Bros. Butt and Beckham be a financial committee, to ascertain the amount of the "free-will offering" of the brethren, and report the same to the evangelist and treasurer as soon as possible. It was also agreed that the treasurer keep a record of all moneys received by him and to whom paid out, and report the same to the annual conference. It was further agreed that the evangelist receipt for all moneys received by him of the treasurer and report to annual conference how he used the same. It was ordered that the treasurer pay out no money except on an order from the president of this conference. On motion it was agreed that Bro. Butt use his influence and the wish of this conference with the committee appointed at the annual conference to select time and place for the general meeting for southwestern Missouri, southeastern Kansas, and northwestern Arkansas to the end that the same be held with the annual conference of the Church of God, in southwestern Missouri. It was agreed that the next quarterly meeting be held at Shiloh school house, near the house of Bro. Butt, ten miles north west of Mt. Vernon, Lawrence county Missouri, commencing on Friday evening, February 15th, 1878, and hold over Sunday. The meeting adjourned to the above named time and place. All the brethren are requested to be in attendance at that time. Thus closed our meeting, all expressing themselves well pleased. Unity prevails among the brethren in this county. They all seem to be "hastening on to that glorious day." No foolish questions now mar their happiness. They are now only anxious that they may be found worthy, and to stand before the Son of Man. Come, brethren, to our next meeting, one and all.

Your brother.

Last year 43,000 cattle were destroyed by wild animals and venomous snakes in India, and 23,357 wild animals and 270,185 poisonous snakes killed; 120,010 rupees were expended in rewards. In the current year to 273 persons and 54,326 cattle have been killed, and 131,574 rupees expended in rewards. In the central provinces the deaths from this cause increased from 617 in 1875 to 1,096 to 1876.

Eastern Items.

Vienna, January 5.—The Political Correspondence says the fee in the Danube at Galatz will probably be strong enough in two days to permit the crossing of troops.

A Bucharest correspondent says an officer from the Czarowitz's headquarters states that General Radetsky has crossed the Balkans through the Schipka pass, the Turks having abandoned their positions previously because of the severe cold.

A Russian detachment under General Dandeville, which supports General Gourko in his movement over the Balkans, had fifty-three men frozen to death in one night, and 260 frost bitten. An official dispatch states that the Russian loss in crossing the Balkans, however, was not so great as at first supposed.

The Turks suffered enormously, and immense numbers of sick and wounded were found in their positions. On December 31st the weekly plain of Kamarli was strewn with Turkish corpses.

An official telegram shows that Sophia was entered on the 3d inst. after a skirmish in which the Russians lost only twenty-four men.

ALEXANDRIA, Egypt, Jan. 6.—Five thousand more troops have sailed from Egypt to Turkey. A further reinforcement preparing.

An extraordinary religious movement is taking place in Sweden, where a petition signed by nearly 25,000 persons has been presented to the King, praying that "the use of the Holy Communion may be free, like the use of God's Word," or, in other words, that the celebration of the communion may take place at most of the churches and that the celebrations may be others than persons in holy orders. The ecclesiastical court of the cathedral chapter of Upsala, to whom the petition has been referred, has reported against such an innovation, which, in their opinion "would eventually destroy the church." The government will probably refuse the prayer of the petitioners, as the consequence will be a serious split in the Swedish church. Until very lately there was no religious liberty in Sweden; Roman Catholics and Jews, for instance, being unable to exercise their religion publicly; the consequence being that even at present the total number of Jews in Sweden barely amounts to 1,000 out of a population of 4,000,000.

DIED.

TABER—Thursday morning, Dec. 27, 1877, Cyrus Taber, at his home five miles south of Plymouth, of consumption.

Our brother, the deceased, was born June 26, 1833, and was the first white child born in Marshall Co. During his life he was several times from the county for a month at a time till within the year of his death, when he sojourned in Magnolia, Miss., for about three months, seeking for health, though without any advantage. He embraced the gospel about fourteen years ago, and was baptized by Brother Corbaley. He was a man of earnest convictions, and decided force of character, and strictly honest in all his dealings with mankind. He was liberal in the support of the truth, both in regard to the living preacher of the word and in sustaining THE RESTITUTION. Having honored his profession as a Christian, his end was peaceful. Death has made heavy inroads in his father's family as he leaves only a mother, one brother, and a sister remaining of an original number of eleven, consisting of the parents and nine children. Of his own family he leaves a companion and three children to mourn over their bereavement. On the night preceding his death some of the brethren and sisters met together and joined him for the last time in partaking of the emblems of the broken body and shed blood of our dear Redeemer.

In his death, community has lost a worthy citizen, the church an active and efficient member, and in his family connections a vacancy has been made that will never be filled in this world.

Funeral services were conducted by H. V. Reed and the writer. In the morning of the resurrection we hope to meet him with all the redeemed. May we be faithful unto death or to the coming of the Holy and Just One.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to the editors.

Discussion on the Nature of the Dead, between Rev. W. C. Burnham, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, and author of "Life of George I., II. th of England, &c." The proposition discussed were: 1. That the dead will live, all living, conscious more after their decease. Affirmed by Rev. W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men to death are wholly unconscious, in the grave, and unable to perform any act whatever, and thus they rest in darkness, silence and forgetfulness of God. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 35c; postage 10c. By express, 30c; return by mail, 35c.

Doctrine and Duty of Moral Responsibility. By R. Roberts, M. A., late Presbyterian of Ulster, Ireland, 336 pp. An elaborate argument in favor of the possibility of the unsaved. It is an utterly deadly blow to philological chapter-and-verse theology. The meaning of the Greek words used by the revision writers to indicate the doom of the lost is fully given. 50c.

"We shall also look with lively satisfaction on the forthcoming of Bro. Roberts' book, which will doubtless be replete with the results of extensive research in learning and books, of powerful reasoning, and of sound judgment, as has been manifested in many of his former productions. We have had the pleasure of reading one hundred pages of the manuscript, and have no hesitation in saying that it is a most valuable addition to the Anglo-Saxon literature of three hundred and thirty years. In the fourth, in conclusive proof of the question at issue by an appeal to the Greek text, and the context of the passages in which the word occurs in the New Testament. We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and trust that the necessary 500 or 600 subscribers may be obtained to warrant the publication of the work, which must take a standard place in this particular department of Christian theology."—The Rainbow.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. 12mo. 50 million. Price $1.25, postage, 10c. This book presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, done much to make and re-make for us the Holy Scriptures, and others scarcely less real nature of the Bible study; and the present book is the result of much careful research on one special point, accurately set forth by no little learning, and in logic and a clear and available style. The good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I, May to December, edited by W. Kelloway. The only English weekly devoted exclusively to the Second Coming of Christ, and also discusses the old scales. Price $2.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly serial. October, 1873. The yearly subscription (12 numbers) including the 3 double numbers, is $2.60.

New Facts Upon the Second Epiphany. By an author entitled Watch Unto Prayer. Useful in its way. Contains the annals, the chronicle, the calendar, the text, character, the agreements, the signs, and the dead of our dear Redeemer.

In his death, community has lost a worthy citizen, the church an active and efficient member, and in his family connections a vacancy has been made that will never be filled in this world.

Funeral services were conducted by H. V. Reed and the writer. In the morning of the resurrection we hope to meet him with all the redeemed. May we be faithful unto death or to the coming of the Holy and Just One.

H. & C.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed, entitled Words for Human Singers. Nearly 200 pages, printed on heavy tinted paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 60c, postage 10c.

"The book is one of the best satisfactory kind that could be written; indeed we have not seen its equal. Every lover of music should read it, and be convinced of the necessity of maintaining the Bible as a divine book. We would to God that we could be placed in the Bible page by page, instead of the miserable and unprofitable selections that are usually given in the churches. Her 'Bible Thoughts about Music' are, to us, very timely, and will, we hope, be read by many; as the work on original, as far as we know, concerning it would be hard to find where to turn else will send. Every body should possess a copy."—Mrs. Rose Bible.

Bible Reminders. A new supply is expected. Price per copy, 20c; cloth 25c.

THE SUN.

1878. NEW YORK. 1878.

At the same solicitation for the renewal of subscriptions, THE SUN would remind its friends and readers every where that it is again a candidate for their favorable support. Upon the record of the past it refers for a continuance of the liberal and generous consideration which has for several years extended to it every quarter of the Union.

THE DAILY SUN is a four-page sheet of twenty eight columns, sold by mail, postpaid, 55 cents a month, or $6.50 per year.

The Sunday edition of THE SUN is an eight page sheet of 56 columns. While giving the news of the day, it contains a large amount of literary and miscellaneous matter specially prepared for it. THE SUNDAY SUN is mailed with great economy. Postpaid, $1.20 a year.

The Weekly Sun.

We do not know THE WEEKLY SUN'S circulation in England, the Canadas, and beyond. Nearly thousand find their way to it. Its newspaper, 56 columns, and regard it in the light of guide, companion and friend. Its prompt, full and impartial news, and its many departments make it essentially a journal for the family and the fireside. Terms: One Dollar a year, postpaid. The price, quality considered, makes it the cheapest newspaper published. For clubs of ten, with the dollars each, we will send an extra copy free. Address,

"Doe the Nexte Thynge."

From an old English parsonage
Down by the sea,
There came in the twilight
A message to me;
In quaint saxon lore of Days long forgotten,
Half as it seems to me
Sounding yet from Heaven;
And so through the hours
The quiet words ring,
Like a soft benediction,
"Doe the nexte thynge."

Many a conundrum,
Many a doubt,
Hath its answer here.
Blessed by assured,
Let down from Heaven,
Rare opportunity,
Guidance are given.
Fear not to-morrow,
Child of the King;
Trust them with Jesus,
"Doe the nexte thynge."

Do it immediately,
Do it with prayer,
Do it calmly,
Casting all care;
Do it with reverence,
Tracing His hand,
Who hath placed it before thee
With earnest command,
Stayed on Omnipotence,
Safe 'neath His wing,
Leave all resulting,
"Doe the nexte thynge."

Looking to Jesus,
Ever sweeter,
Working or suffering,
Be thy demeanor,
In the shade of his presence,
The rest of his calm,
The light of his countenance,
Live out thy psalm;
Strong in his faithfulness,
Praise him and sing,
Then as he beckons thee,
"Doe the nexte thynge."

The Most Remarkable Structure on Earth.

THE PYRAMID OF JEEZEH—AN INSPIRED WORK.

Last evening Rev W. H. Poole, of Toronto, delivered a remarkable lecture in St. George's Church School room upon "The Great Pyramid of Jeezeh in Egypt."

Rev. Dean Bond presided, and there were present Rev. Gavin Lang, Rev. James Carmichael, Hon. Jas. Ferrier, Mr. Hunter and others.

Rev. Mr. Poole stated at the outset that, next to the Holy Land, Egypt was the greatest country, political, scientific, and ecclesiastic, in the whole history of man, and had a share in Divine prophecy that it also would be restored. Having amusingly referred to the recognized method of travelling in Egypt by donkey, and the shrewdness of the animals and their drivers, he referred to the great pyramid. Its construction was strictly mathematical, and it illustrated the principles of geometry two thousand years before Euclid was born. It is a witness to nations that the same standard of weights and measures hid up there, as the same as were received by the Hebrew people from God, and which were identical with the Saxon standard, which have always been used in Great Britain. The lecturer referred to the topographical position, and the testimony of scientific men thereon, including the fact that Napoleon's surveyors in 1798, in effecting their trigonometrical survey, used the point of this pyramid to make the meridian of longitude for all Egypt. Pyramids were erected by the Mexicans, Romans and Greeks, but they were blind and feeble imitations of the Jeezeh. The lecturer enumerated the many theories proposed as to the object for the erection of this pyramid and gave as the result of his research, that it was a building system of weights and measures erected by the will of God for all time. Only thirty-seven pyramids existed in Egypt although the number had been stated to be sixty-seven. They were said, by some, to have been erected in idolatrous times. He was of opinion that they were afterwards used for idolatrous worship, except in the Jeezeh, where there was no indication of such worship. The Jeezeh excavation is over fourteen acres of land, is composed of huge stone piers, four to five feet wide, twelve to fifteen feet long, and the same in depth. So firmly were they clustered together that the Turks found it easier and less dangerous to go to a quarry to supply their needs. He described the researches made at this pyramid by modern scientists, and the remarkable discoveries brought to light by them, and especially by Colonel Smyth, who discovered, by actual measurment, that the base of each side was exactly a cubit for every day in the solar year and one half, making 365¼ cubits, and the four sides, thus added, allows a cubit for each day in every four years, including the leap year. The hight of the structure, from the base of the rock to the pyramidal stone, is 486 ft, it stands twenty-three feet higher than St. Peter's at Rome, and one hundred and sixty-seven higher than St. James' at Toronto. The material would erect (according to a French engineer) a wall one foot thick and five feet high, 1,500 miles long. The outside was originally covered with white porphyry (marble) down, which caused it to appear like snow. According to Herodotus, its construction occupied three hundred and sixty thousand men twenty-three years. It was first opened B. C. 1820 by an ambitious caliph with great difficulty, the entrance having been made higher up in the face of the rock and sealed up. Leading to the upper end of the grand gallery is a small passage, and from thence extends the King's Chamber, which is a very great curiosity; but here where the Caliph expected to find the treasure is nothing but black emptiness. The Caliph was thunderstruck or moonstruck. (Laughter). One thousand and fifty years after, W. Warner and party record their experiences in the interior; it conveyed to them the idea of Cimmerian darkness and a feeling of great oppression. There was there absolute night bottled up for the last four thousand years. The geometrical proportions of the pyramid and its chambers are most accurate. The king's chamber was thirty-four feet long by seventeen wide and nineteen high; all the walls, ceiling and floor are of polished granite; the huge stones were made to fit so closely that the joints could scarcely be perceived. It was in every respect a masterpiece of mechanical skill as well as of intellectual superiority. It was so proportioned that inches inside answered to cubits outside. Its dimensions bear a relation to the density of the earth; to the inclination of the earth's axis to the sun; to the size of the earth, etc. The most remarkable thing, in fact the only thing—in the king's chamber was an oblong square chest of perfectly geometrical proportions. It is of the same size as the ark of the covenant given to Moses; also one-fiftieth of the sea of brass in Solomon's temple. Above the king's chamber are five half-rooms in an apparently unfinished state; the roofs are made of immense blocks of granite, and so fashioned as to form a support for the chamber below.

The queen's chamber is of smaller dimensions, and its walls are finished on the twenty-fifth course of the pyramid's masonry; while those of the king's chamber are level with the fiftieth course. The whole place was full of mathematics. In it there was ample proof of divine inspiration, or that the builder possessed equal, if not superior, knowledge to that of modern times. In the base of the pyramid was a chamber forty-six feet long by twenty-seven feet wide, and from this a tubular passage, 320 feet long, led up through the pyramid, and looked out upon the stars as if it were a long telescope. This opening exactly faced the north star, and Sir John Herschel set the date of the erection of this pyramid at 2,170 years before Christ, by calculating that in that year a certain constellation crossed the horizon of the entrance to the pyramid. The measurements seemed to memorialize the flight of time—the tubular passage ways were time charts, 1,542 inches in one of the measurements represented the 1,542 years from the Exodus to the birth of Christ; then came the thirty-two years of his life, and next 1,881 or 1,882 inches of measurement indicated a period not yet completed, at the expiration of which they might expect very great and startling changes to take place.

The rotary motion of the earth is taught and proved in the pyramid, and its builders knew also how to find the poles of the earth. There was no better test of astronomical accuracy than to fix the four points of the compass with perfect precision, and these antediluvian builders in the sands of the Lybian desert were able to place their pyramid more exactly to line with the cardinal points of the compass than those who build our observatories. For ages philosophers were ignorant of the true distance of the sun from the earth. Recently it was fixed at 95,000,000 miles, whereas by the late transit of Venus observations the exact distance is found to be 91,840,000 miles. This distance the pyramid confirms, number ten raised to its ninth power, and then multiplied by the pyramidic height, gives the earth's true distance from the source of light. The pyramid was also a time indicator, and gave the precession of the equinoxes; it showed that the sun is not a stationary centre, but that it moves around another centre—around Alcyone, a star in the Pleiades, probably the great centre of the universe. The pyramid was nearly one-thousandth billionth part of the weight of the earth; also in weights and measures was it a symbol.

Again, the chambers were thoroughly ventilated. A professor, who had been exploring them, was asked by the famous Dr. Harvey if they were ventilated; the professor said they were not. The doctor could not imagine then how the explorers had lived in the obscure chambers, or how their torches burned there. At last an explorer discovered two air shafts from the large chamber going through a solid piece of masonry six feet thick, and another air shaft 8x8, going back at an angle of thirty-two degrees. The pyramid embodied the true system of ventilation. By all means let our architects go to Egypt and study it there. In that structure, erected 900 years before Moses received the law, the septuagesimal proportion of things was prominent, the grand gallery was seven times higher than the passages, and so on; there was also an intense "fineness" (new word) about it. Indeed it was self evident that this pyramid had been built by one skilled in practical and theoretical geometry. It contained in solid granite a revelation from God to man, not intended for the early ages of Christians; but to come as proof of Christianity and Bible history and to establish beyond all doubt the great truths of nature and of Christianity, also to preserve to mankind till the end of time the divinely appointed system of weights and measures. Both in commerce and science a true system of weights and measures was highly important as a safeguard to property and true knowledge. There could be no true religion where there was a dishonest basis of dealing between men. "A false balance is an abomination to the Lord, but a just weight and balance are the Lord's; all the weights of the bag are His work." The British "stone" was an old Hebrew weight and measure.

The lecturer gave an account of the diversified measures adopted at various periods, but which were all unreliable standards as compared with those divinely commanded. During King John's reign, the people rose and obtained the Magna Charta, in which the true system of weights and measures were stipulated for, and the "London quarter," therein mentioned, is exactly a quarter of that old granite chest in the Jeezeh pyramid and the true imperial standard! In Saxon times a "pint was the pound all the world round," and when in the lax reign of one of the Georges an endeavor was made to have it accepted that "a pint of pure water weighs a pound and a quarter," the people strongly objected. Old measures and true measures they wanted. The temperature in the pyramid was invariably the same.

The lecturer concluded his able effort in some striking passages. Chance never made the pyramid. People might ask why was this wonderful building erected in Egypt? A deaf and dumb man on being asked why he was not born with all his faculties, replied on the blackboard: "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in Thy sight." So might they say with regard to the location of the Pyramid in Jeezeh, but there were good reasons why it was put there. Egypt is the center of the land surface of the globe, and possesses one of the most equable climates in the world. It is a historic country and yet destined to play an important part in the coming glory of God's people. All the grandeur of the old cities and nations has passed away, yet this Pyramid stands untouched and tells of the grand purposes served by its construction. It is by far the most scientific building in the world; nothing in it would show that it was a tomb of one of the old Egyptian kings, and in fine the lecturer held that it was a geometric pillar of location, equally dividing the earth's surface between the equator and the north pole. It is a plane making the center of all the habitable land distribution on the globe, and giving the best meridinal line for the Tyro of latitude for all nations. In it is found a perfect geometric figure, so framed that the four sides of its base bear the same proportion to its vertical height as the circumference of a circle to its radius. Each of its base lines measures the even ten millionth part of the semi axis of the earth just as many times as chronologically there are days in the year. Its height multiplied by 10 into the 9th power gives the mean distance between the earth, and the center of the sun; its under length is an even five hundredth millionth part of the polar diameter of the globe we inhabit; its two diagonals of its base, measured in inches, gives the precise number of years in the great precessional cycle.

Its bulk of masonry is an even proportion in weight of the earth, and its setting and shaping are square, and of microscopic accuracy. Unlike any other Pyramid, there are ascending passages, bearing regular proportions, mathematical to the other, with a grand gallery, so sublime in beginning and ending and so elaborate and peculiar in every part, as to exclude all ideas except astronomical and chronological. The lidless, polished chest, found in the King's Gallery, has no proportion to a coffin, and has no carving or hieroglyphic, and could not have passed through the doorway or the passages with or without a corpse. In the Pyramid is contained one great system of numbers, weights and measures, angles, temperature and degrees, cosmic references and general geodesy, which modern science now reads and writes. Once an impious caliph sought to level the Pyramid to the ground, but the work was of such exceeding difficulty, owing to the massiveness of the stones and the way they were joined, that slow progress was made. At this juncture a terrific storm of thunder and lightning came up and raged with supernatural fury round the old Pyramid, and the caliph and his sacred workmen fled, saying that the God of the Hebrews fought against them.

In concluding, he intimated that the Israelites—Lost Tribes—were yet to claim these Eastern lands and conquer the opposing ungodless nations. Cheers.

A vote of thanks was tendered to the lecturer, and the Rev. Dean closed the proceedings with a vote of thanks.

Rev. Mr. Poole left for Toronto by this morning's train.—Montreal Witness.

The Inherent Nature of Jesus.

No man knoweth who the Son is but the Father. Luke x. 22.

That the reader may with as little prejudice as possible enter upon the investigation, I call his attention to Christ's own words above, which I interpret in the most absolute manner. Of how little value the inferences of theologians are, is strongly exhibited to us in the utterly opposite conclusions to which they have arrived. Thus with respect to the inherent nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, there are three different opinions.

1. That of the Trinitarians, who assert he was co-essential, co-eternal, co-equal with Jehovah, and that together with the Holy Spirit, they constitute a trinity which, though of three persons, is but one God.

2. The Arians affirm that Jesus Christ is the highest of all created spirits or intelligences, but inferior to Jehovah as a son is to his father. They deny the personality of the Holy Spirit, and consequently reject the doctrine of the tri-unity.

3. The Humanitarians, or Socinians, consider Jesus Christ to have been a mere man, the Son of Joseph and Mary.

It signifies nothing that the majority of intellectual, learned, and devout Christians have adopted the Trinitarian hypothesis. I fully admit the fact, but truth does not depend upon majorities, and if we look at the individuals who have rejected the doctrine of the trinity, we shall find among them some of the brightest names in the history of the world, whether we estimate them by their genius, learning, or piety. It is scarcely necessary to mention Locke, Sir Isaac Newton, Milton, Dr. Samuel Clarke, Lardner, Priestley, etc. One would suppose that the radical differences that thus exist among the intellectual, the learned, and the devout, concerning this subject, would have opened the eyes of mankind as to its incomprehensibility. On the contrary, however, the fact of an opposition to the prevailing theological assumption has merely excited the indignation of the majority, and induced them to regard such persons as the enemies of God, whom it was justifiable to treat with reproaches, persecutions, and in the darker ages to put them to death. That the Anti-Trinitarians have not acted in a similar manner, is especially referable to their want of power; for in the fourth century when the Arian controversy was at its height, they persecuted the Trinitarians whenever they had the opportunity.

But though the Christian world has not learned to appreciate the fact, that the inherent nature of Jesus Christ is an utterly incomprehensible matter, not having been revealed in the Scriptures, yet surely it is to be hoped they will not continue in their misapprehension of this subject if it be fairly exhibited to them. Encouraged by this hope, as well as to fear my humble testimony on the subject, I will attempt to bring it to the full comprehension of my readers, by showing the utter irreconcilabilities and anomalies that are involved in every human speculation on these doctrines whether according to the theories of the Trinitarians, Arians, or Socinians.

Theologians, at least of modern times, seem to have investigated the question of the inherent nature of Jesus Christ upon a kind of syllogistic basis. They have inferred in the first place, that he must either be God, or less than God, or a mere man; for they cannot imagine of any other conditions of being. Having laid down this basis, they have then examined the Scriptures, and having classified the several texts bearing on the subject, they have then come to the conclusion from them, that the doctrine and teaching of the Scriptures implies either that he was God, or less than God, or a mere man, according to the alternatives offered in the premise assumed.

After having adopted one or the other conclusions as being the most plausible, they have then either disregarded other texts anomalous to, or opposing their inference, or they explain them away so as to suit their opinion, and then arraying together whatever sustains their belief they publish them to the world, embodying such an apparent array of texts and arguments in their favor, that those whose opinions are either made up or inclined towards any particular one of the three hypotheses, consider these summaries to be altogether unanswerable. Instead of being any demonstration of the subject, such expositions are merely compends of what may be advanced in favor of any particular opinion.

In estimating what theologians have inferred from the Scriptures concerning the inherent nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, we shall find that every speculation they have constructed on the subject involves such an amount of unreasonable perplexities and anomalies, that no unprejudiced man can regard them in any other point of view than as so many distinct proofs of the absolute incomprehensibility of the subject itself.

On the one hand we find certain expressions of the Apostles concerning the character and nature of Jesus Christ, which in the estimation of the Trinitarians indicate his co-equality with Jehovah; and now if we admit the intensity of such expressions so as to accommodate them to the Arian hypothesis, they would still imply that Jesus Christ in his inherent nature, was only inferior to Jehovah, as being the first and greatest of all created intelligences. Without quoting such passages extensively, it will be sufficient to mention the remarkable texts of Phil. ii. 5-7; Col. i. 15-17.

From these passages it would seem almost impossible that we could regard Jesus Christ in any other light than as exhibited by either the Trinitarians or the Arians, and yet in connection with these texts we have the doctrine expressly laid down by the Apostle (Phil. ii. 9-11,) that in consequence of the great humiliation of Jesus Christ, that God has exalted him, and given him a name which is above every other name, etc. If the doctrine of Christ's inherent nature, whether as stated by the Trinitarians or the Arians be correct, how is it possible that he could be exalted as the reward of his humiliation and obedience? According to the Arians he was already only inferior to Jehovah, according to the Trinitarians he was already co-equal with him. The proposed explanation that this exaltation of Christ was in his human capacity is preposterous, for as his humiliation consisted in his abasing himself in his inherent nature, the reward or exaltation could only be as superadded to that inherent nature. Theologians may undertake to defend such an interpretation, but no unprejudiced man, I should presume, is able to comprehend its application. The proposed solution is a mere assumption suggested by theologians to solve a perplexity in their theological system for which the Scripture gives no justification. Of all the proposed solutions respecting the Trinitarian hypothesis, I consider this to be the most unreasonable. Not only does the idea of one person of the trinity rewarding the other virtually destroy the theological unity of the God-head, but it is evidently impossible after such subdivision, that one could reward the other without lessening his own authority, power, or glory.

The doctrine of the Socinians on the inherent nature of Jesus Christ is equally irreconcilable with the statements made in Scripture. It is wholly impossible to explain Phil. ii. 5-7, or Col. i. 15, etc., with the theory that Jesus Christ was a mere man. The circumstances of his supernatural birth from a virgin, the plain intimations of his pre-existence, etc., are amply sufficient to confute the Socinian hypothesis, which indeed, has scarcely any argument in his favor, but as an alternative to the Trinitarian or Arian schemes, perplexed as they are by irreconcilable anomalies or contradictions. The proceeding of the Christian world respecting the inherent nature of the Redeemer, has been like that of the Jews concerning the kingdom to be established by him. The prophets had announced that the Messiah should be a great Prince, the Savior or deliverer of the Jewish people, and that all nations should be subdued before him. Though there were other predictions concerning him that foretold his humiliation and death, the calling of the Gentiles and his rejection by the Jews; yet the Jewish rabbins could not reconcile these various anomalies.

Instead therefore of leaving the subject as involved with some inexplicable unknown condition of things which time only could unravel, the rabbins rejected every prediction anomalous to their assumption, and determined that he would be a great temporal prince, who after having delivered them from political subjection to any heathen power, should then rule over them and all the nations of the earth, in all the splendor of an eastern king.

The inherent nature and character of Jesus Christ is as fully involved in incomprehensible anomalies and perplexities to the Christian world, as the Messiah's character was to the Jews before the advent, and the clearest demonstration of this incomprehensibility, is the existence of the three different and irreconcilable theories of the Trinitarians, Arians, and Socinians. Each of these hypotheses has been constructed by rejecting every passage of Scripture anomalous to each theory, and yet mankind are so blind in their prejudices as to insist upon their peculiar doctrines on the subject with the utmost bigotry and tenacity. I fall back upon our Savior's own declaration concerning himself; (Luke x. 22,) No man knoweth who the Son is but the Father. That no revelation to mankind has ever been made since that time, must be evident from the three utterly irreconcilable theories that men have adopted on the subject. As respects the office, function, and authority of Jesus as Messiah, the Scripture is perfectly clear; nor would there be any difference of opinion among devout men on that subject, if they had not arbitrarily interpreted the positive statements of the Scripture in such a manner as to force them into accordance with their presumptuous speculations concerning his inherent nature. The greater number of the more common expositors of the New Testament, in my apprehension, have most culpably passed over the remarkable words above without any comment upon them. Neither Dr. Adam Clarke in his Commentary; Bloomfield in his Digest; Campbell on the Four Gospels; Dr. Samuel Clarke in his Paraphrase; nor Lightfoot in his Exercitations, have taken the least notice of the passage, a faithfulness in duty towards their readers which I cannot see how it can be regarded otherwise than criminal.

I call the reader's attention to the circumstance that the Redeemer is no where designated in the Scriptures by any other name than he bore whilst he lived upon earth, viz.: Jesus of Nazareth. Any other appellations by which he is mentioned in the Scripture, are either official terms, such as Messiah or Christ, (the Anointed One) or by the epithets derived from the functions exercised by him, or from purposes accomplished by him, such as High Priest, Mediator, Savior or Redeemer. The only term used in the Scripture that we do not understand as to the absolute sense in which it is to be comprehended, is the expression "Son of God."

The inference from these facts I apprehend is very important, Jehovah as not communicating to mankind any other name than the one by which Jesus of Nazareth was known while upon earth, seems evidently to instruct us that he was not to be known among men during the Christian Dispensation by any other name; be his inherent nature what it may. As Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah, as such he accomplished whatever belonged to that mysterious office. Through him, as set forth in the Scripture, mankind are alone to expect salvation. This inference does not affect the fact of his inherent nature, be that what it may, but it surely directs us as to the point of view in which mankind are at present to regard the Messiah, i. e., in his official position only, and not according to his inherent nature, for on this subject we have no instruction given in the Scripture.—J. H. McCulloh, M. D.

Interesting Discovery at Jaffa.

An English paper just received says: "An order was recently issued by the Sultan for removing the old walls and fortifications of Jaffa (Joppa). In cutting a gate through a water battery at an angle of the sea wall, built by Vespasian, and directly in front of the reputed house of Simon the tanner, the men came on three oval-shaped tanner's vats hewn out of the natural rock and lined with Roman cement, down very near the sea, and similar in every respect to those in use eighteen centuries ago. There is also a fresh-water spring flowing from the cliff close by, long known as the town spring. This discovery at least proves that the house on the rocky bluff above, and from which steps lead down to the vats, must have belonged to some tanner; and as perhaps not more than one of that trade would be living in so small a place as Jaffa, some probability is given to the tradition that this is the identical spot where the house of Simon stood, with whom Peter was sojourning when he saw his vision, and received the servants of Cornelius."—*N. TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION is taught in the Word of God, and is the doctrine of all those who look for the speedy return of JESUS. It is the object of this paper to set forth the Scriptural testimony concerning the restitution of all things, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as Lords to rule with Him; to show the relation of the unbeliever, the sectarian, or Israel, the Church, the Gentiles, the Jews, and the final destiny of each; the all-important truths relating to the second personal life and kingdom of Christ, and many other kindred truths. It also extends a hearty welcome to the disciples everywhere, and invites them to send communications for the columns of this paper, and to help in the work of the Lord, and thus lend their influence to the final restitution.

The Great Crisis.

"VICTOR EMMANUEL, FIRST KING OF ITALY."

The stone, to be placed in the chapel destined for the king, is a simple slab, bearing only the above words. It stands between the high altar and the altar of Saint Anastasius, martyr, on the right as the Pantheon is entered.

Over the gateway of the Pantheon is the following inscription: "Italy, with a mother's pride, with a daughter's grief, supplicates for the great king, who was a faithful citizen and a triumphant soldier, the immortality of the righteous and the heroic."

The student of prophecy turns his eye, with intense interest to the nations, as they, step by step, occupy the positions noted in the ancient revelations.

The recent events at Rome are so emphatic and so true to the Divine chart, that you will allow us to express ourselves in the language of Christ,—"In this was fulfilled, etc."

A few weeks since, you published the last of our lengthy articles on the "Session of the Ancient of Days," or "God's Judgment (Daniel vii.) on the Little Horn."

The horn (eleventh), we stated, so far as it was like the ten horns, was a symbol of civil papal rulers; and that its "eyes" and "mouth" symbolized ecclesiastical rulers, called the "Papal Hierarchy." We took the position, that, some little time before A. D. 1798, God sat in judgment on that power; that he rendered his decision in favor of the saints, against that power; that its dominion (civil) was taken away, and that, during this century, the civil power (horn) has been gradually wasting, and is about extinct.

Allow me to present to your readers a summary of its prophetic, and fulfilled history. By so doing, we shall be able to determine our latitude and longitude.

1. Prophecy—Little Horn—Its Rise.—"I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn." Dan. vii. 8. "And of the ten horns that (were) in his head, and (of) the other which came up." Verse 20.

History.—The Roman empire had established on its territory, from A. D. 427, to A. D. 477, ten kingdoms: (a) The Vandals, in Africa; (b) The Suevi, in Spain; (c) The Alans, in Spain; (d) The Burgundians, in Gaul; (e) The Franks, in Gaul; (f) The Visigoths, first in France, then in Spain; (g) The Saxons, in Britain; (h) The Ostrogoths, in Illyria and Pannonia; (i) The Lombards, in north-eastern Italy; (j) The Herull, in Italy. These ten kingdoms, with their localities, are named, that it may be clearly seen that the "little horn came up among them."

It is called a "little horn." This kingdom (central kingdom) sprang up from donations of farms, and not by the force of its own arms. Under the Calovingian dynasty, the dominion of cities and provinces was added. The donation of the "Exarchate of Ravenna" was the first fruits under the conquests of Pepin. In this grant were included Ravenna, Bologna, and Ferrara. This was paid by Pepin for the remission of his sins and the salvation of his soul. These, with the Duchy of Spoleto, completed the ecclesiastical states, or the central kingdom of little horns.

"That donation, so mysterious circle, was enlarged to an infinite extent, (de-)nations by the verbal or written donation of Charlemagne. The sovereignty of the exculpate melted (was humbled)"—Bible) away in the hands of the popes." Under this body of civil rulers the little horn attained to its full power, being aided by the influence of its eyes and mouth (ecclesiastical authority).

2. Prophecy.—"Another shall rise after them." Verse 24.

History.—The ten horns (kingdoms) came up on the imperial head of the fourth beast, between A. D. 427 and 477; the little horn did not come to the surface of the head till A. D. 508 to A. D. 541. It was, therefore, the younger horn—the "pet."

3. Prophecy.—"And he shall be diverse from the first" (ten).

History.—The ten horns were so similar that they formed one group or family. These ten kingdoms were organized out of the savage tribes which had, from time to time, invaded the Roman empire, and finally conquered it. On its territory they erected ten kingdoms.

We might denominate them the "clay" kingdoms, since they mingled with the Romans, but were as diverse from them as clay is diverse from iron. The little horn had in it a large admixture of iron. The papal kingdom had in it much of the old Roman element. In consequence of its eyes and mouth, (ecclesiastical material) there were combined in its substance great strength and vitality. Its eyes and mouth constituted a very marked peculiarity.

4. Prophecy.—"In this horn (were) eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth."

History.—All the ten kingdoms had heads, or bodies of civil rulers. They exercised a general supervision over their own subjects and territory. They had, therefore, as all kingdoms, legislative, judicial, and executive authority, symbolized by eyes and mouth. This kingdom had two sets of officers, civil and ecclesiastical. Its hierarchy, or priesthood is symbolized by the eyes and mouth. The eyes were like the eyes of a man, since one man (the pope) acted for all. That power is called the "Roman see." It oversees the world.

5. Prophecy.—"Whose look (was) more stout than his fellows."

History.—The meaning of stout in the old English, was bold; then, its meaning would be, he was more bold than his fellows. So it appears in the original. He feared no king, nor did he blush to usurp the throne of the Deity, that he might have power to trample on the rights of his fellows. He recognized no nation as his peer.

6. Prophecy.—"A mouth that speaks very great things." Verse 20. "Speaking great things." Verse 8. "He shall speak (great) words against the Most High." Verse 25; see verse 11.

History.—Pope Innocent III. said: "Christ has set one man over the world; him whom he appointed his vicar on earth, and as unto Christ, so unto him shall every knee bow, in heaven, in earth, and under the earth." A very bold speech for one man to make against all other men and nations.

Pope Gregory VII.: "In him (the Roman pontiff) alone is the right of making laws. Let all kings kiss his feet. His name alone should be heard in the churches. It is the only name in the world. It is his right to depose kings. His sentence is not to be repealed by any one but by himself alone. He is to be judged by none."

Read the following words used by the mouth of this little horn: "Countenance of thy Divine majesty." "Another God on earth." "Our Lord God the pope." "The pope doth whatsoever he listeth; even things unlawful; and is more than God."

7. Prophecy.—"Before whom were three of the first horns plucked up by the root (Heb., humbled).

History.—"Under this body of rulers, the kingdoms of the Herull under Odoacer, the Ostrogoths under the Theoderic, and the Lombards established under Alboin, were humbled. The pope wears a triple crown. He has also three keys to represent triple kingdoms.

8. Prophecy.—"The same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them until the Ancient of Days came, and rendered judgment in favor of the saints of the Most High." Verses 21, 22. "He shall wear out the saints." Verse 25.

History.—Dr. Scott, remarks: "No computation can reach the numbers who have been put to death, in different ways, on account of their maintaining the profession of the gospel, and opposing the corruptions of the Church of Rome. A million of poor Waldenses perished in France. Nine hundred thousand orthodox Christians were slain in less than thirty years of the institution of the order of Jesuits. The Duke of Alva boasted of having put thirty-six thousand to death by the hands of the common executioner, during the space of a few years. These are a few specimens, and but few of those which history has recorded. But the total amount will never be known, till the earth shall disclose her blood, and no more cover her dead." Dr. John Owen says: "What, I pray you, has been their main business, for seven hundred years and upwards, even almost ever since the Man of Sin has been enthroned?"

The massacre, that commenced on the eve of St. Bartholomew's day in Paris, did not cease till sixty thousand Protestants were slain in France. When the news of this event reached Rome, Pope Gregory XIII. instituted the most solemn rejoicing, giving thanks to Almighty God for this glorious victory over the heretics.

"One hundred and fifty thousand perished in the Inquisition; and one hundred and fifty thousand by the Irish massacre; besides the vast multitudes, who were proscribed, banished, starved, burnt, buried alive, smothered, drowned, assassinated, chained to the galleys for life, or immured within the horrid walls of the bastile, or others of their church or state prisons." "Drunken with the blood of saints." Thus have they [illegible] out the saints.

9. Prophecy.—"And think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand, until a time and times, and the dividing of time." Verse 25.

History.—Gregory VII., in his epistle, says: "The Roman pontiff, by right, is universal. In him alone is the right of making laws."

Mr. Keith says: "He (the Roman pontiff) assumed a prerogative, and exercised a power, such as no race of kings ever claimed; and exalted himself above all, maintained an unparalleled ascendency, and prospered during a period which scarcely any dynasty on earth ever equaled."

Gregory VII. thundered out a terrible excommunication against the emperor of Germany, Henry IV., in which he anathematized him and all his adherents, declared him to have forfeited the kingdom of Germany and Italy, together with all regal dignity; forbade all Christians to obey him; bestowed the kingdom of Germany on Radulphus, elected by the princes of Germany. King John of England, was forced to resign his crown into his hands, and to do homage to him, and to receive it as a gift from the Holy See; and the pope's legate, who retained possession of it five days, trampled under his feet the money which, in token of his vassalage, was given him by the king. The Emperor Henry IV. was made to wait three days at the gates of the fortress of Canusium, bare-headed, and in his bare feet, with nothing but a coarse cloth over him, before Gregory VII. would grant him absolution.

At the command of another pope, the English Henry II. walked in his bare feet to do penance at the tomb of Becket.

Pope Celestin dashed with his foot the crown from the head of Henry VI.; and Pope Alexander trod on the neck of the Emperor Frederick I. The bull of the pope, in which the deposition of Queen Elizabeth was pronounced, is in these words: "Him alone hath God constituted Prince over all nations, and over all kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant."

10. Prophecy.—"They (ten horns) shall take away his dominion." Verse 26.

History.—The French horn was commissioned, as a special agent, to accomplish this work, February 10, 1798, by Berthier, at the head of the French army, appears before the city. Soon after, the pope was commanded to retire into Tuscany, and to dispossess himself of all his temporal power. He replied: "As supreme pontiff, I am resolved to do so in the exercise of all my powers." Force was used, and he was taken prisoner. His rings were torn from his fingers, and he was carried into captivity. A republic was established at Rome. This act was ratified, as far as dominion was concerned, at the congress of Vienna in 1815.

11. Prophecy.—"To consume and to destroy it (it) unto the end." Verse 26.

History.—Since the events above described, that power (temporal) has been subject to many changes; but the civil power has been gradually wasting. A few years since Italy was erected into a kingdom under Victor Emmanuel. But it was not till recently that he dared to make the city of Rome the seat of his government, and to reside there with the pope and the Vatican, in his immediate presence. That the contrast between 1798 and 1878 may be clearly seen, allow us to notice some events that transpired at Rome during the last few days of the life of Victor Emmanuel, at his funeral, and at Cincinnati, Ohio, among the Italian Catholics.

The correspondent of the London Herald telegraphed from Rome that the death of Victor Emmanuel filled Rome with consternation. "Immense crowds had thronged the piazza before the palace from an early hour, eagerly seeking news of the king's condition; and when the announcement was made that he was no more, the wildest exclamations of grief burst forth from the dense concourse of people. Strong men burst into tears. Women fainted, and despair was depicted on every countenance." .... "The pope evinced deep feeling when he received the news. During the day he had frequently sent to inquire as to the king's condition, and offered the services of his own doctor to assist the king's physician. He also conferred the blessing in articulo mortis." The funeral procession was one hour and a half in passing a given point. There were 2,700 deputations from all parts of Italy, numbering each from five to several hundreds.

The Italians of Cincinnati commemorated the death of Victor Emmanuel at the cathedral. The services were conducted by Archbishop Purcell. Upon the coffin were a sword and belt, and a military hat with a waving white plume. At the foot were magnificent crosses of flowers, three or four feet high, while at the head was a crown richly wrought in flowers. The services were conducted in every respect as if the dead body was in the coffin. Father Guido delivered a sermon in Italian, and Archbishop Purcell spoke in English.

Archbishop Purcell said that "He thanked God that the king, for whom they had to-day offered prayer believed in Christ, and hoped for salvation through him. Through all his reign it was consoling to know that he still held on to the faith of his ancestors, the princes of Savoy. His last moments in this faith were happy ones.

"It was a great consolation to the people of Rome to know that when Victor Emmanuel became king of Italy and took possession of Rome, he did not do it through ambition, but because the people wanted a king.

"Rome had been governed by 265 popes, but their rule was at this time set aside because the people wanted a king, a more powerful head to their government. The Italians in Rome wanted a united Italy and a stronger government."

Corollaries.—The following corollaries are deduced as evidently true from the foregoing prophecies, historic sketch, and reasonings:

Cor. i.: Since the dominion of the little horn (its domination over its fellows) has been taken away; and that act was to be preceded by a judgment, (Dan. vii. 9, 26,) we conclude, that said judgment is a matter of history also.

Cor. ii.: Since the glad tidings of that decision, rendered in favor of the saints was designed to be known by the saints for their encouragement and hope, and since it has been proclaimed more or less during this century, we conclude that the angel of Rev. xiv. 6, 7, is on his mission.

Cor. iii.: Since the taking away of the dominion was to be succeeded by a consuming and wasting of said power till it shall totally cease, and since, from the above items of recent history, it appears to have been wholly set aside by the government of Victor Emmanuel and his son, Humbert I.; and since this is acknowledged by the words of the little horn; the three kingdoms constituting the pope's patrimony now forming part of the united kingdom of Italy under King Humbert I., we conclude that the little horn (civil power), except its eyes and mouth (papal hierarchy) is extinct.

Cor. iv.: Since the civil dominion, exercised by said power over his "fellows," has been taken away (in 1798) by the authority of said kingdoms, and his civil authority, exercised over his own territory, has gradually passed into the hands of the great king, Victor Emmanuel, and to his son Humbert I., so as to leave him without any civil rule, we infer that he is now a private subject of the great king.

Cor. v.: Since all prophecy, relative to the little horn's civil power is now passing into history, we conclude that the time is come for the saints to take the kingdom. Verse 18.

Cor. vi.: Since the Roman hierarchy, symbolized in Dan. vii., by the eyes and mouth of the little horn, and in Rev. xvii., by a woman (mystic Babylon) on a scarlet colored wild beast, drunken with the blood of saints, has developed in history such a position and character, and since that body is dejected from said controlling power over the beast and the saints, we conclude that her judgment is passed and that she (mystic Babylon) is fallen!!

Cor. vii.: Since she is fallen (by the hostile movements of her waters—river, Rev. xvii. 15,) we conclude that her fall was caused by the drying up of her water—river.

A Contrast Between Methodist Preachers and Holy Prophets.

"CHICAGO, January 21.—The Methodist ministers of this city have adopted the following resolution: That we, the members of the Chicago Preachers' Meeting of the Methodist Episcopal church, take this occasion to re-affirm our belief in the future endless punishment of the wicked, as distinguished from the theory of restorationists on the one hand, and that of annihilation on the other."

The foregoing paragraph is copied from a recent newspaper, and, if a true item of news, it shows that those preachers are against the holy prophets, for the latter affirm and "re-affirm" the extinction of the wicked, as the following testimonies prove.

"The day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch. .... And ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet in the day that I shall do this, saith the Lord of hosts." Malachi iv. 1, 3.

"The enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away." Psalm, xxxvii. 20.

"They shall be as though they had not been." Obadiah 16.

Could any human ingenuity frame words into sentences that would more clearly and completely express the utter extinction of the wicked? It will readily be perceived, however, that this great truth of Scripture is totally and entirely opposed to the theory of endless-tormentists on the one hand, as well as to that of restorationists on the other. To inflict a death which will never be relieved or terminated by a resurrection, is to inflict an everlasting punishment. And such a death ("the second death") is the "everlasting punishment" threatened against the wicked; for the Bible does not say that the wages of sin is torture, but "the wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23.

Nothing occurs in the apostolic writings which, if rightly interpreted, will conflict with what we have quoted from the prophets, for Paul said "none other things than those which Moses and the prophets did say should come." Acts xxvi.

And Peter declares that in taking heed to the "sure word of prophecy," we "do well." 2 Peter i. 19. "If they hear not Moses and the prophets neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." Luke xvi. 31.

The past may be compared to a great ever-ascending pyramid, to which each generation has added a layer or stratum, and from the top of which each generation, as it emerges into the light of the present, may see further than its predecessor. Education is in every age more difficult than in the preceding. But the reward increases in exact proportion to the labor; the higher the pyramid to be ascended, the wider the prospect to be obtained.—Peter Bayne.

A large portion of divine truth is presented in the Scriptures under the form of emblems, which can only be understood by such as have ears to hear. That of a harvest is a prominent one. Two harvests are spoken of in Scripture, one of wheat and tares, and the other of grapes. Both are types of the great harvest of souls. The wheat represents the children of God; the tares, the children of the wicked one among professing Christians; whilst the openly wicked are represented by the grapes of the vine of the earth, as opposed to the true vine. These three classes.—Dr. Heymoth.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, Editor.

PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, FEB. 13, 1878.

IN our exegetical of last week, in the sixth line read wake for sleep in the reference to I Thess. v. 10.

THE body of the dead pope was removed on Saturday night to St. Peter's church, and immense throngs crowded the place to see his remains on Sunday. The body lies on a crimson bed arrayed in the pontifical robes. Twelve large candelabra surround the bed, and the feet are placed in a position outside the altar so that the faithful may kiss them.

THE European situation is involved in the greatest uncertainty. England is in a position where, to go forward, necessitates war, and to retract involves national dishonor. Her fleet, probably through Russian influence, has been refused the privilege of entering the Dardanelles, and, all things considered, a general European war is not improbable.

BROTHER J. C. OBANION, from Lusby's Mills, Owen county, Kentucky, made us a visit. His object was to be baptized into Christ with that faith and hope in the gospel of the kingdom which he had more fully learned. We hope that he will form the acquaintance of Brother Skeels, of Mercer county, and plan for work in that field. We baptized him on Tuesday evening of Feb. 5th.

OUR limits preclude saying much to our brethren and correspondents. Will find room for some articles on hand as soon as we can. Let all remember THE RESTITUTION. We all need a medium to point out, by the way-marks, our nearness to the consummation. What we do for the cause of our Messiah must be done without delay. The time for labor and sacrifice is near its close. Then comes the kingdom and reward.

Death of the Pope.

A dispatch from Rome last Thursday evening was to the effect that the pope died on that day at 4:57 p. m.

Pius IX., whose unofficial name was Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti, was born in Sinigaglia, May 13, 1792, and was, consequently nearly eighty-six years old. He was from a family whose nobility dates as early as the thirteenth century, and his father was a chief magistrate in his native city. It will be seen from the date of his birth, that it occurred at a time when the French revolution was commencing to rock all Europe, as with the throes of an earthquake, and when this child first saw the light, in Sinigaglia on the shores of the Adriatic, Italy was about to be stirred to her profoundest depths with the principles that agitated the French nation, and which were supposed to promise so much for the cause of popular liberty.

His mother, the Countess Catarina Sallazzi, a woman of rare intelligence, superintended her son's primary education.

In 1803, he was placed in the college of Volters, in Tuscany, to pursue his classical studies, but was compelled to suspend them in 1803, in consequence of attacks of epilepsy, but his malady abating somewhat in intensity, he received the clerical tonsure, and went to Rome in 1809 to study theology. In the following year he returned to Sinigaglia and pursued his studies under the direction of an uncle. Subsequently he entered the military service but his infirmity disqualified him for a soldier's career. He received priest's orders in 1819, and in July 1823 he left Rome as secretary to Monsignore Muzzi, the apostolic delegate to Chili, South America, and spent two years in this republic ministering to the Indian populations of the interior. In 1825, he returned to Rome, and in 1828, became archbishop of Spoleto in Umbria. In 1832, he was transferred to the See of Imola in Emilia, and his administration here made him so popular, that he was created cardinal Dec. 23, 1839, and proclaimed in full consistory in Dec, 1840. At this time, and for the six following years, his future election to the pontifical chair was favorably contemplated. On the death of Gregory XVI., June 1, 1846, he was, through the aid of influential representative men, designated as the fittest candidate for his successor, and on June 16, 1846, he was elected by acclamation, two days after the opening of the conclave, and Cardinal Mastai assumed the name of Pius IX. Desirous of reform, actuated by the best intentions, and possessed of fair abilities, he set about the work of promoting the peace and prosperity of Italy. Called upon to solve the most complicated problems in politics, he decided upon a constitutional form of government, upon granting an amnesty to political offenders, by which thousands of prisoners were at once restored to liberty. He granted to the Jews the charter of liberty and equality that they had always been deprived of in Rome, and abolished all the abominable restrictions of the Ghetto.

He was especially friendly to the working and poorer classes, and did all that a ruler could do to promote their improvement intellectually, morally, and physically. Asylums were opened for the needy and schools were founded for the instruction of the children of tradesmen and workingmen. Wastes were converted into fruitful fields, and one half of the harvest proceeds were distributed to the poor. The schemes of radicals like Mazzini and Garibaldi for making Italy a federative republic, and the armed intervention of Austria in the affairs of Italy, finally caused the feeling of opposition to culminate in the cry of "Down with the priests! No more priests in the government!" The French revolution of 1848, gave a most powerful impulse to the enthusiasm of Italian patriots, riots broke out, popular systems of representative government were demanded, and the popular disaffection was so greatly increased that Count Ropi, the pope's minister was assassinated on the door step of the council chamber as he was about to open the session, on Nov. 15, 1848, and the next day the populace filled the Quirinal, and, aided by the guards, gendarmerie, rioters, and troops of the line urged the pope to accept the most revolutionary measures, after shooting down Monsignore Palmier, his secretary, by his side. After remaining a prisoner till the 24th, with no control over civil affairs, he escaped in the disguise of a simple priest, in the carriage of the Bavarian minister to Gaeta, the first town in the Neapolitan territory. A republic was established in February, 1849, at the head of which were Mazzioni, Armellini, and Saffi, which, though bravely defended by Garibaldi, fell in struggle with the army sent against it by France, and Oudinot and his victorious Frenchmen entered Rome on July 5, 1849. On April 12, 1850, Pius IX. re-entered Rome amid the thunder of French cannon. But notwithstanding his restoration to the seat of Catholic power, he was destined to see that power entirely pass out of his grasp. The idea of Italian unity and nationality was too deeply cherished in the hearts of his Italian countrymen for them to rest satisfied without its realization. Victor Emmanuel became possessed of one portion of the papal states one after another till on March 17, 1861, he assumed the title of king of Italy, which was bestowed on him by the Italian parliament. By 1870, he became master of the residue of the states of the church, and on July 2, 1871, in consequence of the removal of the French troops, took up his residence in the Quirinal palace, and Rome became the capital of united Italy, thus putting an end to the temporal sovereignty of the popes. Two events of an ecclesiastical nature have rendered the pontificate of Pius IX. remarkable. On December 8, 1854, the definition of the doctrine of the immaculate conception was promulgated with great pomp in the basilica of St. Peter, in the presence of more than 300 archbishops, bishops and prelates, and in Sept. 1857, a movement was inaugurated by the pope at Rome in commemoration of the decree. On July 18, 1870, the dogma of papal infallibility was passed by the vote of 534 prelates of the Roman church and promulgated to the world as one of its articles of belief.

Thus, after an eventful life, has passed away a ruler who began his career with efforts for political reform. In mounting the pontifical chair, he ascended also the temporal throne of the eternal city, and became monarch of no inconsiderable portion of classic Italy. But at the end of his career, he leaves the world bereft of the last shred of civil authority. Yet more, perhaps, than ever, the Papacy sways the minds of more than two hundred millions, who glory in the name Catholic. The dead pope, who now lies in state in the choir chapel of St. Peter's, commenced his life when the dark storm of revolution was about to sweep Europe with such a tempest of whirlwind fury, as would make thrones and chairs of state mere playthings in the blast. He has ended his career when another revolutionary storm-cloud is rapidly overspreading the political heavens, that threatens to bring on the very consummation of apocalyptic woes. Like other men, who go down to the grave, he descends into death—"of all but moral character bereaved." He has boldly, unblushingly and blasphemously assumed infallibility, one of the attributes of the eternal God; and must meet the judgment of him who will not give his glory to another. A conclave of fallible mortals will—professedly—soon re-invest some worm of the earth with this incommunicable attribute of Jehovah. One question must force itself on all thoughtful minds. How can a number of fallible men communicate in the aggregate, what no one in particular possesses? As well talk about an aggregate of mortals communicating immortality. The new Pope will no doubt be chosen more in reference to his political fitness for present complications, than with regard to other qualifications. As a temporal political power, the 1260 years of its supremacy expired in 1798. Since that time it has been in the consumptive process of the judgment spoken of by David the prophet. Dan. vii. 26, 26. As an ecclesiasticism, over which Pontiffs now only have rule left, Romanism reads its swiftly approaching doom in Rev. xviii. At the end of the set time consumption wasted the power of the western antichristian horn; as the set time of the other nears its close, the power of the eastern antichristian horn rapidly evaporates. We shall soon witness the closing scenes of the drama. A personal antichrist may be revealed, but we look for the revelation of God's Messiah to unseat all the usurpers of his rights. When the last time of trouble shall distress the world, and the whirlwind of God's fury sweep the earth of all antichristian despotism, may we be above the storm.

Hades.

We, last week, gave a list of passages from the Old Testament containing every occurrence of the Hebrew word sheol, with its translation into the authorized English version by the words hell, grave and pit. In our present number we proceed to give every passage from the New Testament that contains the corresponding Greek term ado, hades. As seen by the following list, the word occurs eleven times and its English rendering is indicated by the words in italics:

Matt. xi. 23: Shalt be brought down to hell.
Matt. xvi. 18: The gates of hell shall not prevail.
Luke x. 15: Shalt be thrust down to hell.
Luke xvi. 23: In hell he lifted up his eyes.
Acts ii. 27: Will not leave my soul in hell.
Acts ii. 31: His soul was not left in hell.
1 Cor. xv. 55: O grave, where is thy victory?
Rev. i. 18: Have the keys of hell and of death.
Rev. vi. 8: Was death and hell followed.
Rev. xx. 13: Death and hell delivered up the dead.
Rev. xx. 14: Death and hell were cast into the lake of fire.

The Hebrew term שְׁאוֹל, sheol, is translated into the Greek Septuagint sixty times by the word adης, hades; in 2 Sam. xxii. 6, and Prov. xxiii. 14, it is translated by θανατος, death, and in Job xxiv. 19, the verse differs somewhat in sense from the Hebrew, and sheol has no representative. In the Peshito Syriac, generally admitted to be the oldest version of the New Testament in any language that passes down to us, dating from the close of the first century, or the commencement of the second,—a translation attributed to some one of the apostles, or one of the primitive evangelists—the Greek word hades is translated sheol in every instance. In translating the New Testament into Hebrew, hades is also rendered sheol without a single variation. This is evidence sufficient to demonstrate the perfect equivalency of the two terms. "The word hades—ades—comes from the Greek mythology, and was a name originally given to the king of the lower or invisible world, but afterward applied to the infernal regions, while the king came to be known as Pluto. Hades was a place of darkness even in its mithological conception, the residence of Pluto and Proserpine, and the abode of the dead. Its gates were kept closed, that no shade (ghost) might escape to the world of light, and were guarded by the terrible, and many-headed dog Cerberus."—Encyclopedia. Twice in the New Testament, the word is used in reference to the threatened desolations of Capernaum; and the doom which our Lord pronounced against this unbelieving place has been so remarkably fulfilled, that, in the present day, no ecclesiastical tradition even ventures to fix its site. Exalted to heaven once, it is now in the flat of dead and buried cities, without a memorial marble or an epitaph. Once the word is used in promising the church of the Redeemer its final emancipation from the dreary prison of the grave, when he says "the gates of hades shall not prevail against it." He has the "keys of hades and of death," and will unlock the massive bars of the grave, and set the prisoners free at the resurrection.

Twice it is used of Christ in the death-state, when it says of him that his soul—person—was not left in hades long enough to see corruption, as God gave his holy one a speedy resurrection from hades or the grave. In 1 Cor. xv. 55, it is personified, and thus addressed after the resurrection of the saintly dead from its drear cells—"O Hades, where is thy victory?" thus showing the improbability of its retaining the church forever. The only place where it gives any coloring to the modern ideas attached to the word hell, is Luke xvi. 23. The belief of the Jews after the exile, took its coloring from the heathen mythology, and it became a notion generally prevalent, that hades is an intermediate state between death and the resurrection, divided into two parts, one, the abode of the blessed, and the other of the lost. To those departments they gave the name of Paradise and Gehenna. Says Dr. Farrar in regard to the more modern belief of this two-fold division—"In holding this view, main reliance is placed in the parable of Dives and Lazarus; but it is impossible to ground the proof of an important theological doctrine on a passage which confessedly abounds in Jewish metaphors. 'Theologia parabolica non est demonstrativa,' is a rule too valuable to be forgotten; and if we are to turn rhetoric into logic, and build a dogma on every metaphor, our belief will be of a vague and contradictory character."

The rhetorical personification of the dead by the prophets,—Isa. xiv. 9-20; Ezek. xxxii. 21-27,—and by our Lord, —Luke xvi. 19-31,—was never designed to teach the atrocious doctrines connected with the modern ideas of eternal hell torments. Let our readers now take their Bibles and read the seventy-six occurrences of the equivalent words sheol and hades in their full connection as we have indicated, and they will have no particular difficulty in arriving at the knowledge of the truth with regard to these terms.

Theology, if to be of any reliable value, must be drawn from parables.

EXEGETICAL.

Scriptures that are Mistranslated and Misunderstood.

In quoting Bible proof on any question, it is clearly of the first importance that we have the exact statement of the speaker or writer quoted. And this, we regret to say, is not always to be obtained from our English version.

We have been reminded of this by an article in the Banner for Jan. 3d, quoting Mark ix. 43—"the fire that never shall be quenched"—on which it says: "The idea here expressed is that the fire will never cease to burn, and not simply that it is impossible to extinguish it." Undoubtedly that is the statement in our English Bible, but—it is not what our Lord said. The author of "Is Eternal Punishment Endless?" (an orthodox clergyman he styles himself, a well known and most thorough Greek scholar,) thus puts it: "The word 'never' is a contribution of our translators to the original." It is in reality an unauthorized human addition of a recent date.

The Greek word, whose rendering our translators thus unwarrantably expand, is ασβεστον—asbeston, compounded of α, negative, i. e. not, and σβεννυμι—sbennumi, to quench, meaning then not quenched; or as an adjective expressing the quality thus suggested, unquenchable. Our translators correctly so render the word in Matt. iii. 12: "He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable [Gr. ασβεστω] fire."

One may say, "Well, that amounts to the same thing; a fire unquenchable, which cannot be put out, never ceases to burn." That conclusion by no means follows. "Unquenchable" and "never shall be quenched" are not synonymous terms. An unquenchable fire once swept through the business heart of Chicago; but, to-day, it is not there burning on. Fire has no independent existence of its own. It depends upon the chemical decomposition, or destruction, of some material, by which, as we say, it is fed. When the fuel is exhausted, the fire, before unquenchable, ceases to burn.

Again, it is most important to give the established Scripture meaning to Scripture language. We find it is often argued that because the fire of the future is termed everlasting, (or eternal, as the one Greek word is rendered,) it is actually to burn on forever. But Scripture ever denominates that eternal which is eternal in its results. We speak of eternal redemption, (Heb. ix. 12,) by which we understand a redemption effected once in time, but for eternity. We speak of eternal judgment, (Heb. vi. 2,) by which we understand a judgment whose decision is for eternity, not that the Judge is to be eternally judging or eternally condemning; where then were the execution of the sentence? So, eternal death is not eternally dying, and never dead; it is a death, or loss of life, that endures for eternity. So, "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, in flaming fire [not therefore metaphorical or figurative] fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God," (2 Thess. i. 7, 8,) the fire which accomplishes that foretold "everlasting destruction" is Scripturally termed aionian, eternal. And this appellation calls attention to the contrast between its results and that of fire in the present life. The latter effects but a temporary loss of life, for the first death is but till the resurrection; the destruction by the fire of the future is eternal—it is the unending loss of life or the second death.

Let not any one say that the answer is something incombustible. Not so; it is the language of God's revealed word. That likens him to the most combustible of substances, the soonest consumed in the flames. "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv. 1. So the wicked are compared to chaff, (Matt. iii. 12; to tares, (Matt. xiii. 30,) to thorns cut up, (Isa. xxxiii. 12,) to the fat of lambs, (Psa. xxxvii. 20,) which are burned up, devoured, consumed. Surely, here the Bible gives no uncertain sound. "As the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of the age," (Matt. xiii. 40;) "they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry." Nahum i. 10.

We need hardly here call attention to the absurdity of the inference drawn from the belief that the unquenchable fire endures forever, viz., that, from its terrible and unending nature, we are to gather it never will succeed in accomplishing its work; so that what it is kindled to "consume," (Psa. xxxvii. 10,) never will be consumed!

In conclusion, then, let us take heed never to read into any Scripture a meaning which its language will not warrant. And, in Mark ix. 43, let us draw our pens through those supplied words "that never shall be," and, changing "quenched" to "unquenchable," thus have before us the exact language of our Lord.—Chas. L. Loos, A. M., in Bible Banner.

Iowa's Weather Prophet.

Professor E. J. Couch, of Grand Junction, Iowa, is coming into prominence as a weather prophet. He gives the following for February:

"The cyclone periods will be from the 2d to the 6th; 9th to 10th; 12th to 13th; 15th to 17th; 20th to 21st; 25th to 27th.

"The severer periods will be from the 6th to 13th, and from the 25th to 27th. On 9th to 13th there will be a similarity of circumstances that existed on November 25th, 1877. Mars will be near Neptune, and the moon will pass them both. The best way to observe any oscillation of the earth is to place a full bowl of water in a pan, and if any is spilled the time and direction can be shown.

"The period for unfavorable crops for the Northern states will commence in 1878, reaching a maximum in 1880. These periods are ten and one-half years, having a secondary maximum every five years. These periods alternate with the Southern states. These periods can be shown by the crop statistics. The Pacific slope will have abundant rains; the Eastern slope of the Rocky range will have limited; the Missippi valley insufficient; the western slope of the Alleghenies will be well supplied, while the Atlantic coast will suffer.

"There should be sufficient money furnished that the whole crop that is desired to be disposed of can be taken by our own people, and at prices that will pay the cost of production. This would enable men to pay their obligations, and tend to a revival of trade.

"In 1860 corn sold in Central Iowa for 8c per bushel, and in 1850 corn sold in the same localities for $1.50 per bushel."

Mr. Couch has been remarkably successful in his conclusions, and claims they are based on correct principles. In February, 1877, he said the grasshoppers would in the summer go southward, and they did, although the government commission of entomologists said they would go northwest. In April of the same year, he said Iowa would produce the biggest crop of corn ever harvested, and so she did. In October he foretold the earthquake of November, and described its course, and it came within three days of the time fixed, and precisely as he said. He disagrees almost entirely with Professor Tice. Last summer Professor Tice located a cyclone somewhere in Missouri at a certain period. Mr. Couch said it would not come, and it did not. If the big storm eastward last week comes within the range of Mr. Couch's observation, he guessed well. A.

During the negotiations for a definitive peace, the armies of the czar and his allies will occupy five-sixths of Roumania, including Adrianople and Philippopolis, nearly the whole of Bulgaria, the whole of old Servia, and the territories bordering on Montenegro; while a Greek force of 12,000 men will have entered Epirus, Thessaly, and a portion of Macedonia. In Asia, Russia will hold the fortified towns of Kars, Ardahan, Erzeroum, and Batoum, with the larger part of the province of Armenia. More than three-fourths of the sultan's European and a portion of his Asiatic dominions will thus remain in the hands of the Russians pending a final settlement.

EASTERN ITEMS.

CONSTANTINOPLE, February 10.—The Turkish forces to-day evacuated Widin, Rustchuk, Silistria, Belgradschick and Ercerouma, and have withdrawn from the Bujuk-chekmejeh lines to a line from Kujuk-Chekmejeh to Akbounar. The neutral zone is twelve miles broad.

In the event of a rupture of the armistice, the Turks could not reoccupy the Constantinople lines, as the neutral zone would remain neutral till the end of three days' notice of a resumption of hostilities. Preparations are making to defend the exterior lines.

LONDON, Feb. 10.—Three Austrian men-of-war have been ordered to the Bosphorus. Italian vessels are also going there.

A number of Russian sailors have gone overland to the Sea of Marmora to man certain Turkish men-of-war which are about to be surrendered.

A Vienna correspondent confirms the report that the British action has produced a serious impression in both Berlin and St. Petersburgh. It is questioned whether the Porte by admitting foreign men-of-war does not give Russia a right to march on Constantinople.

LONDON, Feb. 11.—The following dispatch is dated at Constantinople, Sunday night: "The Porte has refused a firman permitting the British fleet to come to Constantinople, on the ground that if the Sultan allows it, the Russian forces will probably occupy the city."

ATHENS, Feb. 20.—The recall of the troops from Thessaly and Epirus caused much public indignation. The government considers the situation still critical, and has ordered arms and ammunition sufficient for 50,000 men. The Mobile Guard is to be raised to 140,000 men.

PARIS, Feb. 10.—Advices from Ragusa state that the Porte objects to Montenegro establishing a line of demarcation for the armistice on a basis of uti possidetis. The renewal of hostilities between Turkey and Montenegro is imminent.

ROME, Feb. 10.—Contrary to previous arrangements, the Pope's body was removed last night to the Sistine Chapel, and thence through the covered passage to St. Peter's, where he will lie in state to-day, Monday, and Tuesday. The alteration implies the hastening of the conclave.

Prophecy.

And I saw, and I heard, one eagle flying mid heaven, saying with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe, to those who dwell on the earth, from the remaining blast of the trumpets of the three angels who are about to sound. Rev. viii 13. Diaglott.

To my mind this vision is now being fulfilled; and this one is the Russian eagle that now moves so swiftly through the Roman heaven, and that this eagle, in stirring up the Eastern question is sounding the notes of coming war. I did not in the beginning of the war, neither do I believe that Russia, or any other power, will succeed in erasing Turkey from the earth as a nation. It is barely possible that peace, for a short time, may be made; but it is more probable that the demands of Russia will be such that Turkey can not accept, and England will not tolerate. If this one eagle is Russia, then before the great conflict of the four angels comes, the locusts of the fifth trumpet must do their five months' work of tormenting men. As "coming events cast their shadows before," the trumpets may have had a shadowy fulfillment extending over hundreds of years. But the real fulfillment belongs to the time of the end; and as four have sounded since the session of the judgment, the other three must sound.

As I now write an effort is being made for peace. But the peace, if made, must be as fickle as those who make it. The locusts must do their work, and the great conflict in which the third of the men will be killed, must come, and then the third and last woe will come quickly. Let me say to the lovers of truth, keep your eye on the movements of this one eagle, for it is hardly possible for Russia to fly much further without rousing up the other eagles, and the lion, and all the beasts and birds of prey. They all seem to be eager for the supper the great God makes for them.

But to my mind the church question is a greater one than the Eastern question. That at the end of the conflict of the four angels, the ten toes of the Image, and the ten horns of Rev. xvii., will be placed in their proper places to fill the prophetic mold, I have no doubt. Let us watch, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto us at the revelation of the righteous Judge. Let us bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ.

Scriptures that are Mistranslated and Misunderstood.

In quoting Bible proof on any question, it is exactly of the first importance that we have the exact statement of the speaker or writer quoted. And this, we regret to say, is not always to be obtained from our English version.

We have been reminded of this by an article in the Banner for Jan. 3d, quoting Mark ix. 43—"the fire that never shall be quenched"—on which it says: "The idea here expressed is that the fire will never cease to burn, and not simply that it is impossible to extinguish it." Undoubtedly that is the statement in our English Bible, but it is not what our Lord said. The author of "Is Eternal Punishment Endless?" (an orthodox clergyman he styles himself, a well known and most thorough Greek scholar,) thus puts it:
"The word 'never' is a contribution of our translators to the original." It is in reality an unauthorized human addition of a recent date.

The Greek word, whose rendering our translators thus unwarrantably expand, is the word—asbestos, compounded of a, negative, i. e. not, and sbennumi, to quench, meaning then not quenched; or as an adjective expressing the quality thus suggested, unquenchable. Our translators correctly so render the word in Matt. iii. 12: "He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable [Gr. asbes- tos] fire."

One may say, "Well, that amounts to the same thing; a fire unquenchable, which cannot be put out, never ceases to burn." That conclusion by no means follows. "Unquenchable" and "never shall be quenched" are not synonymous terms. An unquenchable fire once swept through the business heart of Chicago; but, to-day, it is not there burning on. Fire has no independent existence of its own. It depends upon the chemical decomposition, or destruction, of some material, by which, as we say, it is fed. When the fuel is exhausted, the fire, before unquenchable, ceases to burn.

Again, it is most important to give the established Scripture meaning to Scripture language. We find it is often argued that because the fire of the future is termed everlasting, (or eternal, as the one Greek word is rendered,) it is actually to burn on forever. But Scripture ever denominates that eternal which is eternal in its results. We speak of eternal redemption, (Heb. ix. 12,) by which we understand a redemption effected once in time, but for eternity. We speak of eternal judgment, (Heb. vi. 2,) by which we understand a judgment whose decision is for eternity, not that the Judge is to be eternally judging or eternally condemning; where then were the execution of the sentence?
So, eternal death is not eternally dying, and never dead; it is a death, or loss of life, that endures for eternity.
So, "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, in flaming [not therefore metaphorical or figurative] fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God," (2 Thess. i. 7, 8,) the fire which accomplishes that foretold
"everlasting destruction" is Scripturally termed aionian, eternal. And this appellation calls attention to the contrast between its results and that of fire in the present life. The latter effects but a temporary loss of life, for the first death is but till the resurrection; the destruction by the fire of the future is eternal—it is the unending loss of life or the second death.

Let not any one say that the sinner is something incombustible. Not such is the language of God's revealed word.
That likens him to the most combustible of substances, the sinners' consumed in the flames. "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv. 1.
So the wicked are compared to chaff,
(Matt. iii. 12,) to tares, (Matt. xiii. 30,) to thorns cut up, (Isa. xxxiii. 12,) to the fat of lambs, (Psa. xxxvii. 20,) which are burned up, devoured, consumed. Surely, here the Bible gives no uncertain sound. "As the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of the age;"
(Matt. xiii. 40;) "they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry." Nahum
i. 10.

We need hardly here call attention to the absurdity of the inference drawn from the belief that the unquenchable fire endures forever, viz., that, from its terrible and unending nature, we are to gather it never will succeed in accomplishing its work: so that what it is kindled to "consume," (Psa. xxxvii. 20,) never will be consumed!

In conclusion, then, let us take heed never to read into any Scripture a meaning which its language will not warrant. And, in Mark ix. 43, let us draw our pens through those supplied words "that never shall be," and, changing "quenched" to "unquenchable," thus have before us the exact language of our Lord.—Chas. L. Loos,

Iowa's Weather Prophet.

Professor E. J. Couch, of Grand Junction, Iowa, is coming into prominence as a weather prophet. He gives the following for February:

"The cyclone periods will be from the 2d to the 6th; 9th to 10th; 12th to 13th; 16th to 17th; 20th to 21st; 25th to 27th.

"The severer periods will be from the 9th to 13th, and from the 25th to 27th. On 9th to 13th there will be a similarity of circumstances that existed on November 15th, 1877. Mars will be near Neptune, and the moon will pass them both. The best way to observe any oscillation of the earth is to place a full bowl of water in a pan, and if any is spilled the time and direction can be shown.

"The period for unfavorable crops for the Northern states will commence in 1878, reaching a maximum in 1880.
These periods are ten and one-half years, having a secondary maximum every five years. These periods alternate with the Southern states. These periods can be shown by the crop statistics. The Pacific slope will have abundant rains; the Eastern slope of the Rocky range will have limited; the Missippi valley insufficient; the western slope of the Alleghenies will be well supplied, while the Atlantic coast will suffer.

"There should be sufficient money furnished that the whole crop that is desired to be disposed of can be taken by our own people, and at prices that will pay the cost of production. This would enable men to pay their obligations, and tend to a revival of trade.

"In 1869 corn sold in Central Iowa for 84 per bushel, and in 1859 corn sold in the same localities for $1.50 per bushel."

Mr. Couch has been remarkably successful in his conclusions, and claims they are based on correct principles.
In February, 1877, he said the grasshoppers would in the summer go southward, and they did, although the government commission of entomologists said they would go northwest. In April of the same year, he said Iowa would produce the biggest crop of corn ever harvested, and so she did. In October he foretold the earthquake of November, and described its course, and it came within three days of the time fixed, and precisely as he said. He disagrees almost entirely with Professor Tice. Last summer Professor Tice located a cyclone somewhere in Missouri at a certain period.
Mr. Couch said it would not come, and it did not. If the big storm eastward last week comes within the range of Mr. Couch's observation, he guessed well. A.

During the negotiations for a definitive peace, the armies of the czar and his allies will occupy five-sixths of Roumania, including Adrianople and Philippopolis, nearly the whole of Bulgaria, the whole of old Servia, and the territories bordering on Montenegro; while a Greek force of 12,000 men will have entered Epirus, Thessaly, and a portion of Macedonia. In Asia, Russia will hold the fortified towns of Kars, Ardahan, Erzeroum, and Ba-toum, with the larger part of the province of Armenia. More than three-fourths of the sultan's European and a portion of his Asiatic dominions will thus remain in the hands of the Russians pending a final settlement.

EASTERN ITEMS.

CONSTANTINOPLE, February 10.—
The Turkish forces to-day evacuated
Widin, Rustchuk, Silistria, Belgradis-chik and Erzeroum, and have withdrawn from the Bujuk-chekmejeh lines to a line from Kujuk-Chekmejeh to Akhmar. The neutral zone is twelve miles broad.

In the event of a rupture of the armistice, the Turks could not reoccupy the Constantinople lines, as the neutral zone would remain neutral till the end of three days' notice of a resumption of hostilities. Preparations are making to defend the exterior lines.

LONDON, Feb. 10.—Three Austrian men-of-war have been ordered to the Bosphorus. Italian vessels are also going there.

A number of Russian sailors have gone overland to the Sea of Marmora to man certain Turkish men-of-war which are about to be surrendered.

A Vienna correspondent confirms the report that the British action has produced a serious impression in both Berlin and St. Petersburgh. It is questioned whether the Porte by admitting foreign men-of-war does not give Russia a right to march on Constantinople.

LONDON, Feb. 11.—The following dispatch is dated at Constantinople, Sunday night: "The Porte has refused a firman permitting the British fleet to come to Constantinople, on the ground that if the Sultan allows it, the Russian forces will probably occupy the city."

ATHENS, Feb. 20.—The recall of the troops from Thessaly and Epirus caused much public indignation. The government considers the situation still critical, and has ordered arms and ammunition sufficient for 50,000 men.
The Mobile Guard is to be raised to 140,000 men.

PARIS, Feb. 10.—Advices from Ra-gusa state that the Porte objects to Montenegro establishing a line of demarcation for the armistice on a basis of uti possidetis. The renewal of hostilities between Turkey and Montenegro is imminent.

ROME, Feb. 10.—Contrary to previous arrangements, the Pope's body was removed last night to the Sistine Chapel, and thence through the covered passage to St. Peter's, where he will lie in state to-day, Monday, and Tuesday.
The alteration implies the hastening of the conclave.

Prophecy.

And I saw, and I heard, one eagle flying in mid- heaven, saying with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe, to those who dwell on the earth, from the remaining blast of the trumpets of the three angels who are about to sound. Rev. viii. 13. Bleyber.

To my mind this vision is now being fulfilled; and this one is the Russian eagle that now moves so swiftly through the Roman heaven, and that this eagle, in stirring up the Eastern question is sounding the notes of coming war. I did not in the beginning of the war, neither do I believe that Russia, or any other power, will succeed in erasing Turkey from the earth as a nation. It is barely possible that peace, for a short time, may be made;
but it is more probable that the demands of Russia will be such that Turkey can not accept, and England will not tolerate. If this one eagle is Russia, then before the great conflict of the four angels comes, the locusts of the fifth trumpet must do their five months' work of tormenting men. As "coming events cast their shadows before," the trumpets may have had a shadowy fulfillment extending over hundreds of years. But the real fulfillment belongs to t to time of the end; and as four have sounded since the session of the judgment, the other three must sound.

As I now write an effort is being made for peace. But the peace, if made, must be as fickle as those who make it. The locusts must do their work, and the great conflict in which the third of the men will be killed, must come, and then the third and last woe will come quickly. Let me say to the lovers of truth, keep your eye on the movements of this one eagle, for it is hardly possible for Russia to fly much further without rousing up the other eagles, and the lion, and all the beasts and birds of prey.
They all seem to be eager for the supper the great God makes for them.

But to my mind the church question is a greater one than the Eastern question. That is the end of the conflict of the four angels, the ten toes of the image, and the ten horns of Rev. xvii., will be placed in their proper places to fill the prophetic mold, I have no doubt. Let us watch, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto us at the revelation of the righteous Judge. Let us bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ.

POETRY.

Trust.

I see but a step before,
As I tread the dark of the year;
But the past is still in God's keeping,
The future his mercy will clear;
And what seems dark in the distance
May brighten as I draw near.

So I pray no more anxiously;
I would not if I might;
I would rather walk with God in the dark
Than walk alone in the light;
I would rather walk with him by faith
Than walk alone by sight.

My heart shrinks back from trials
Which the future may disclose;
Yet I never had a sorrow
But what my dear Lord chose;
So I wend the coming years back
With the whispered words, "He knows."

The Ordinances.

BY I. B. SMITH.

THE is the law of God, that we keep his commandments. John xiv. 21; 1 John v. 3.

The principle of all such Scriptures lies in the fact that the ordinance or service commanded embodies the doctrine to be believed as the ailment of the new life—the life of God in the soul, the germ of immortality.

I. The sacrifice, the first ordinance, had reference to the violated law. The life of man had been forfeited by transgression. But mercy provides to establish law and maintain moral government while forgiving the penitent worshiper. The priest, the altar and the sacrifice, embodied the doctrine of both justice and mercy; "that God may be just when he also just when he justifies the believer in Jesus—the Lamb of God—the consummated sacrifice."

II. The ordinance of circumstances given to Abraham superadded the doctrine of separation from an idolatrous race, the worship of the only living and true God, and the genealogical line of descent to the promised Messiah.

III. The ordinance of nationality, and the national temple worship for Israel, embodied the doctrine of God's original and now ultimate purpose to restore and govern the world as a prolonged and perpetual paradise. "The kingdom shall come to Zion, the first dominion." He will then turn to the people a pure language, that they may all "call upon the name of the Lord to serve (worship) him with one covenant." Zeph. iii. 9; Micah iv. 1-8.
"There shall be one Lord, and his name one." "The shadow of good things to come" will then have become everlasting substance. Heb. ix.
23; x. 1; Rev. xxi. 1-5.

IV. But the law—the shadow—continued only till the seed, the promised Christ should come, and put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Heb. ix.
26. Hence the ordinances of gospel grace conform to this advanced unfolding and fulfillment of revealed truth.
In baptism we are buried in the likeness of his death, and in hope of sharing in the resurrection or translation at his second coming. In the Lord's supper we show his death till he come (Romans vi. 3-6; 1 Cor. xi. 26; Col.
ii. 12; iii. 1-4,) for deliverance, salvation, redemption, in the everlasting kingdom. Psa. lxxii.

V. The ordinance of Gospel ministry, and its gracious groupings of power to gather out from the Gentiles a people for his name, is designed for Gentile and Jew, for man as man.
"Jesus received sinners and ate with them." Luke xv. 1-2. Saint Paul became, in sympathy and Christian wisdom, "all things to all men, that he might by all means save some." 1 Cor.
ix. 20-27. Neither Jesus nor Saint Paul shut off one spark of Pharisaism in all their heavenly ministries. It was Peter—poor, erring Peter—who denied his Master, and indulged in the Pharisaic presumption of barring the way to life; but through his signal sin and infirmity of character, the entire church has been taught his contrariety so far to Christ and his cause. Gal. ii.
11-16; Acts x. 28; xv. 7-11; Col. iii.
11; Rom. x. 12; Mark xvi. 15.

VI. The glory of God as it beamed from the face of Jesus Christ, when he was arrayed as king in the light of the coming kingdom, was transcendently beyond the brightness of the sun when God first commanded the light to shine out of darkness. 2 Cor. iv.
6-18; Matthew xvii; Rev. i. This glory of the Lord is but the combined beauties of all moral excellences. It is the grouping of mercy and truth, righteousness and peace, goodness and grace. It makes him the chief among ten thousand and altogether one lovely. The message of Gospel ministry is to set forth this surpassing loveliness of Jesus, and to woo and win men to its godlike embrace, by faith and the obedience of faith. Thus the Spirit and the bride say come, and whosoever will, let him come.

VII. But one says, as if Peter-wise, and to justify his exclusiveness, "The law was very stringent—none could eat the passover except the circumcised." "Yes," the wisdom of God replies, "have ye not read what David did" in eating of the shewbread against the letter but in the spirit of the law? Matthew xii. 3-12. Have ye not read how a multitude, not sanctified, yet did eat the passover otherwise than it was written? Please read now the heart of such was prepared to seek God, though not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary. How far such prayer was offered, and God hearkened and healed the people. The prayer was so grateful to God that it came up to the habitation of his holiness, even into Heaven. 2 Chronicles xxx. 2, 18, 27.

Again, have ye not read how Jesus vindicated his disciples for violating the letter of the Sabbatic law, and how much a man is better than a sheep; and how it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days, and to live in the spirit, having no confidence in the flesh?

In conclusion, it is needful for us to know that "the letter killeth." It always did kill, because in many things
(even saint Paul and) we offend all.
Nay, as many as ate of the works of the law are under the curse, because they all come short of a perfect obedience. Gal. iii. 10-13.

The appeal to the law, ignoring its loving spirit, is always in the letter that kills. 2 Cor. iii. 5-18.

Again, No one ever kept the law except Jesus, "who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth." He alone magnified the law, and made it altogether honorable. Yet he ex-pounds and applies the benevolent aim and end of the law, as above noted.
Hence we only need to be more Christian, and to follow St. Paul as he followed Christ in order to have our hearts enlarged; and be better able to urge men to be reconciled to God. The only urgency was one of welcome to the feast. The highways were traversed, the bad and the good were welcomed. Amen. It was reserved for the King to judge his guests.
Matt. xiii. 30; xxii. 1-14.

which conference was to convene and be conducted "in the spirit of Christ in which it will be safe immediately to meet him at the judgment seat," in view of which, if the spirit of Adventism of the present is the same as that of 1845, the writer at least fails to see it. Certainly it is not in harmony with the teachings of Christ himself as recorded in Mark ix. 38, "And John answered him, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not us; and we forbade him because he followeth not us. But Jesus said: Forbid him not for there is no man that can do a miracle in my name that can lightly speak evil of me." Nor we think that it is not an uncharitable judgment to conclude that the spirit of John predominates largely throughout the entire ranks of Adventism.

"Sitting in Judgment," constitutes the theme of a well-written article in a late number of the Crisis which in the abstract is very good. Not so much however, can be said of its spirit, in as much as its animus is to justify the spirit of John which has, of late, become so conspicuous among them.

On our own part we are willing, and we expect to be judged; not by the opinions of Adventists, but by the truth. Even the words of the Lord.

Education—What is It?

I answer it is: First, know thyself; Second, know thy Creator.

Socrates says that education is a drawing out process; giving shape; training properly what is in you from birth.

Know thyself. This consists in taking (what the doctors call) a diagnosis of yourself, by finding out through the instrumentality of parents, teachers, and circumstances on the stage of action, and by this drawing out process, finding out what there is in you from the beginning, so as to know what part of the play on the stage of action you will be the most successful in, so as to be of the most use to yourself and the world in general.

A Stettin newspaper announces that the Russian government has ordered there forty-two small torpedo boats of a velocity of nineteen knots an hour, to be delivered at St. Petersburg on the 15th of April. The price is to be over $1,000,000, the half of which is to be paid beforehand.

The chairman of the London school board said lately that he believed that the working classes were unopposed to religion, for in London, out of 100,000 children, not fifty had been withdrawn from religious instruction in schools, while 18,000 voluntarily went into examination on religious knowledge.

The last person decorated by the late king of Italy, was Dr. David Toscano, an eminent Jewish physician of Rome, who received the Order of the Crown of Italy. In the time of the papal power in Rome, Dr. Toscano could only obtain his degree on taking an oath that he would never visit Christian patients.

The body will be entombed at Dayton until next June, and then will be buried with ceremonies peculiar to the tribe.

A gigantic compendium of Chinese literature, comprising nearly 6,000 volumes, has been purchased by the English Chinese Secretary of Legation at Pekin, Mr. Mayers, on behalf of the authority of the British Museum. This extraordinary compilation was prepared under the auspices of the Emperor Kang Hi, and was printed with a font of movable type cast for the purpose, under the direction of the Jesuit missionaries, the work being finally issued in A. D. 1726-1726, in the ensuing reign. This vast storehouse of information, arranged in upward of 6,000 heads, under thirty-two sections, which again are grouped in six grand categories, will now for the first time be made accessible to scholars. The general index to the collection fills twenty Chinese volumes, apart from the more minute indexes pertaining to each of the sub-divisions of the work.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began. It advocates no measure to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal exaltation as joint heirs with him in the resurrection of the nations; the annihilation of Death by the literal resurrection of the dead; the final purification of the Sanctuary, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a liberty belief of the Gospel requirements, and hinders no person from adhering to the forms of sects, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Great Crisis.

J. P. WESTBEE.

"VICTOR EMMANUEL, FIRST KING OF ITALY."

The stone, to be placed in the chapel destined for the king, is a simple slab, bearing only the above words. It stands between the high altar and the altar of Saint Anastasius, martyr, on the right as the Pantheon is entered.

Over the gateway of the Pantheon is the following inscription: "Italy, with a mother's pride, with a daughter's grief, supplicates for the great king, who was a faithful citizen and a triumphant soldier, the immortality of the righteous and the heroic."

The student of prophecy turns his eye, with intense interest to the nations, as they, step by step, occupy the positions noted in the ancient revelations.

The recent events at Rome are so emphatic and so true to the Divine chart, that you will allow us to express ourselves in the language of Christ,—"In this was fulfilled, etc."

A few weeks since, you published the last of our lengthy articles on the "Session of the Ancient of Days," or "God's Judgment (Daniel vii.) on the Little Horn."

The horn (eleventh), we stated, so far as it was like the ten horns, was a symbol of civil papal rulers; and that its "eyes" and "mouth" symbolized ecclesiastical rulers, called the "Papal Hierarchy." We took the position, that, some little time before A. D. 1798, God sat in judgment on that power; that he rendered his decision in favor of the saints, against that power; that its dominion (civil) was taken away, and that, during this century, the civil power (horn) has been gradually wasting, and is about extinct.

Allow me to present to your readers a summary of its prophetic, and fulfilled history. By so doing, we shall be able to determine our latitude and longitude.

1. Prophecy—Little Horn—Its Rise.—"I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn." Dan. vii. 8. "And of the ten horns that (were) in his head, and (of) the other which came up." Verse 20.

History.—The Roman empire had established on its territory, from A. D. 427, to A. D. 477, ten kingdoms: (a) The Vandals, in Africa; (b) The Suevi, in Spain; (c) The Alans, in Spain; (d) The Burgundians, in Gaul; (e) The Franks, in Gaul; (f) The Visigoths, first in France, then in Spain; (g) The Saxons, in Britain; (h) The Ostrogoths, in Illyria and Pannonia; (i) The Lombards, in north-eastern Italy; (j) The Heruli, in Italy. These ten kingdoms, with their localities, are named, that it may be clearly seen that the "little horn came up among them."

It is called a "little horn." This kingdom (central kingdom) sprang up from donations of farms, and not by the force of its own arms. Under the Caloving[illegible] dynasty, the dominion of cities and provinces was added. The donation of the "Exarchate of Ravenna" was the first fruits under the conquests of Pepin. In this grant were included Ravenna, Bologna, and Ferrara. This was paid by Pepin for the remission of his sins and the salvation of his soul. These, with the Duchy of Spoleto, completed the ecclesiastical states, or the central kingdom (little horn).

"That donation, or mysterious circle, was enlarged to an infinite extent, oftentimes by the verbal or written donation of Charlemagne. The sovereignty of the exarchate melted (was humbled") like lead away in the hands of the popes." Under this body of civil rulers the fifth horn attained to its full power, being aided by the influence of its eyes and mouth (ecclesiastical authority).

2. Prophecy.—"Another shall rise after them." Verse 24.

History.—The ten horns (kingdoms) came up on the imperial head of the fourth beast, between A. D. 427 and 477; the little horn did not come to the surface of the head till A. D. 508 to A. D. 511. It was, therefore, the younger horn—the "pet."

3. Prophecy.—"And he shall be diverse from the first" (ten).

History.—The ten horns were so similar that they formed one group or family. These ten kingdoms were organized out of the savage tribes which had, from time to time, invaded the Roman empire, and finally conquered it. On its territory they erected ten kingdoms.

We might denominate them the "clay" kingdoms, since they mingled with the Romans, but were as diverse from them as clay is diverse from iron. The little horn had in it a large admixture of iron. The papal kingdom had in it much of the old Roman element. In consequence of its eyes and mouth, (ecclesiastical materials) there were combined in its substance great strength and vitality. Its eyes and mouth constituted a very marked peculiarity.

4. Prophecy.—"In this horn (were) eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth."

History.—All the ten kingdoms had heads, or bodies of civil rulers. They exercised a general supervision over their own subjects and territory. They had, therefore, as all kingdoms, legislative, judicial, and executive authority, symbolized by eyes and mouth. This kingdom had two sets of officers, civil and ecclesiastical. Its hierarchy, or priesthood is symbolized by the eyes and mouth. The eyes were like the eyes of a man, since one man (the pope) acted for all. That power is called the "Roman see." It oversees the world.

5. Prophecy.—"Whose look (was) more stout than his fellows."

History.—The meaning of stout in the old English, was bold; then, its meaning would be, he was more bold than his fellows. So it appears in the original. He feared no king, nor did he blush to usurp the throne of the Deity, that he might have power to trample on the rights of his fellows. He recognized no nation as his peer.

6. Prophecy.—"A mouth that speaks very great things." Verse 20. "Speaking great things." Verse 8. "He shall speak (great) words against the Most High." Verse 25; see verse 11.

History.—Pope Innocent III. said: "Christ has set one man over the world; him whom he appointed his vicar on earth, and as unto Christ, so unto him shall every knee bow, in heaven, in earth, and under the earth." A very bold speech for one man to make against all other men and nations.

Pope Gregory VII.: "In him (the Roman pontiff) alone is the right of making laws. Let all kings kiss his feet. His name alone should be heard in the churches. It is the only name in the world. It is his right to depose kings. His sentence is not to be repealed by any one but by himself alone. He is to be judged by none."

Read the following words used by the mouth of this little horn: "Countenance of thy Divine majesty." "Another God on earth." "Our Lord God the pope." "The pope doth whatsoever he listeth; even things unlawful; and is more than God."

7. Prophecy.—"Before whom were three of the first horns plucked up by the root (Heb., humbled).

History.—"Under this body of rulers, the kingdoms of the Heruli under Odoacer, the Ostrogoths under the Theodoric, and the Lombards established under Alboin, were humbled. The pope wears a triple crown. He has also three keys to represent triple kingdoms.

8. Prophecy.—"The same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them until the Ancient of Days came, and rendered judgment in favor of the saints of the Most High." Verses 21, 22. "He shall wear out the saints." Verse 25.

History.—Dr. Scott, remarks: "No computation can reach the numbers who have been put to death, in different ways, on account of their maintaining the profession of the gospel, and opposing the corruptions of the church of Rome. A million of poor Waldenses perished in France. Nine hundred thousand orthodox Christians were slain in less than thirty years of the institution of the order of Jesuits. The Duke of Alva boasted of having put thirty-six thousand to death by the hands of the common executioner, during the space of a few years. These are a few specimens, and but few of those which history has recorded. But the total amount will never be known, till the earth shall disclose her blood, and no more cover her dead." Dr. John Owen says: "What, I pray you, has been their main business, for seven hundred years and upwards, even almost ever since the Man of Sin has been enthroned?"

The massacre, that commenced on the eve of St. Bartholomew's day in Paris, did not cease till sixty thousand Protestants were slain in France. When the news of this event reached Rome, Pope Gregory XIII. instituted the most solemn rejoicing, giving thanks to Almighty God for this glorious victory over the heretics.

"One hundred and fifty thousand perished in the Inquisition; and one hundred and fifty thousand by the Irish massacre; besides the vast multitudes, who were proscribed, banished, starved, burnt, buried alive, smothered, drowned, assassinated, chained to the galleys for life, or immured within the horrid walls of the bastile, or others of their church or state prisons." "Drunken with the blood of saints." Thus have they [illegible] out the saints.

9. Prophecy.—"And think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand, until a time and times, and the dividing of time." Verse 25.

History.—Gregory VII., in his epistle, says: "The Roman pontiff, by right, is universal. In him alone is the right of making laws."

Mr. Keith says: "He (the Roman pontiff) assumed a prerogative, and exercised a power, such as no race of kings ever claimed; and exalted himself above all, maintained an unparalleled ascendency, and prospered during a period which scarcely any dynasty on earth ever equaled."

Gregory VII. thundered out a terrible excommunication against the emperor of Germany, Henry IV., in which he anathematized him and all his adherents, declared him to have forfeited the kingdom of Germany and Italy, together with all regal dignity; forbade all Christians to obey him; bestowed the kingdom of Germany on Rudulphus, elected by the princes of Germany. King John of England, was forced to resign his crown into his hands, and to do homage to him, and to receive it as a gift from the Holy See; and the pope's legate, who retained possession of it five days, trampled under his feet the money which, in token of his vassalage, was given him by the king. The Emperor Henry IV. was made to wait three days at the gates of the fortress of Canusium, bare-headed, and in his bare feet, with nothing but a coarse cloth over him, before Gregory VII. would grant him absolution.

At the command of another pope, the English Henry II. walked in his bare feet to do penance at the tomb of Becket.

Pope Celestin dashed with his foot the crown from the head of Henry VI.; and Pope Alexander trod on the neck of the Emperor Frederick I. The bull of the pope, in which the deposition of Queen Elizabeth was pronounced, is in these words: "Him alone hath God constituted Prince over all nations, and over all kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant."

10. Prophecy.—"They (ten horns) shall take away his dominion." Verse 26.

History.—The French horn was com-

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates, as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the destruction of Satan; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Thief on the Cross.

BY AUSTIN CURTIS.

And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise. Luke xxiii. 42, 43.

The above colloquy of Christ and the thief is frequently cited as proof that the soul is immortal, and that it enters upon its reward at death. Now, friends, let us reason together. Let us appeal to the law and to the testimony. Let us search the Scriptures; or, in other words, prove all things, and hold fast that which is good.

God has given us a revelation that is adapted to our reason, as sunlight is to the eye. The theories of men should be tested by the Word of God. Their statements, if they cannot stand the test in the crucible of truth, are unworthy of credence. Gold loses none of its lustre by friction. Truth loses none of its brilliancy by a comparison with error.

Let us now look at the colloquy of Christ and the thief, in a dispassionate manner, and see whether or not the language recorded coincides with the statements of modern theologians. The thief, who had previously, with the godless throng, reviled the suffering Son of God, being now convinced that he is the Christ, by the supernatural darkness and other phenomena, in humility and penitence confesses him as Lord. What a wonderful and sudden change we now behold in the man's conduct! It may now be said of him as it was subsequently of Paul, "Behold, he prayeth." He ceases to be an enemy and becomes a friend. He rebukes his companion in crime, and asserts Christ's innocence. Listen now to the prayer of the penitent thief, who has subjected himself to the taunts of the ribald throng: "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." The request of the thief is prima facie evidence that he did not expect to go with Christ to a kingdom at death. He asked to be remembered when Christ comes into his kingdom, recognizing the grand truth that the Nobleman (Christ) must first "go into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return." The one who offered this petition was the one who hung upon the cross, the one who addressed Christ as his Lord, the one who subsequently had his legs broken, the one who will yet be with Christ in paradise, or in other words the man and not an immaterial and immortal soul.

Now let us notice Christ's answer to the petition of the expiring penitent, who, having heard the prayer of Christ for his persecutors, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," no longer doubted that there was yet mercy in such a compassionate heart for even a dying malefactor. Christ immediately replied, "Amen," or "Verily," meaning "so let it be;" adding, "I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." The promise must be homogeneous with the request. The thief said, "Remember me, (evidently the same me that is hid in the grave until the resurrection, Job xiv. 13, 14,) when thou comest into thy kingdom." Christ replied that he should be with him in paradise. Hence, to be in the kingdom, is to be in paradise. Many honest souls believe that Christ meant the disembodied soul of the thief, by the personal pronoun thou. The idea of immaterial and immortal men is not recognized in the Scriptures. Such men exist only in the imagination. Search, my friend, in the earth or sea, or air; search through infinite space, though the boundless universe, for an immaterial man, and when you have found one, report at once.

Christ spoke to the man himself when he said "thou." He did not address a nonentity, but an organized being, a physical man. Christ used the pronoun thou in the same sense in which God used it in addressing Adam concerning the interdicted fruit —"In the day thou eatest thereof, dying thou shalt die." "And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

Look at the use of the term thou in the language addressed to Abraham: "And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age." Gen. xv. 15. Many persons think the statement "thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace," means that the disembodied soul of Abraham should go to paradise, to be with the disembodied souls of the fathers who dwelt on the other side of the flood. But this would be people's paradise with idolators, for we read concerning Terah and others, "They served other gods." Joshua xxiv. 2. But the same truth-speaking God that said "thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace," also said, "thou shalt be buried in a good old age." Think of an immortal soul becoming old! Think of an immaterial man being buried! Think of a disembodied soul being lowered into the grave to decompose!

Where was Abraham to be gathered to his fathers? If in heaven, then a part of heaven's inhabitants are idolators. If in hell, then righteous men, like Abraham, were far from being in paradise. But if Abraham was gathered to his fathers in the realm of death, the grave, then wicked men are not admitted into heaven, nor righteous men driven to hell. Job. iii. 11-19. Abraham, like Josiah, went to his grave in peace.

Pardon me, kind reader, for this digression. It is hard to follow a stream without noticing its tributaries. I have merely cited instances of the usage of the word thou, to show that the facts, commandments and promises of the Scriptures are delivered to men—not ghosts—Christ's reply to the thief's request being no exception. Christ promised the thief himself that he should be with him in paradise. Now, if paradise means heaven, the place where the fathers dwell, we have the authority of Christ himself for saying that he did not go there, on the day of the crucifixion. After Christ's resurrection, or three days after his conversation with the thief, he said unto Mary, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father." It was forty-three days after his crucifixion before he ascended into heaven. Here, then, is proof that the popular notion concerning Christ and the thief going to paradise, on the day they were crucified, is incorrect.

By consulting the Scriptures where the word paradise occurs, I think any candid person will come to the conclusion that paradise does not now exist. In Luke xxiii. 42, 43, where the word first occurs, we learn that to be in paradise is to be in the kingdom of God. Now by consulting Dan. ii. 44; vii. 13, 14, 18, 22, 27; Luke i. 31-33; xxii. 28-30; 2 Tim. ii. 12; iv. 1; James ii. 5; Rev. ii. 25-27; iii. 21; v. 9, 10; xi. 15; we learn that the kingdom of God is yet future, and that when it is set up it will be under the whole heaven. Christ will then execute judgment and justice in the earth. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. He will then be King over all the earth. Paradise will not exist until "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ," and "God's will be done in earth as it is in heaven." Rev. x. 15; Matt. vi. 10. Christ will then have his kingdom. The times of restitution will then be ushered in.

The second occurrence of the word paradise is in 2 Cor. xii. 4. Now by comparing the second verse with the fourth verse, we discover that paradise is connected with the third heaven. Now compare 2 Cor. xii. 2, with 2 Pet. iii. 5-13, and you will discover that paradise, or the third heaven, is indissolubly connected with the "new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." The new earth state is yet future; hence "we, according to his promise, (Isa. lxv. 17-25,) look for new heavens and a new earth." The curse will then be removed from the earth; death with be banished; sorrow and sighing shall flee away. Sinless and deathless beings will then "inherit the land, and dwell therein forever." The third and last occurrence of the word paradise is in Rev. ii. 7. "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." Now if we can discover where the tree of life will be located, we can also discover where paradise will be, for the tree of life will be in the midst of the paradise of God.

Turning to Rev. xxi. and xxii. we find that the tree of life is to be on the earth, when it is changed or made new. Hence paradise is connected with the new earth state; consequently it is yet future, and the penitent thief is not yet in paradise.

Punctuation is not inspiration. The original manuscripts were written without any pauses whatever. Punctuation was introduced by "Aldus Manutius, a learned printer who lived at Venice in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries." I will instance an example where the sense is changed by the use of the comma. "But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God." Heb. x. 12. In some Bibles the comma is placed after the word sins instead of forever, thus making the text teach that Christ had "forever sat down on the right hand of God," and consequently that he will never rise up again and return to our earth, to reckon with his servants. Luke xix. 11-27; Jno. xiv. 1-3, 18, 28; Acts i. 9-11; Col. iii. 3, 4; 1 Thess. i. 9, 10; ii. 19; iii. 13; iv. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 1, 2, 8; Titus ii. 11-13; Heb. ix. 28; James v. 8; 1 Peter v. 4; 1 John ii. 28; iii. 2, 3; Rev. i. 7; xxii. 12, 20. By placing the comma after forever, the passage then teaches that Christ is never to offer himself a sacrifice again. This I apprehend to be the true meaning of the text. Heb. ix. 24-26. 28; 1 Peter iii. 18. The present punctuation of Luke xxiii. 43, makes the adverb "to-day," qualify the verb "shall be," thus teaching that Christ and the thief went to paradise on the day of the crucifixion. This, however, cannot be true. It would not be in accordance with the request of the thief.

Paradise is yet in the future. Christ has not yet come into his kingdom. The righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, at the resurrection of the just, and not in heaven at death. Ps. xi. 31; Luke xiv. 14.

Rewards were not due at Christ's death, or at his departure, but they are due at his appearing and kingdom. 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8. Men must be judged before they are rewarded. Dead men must awake, before they can be rewarded for "the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward" while in the death state. Isa. xxvi. 19, 21; Job xiv. 1-15; xix. 25-27; Psa. xvii. 15.

Now any one can see that the present punctuation of Luke xxiii. 43, introduces discord into the word of God, where harmony should prevail. The present punctuation may suit heathen philosophy, but it does not agree with Bible theology. By placing the comma after "to-day," thus making "to-day qualify the verb "say," the passage then does not contradict other Scripture, but harmonizes with the entire Bible. Some may say that if the verse were thus punctuated, "to-day" would be rendered superfluous. No more so, however, than in Deut. xv. 15; xxx. 11, 16, and many other places. According to an anonymous writer, "The adverb semeron, rendered "to-day," occurs in the Septuagint Scriptures of the Old Testament, and in the Greek of the New Testament, two hundred and fifty-nine times. It is used adjectively twenty-four times, and without a verb to qualify fourteen times. It precedes the verb it qualifies fifty-one times, and one hundred and seventy times it follows the verb it qualifies; so that there are one hundred and seventy instances to fifty-one in favor of putting the comma after "to-day" in this case. From a very ancient manuscript of the Syriac, written, as supposed, about the fifth century, the following rendering occurs: "Verily I say to thee to-day that with me thou shalt be in the Eden's garden." Parker's old cottage Bible reads as follows: "Lord, remember me in the day of thy coming. Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto you, the same day thou shalt be with me in paradise."

Let candid objections be removed and honest criticism encouraged. Seek to know God's will and obey it, and you will, with the penitent thief, be remembered when Jesus comes into his kingdom. He said for our encouragement, "I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you." "I will come again." "I go away, and come again unto you." John xiv. 3, 18, 28. "Occupy till I come." Luke xix. 11-13. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand." Eccl. xi. 6. "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." Psa. cxxvi. 5. Have faith in God, and wait for his Son from heaven. Finally, "my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." 2 Cor. xv. 58.

The Three Ages; or the Angelic and Adamic Ages—Their Relation One to the Other, and of Each to the Eternal Plan.

BY H. BEADLE, M. D.

DURATION OF THE ANGELIC AGE.

Of this matter we only know that it is a limited period of time, a portion of which is called in Holy writ "the beginning." It is on the whole, a period of time for which we have no means of calculation. Of this however we may be sure, that it by far exceeds that of the Adamic, the length of which we shall in order show is precisely seven thousand years, the end of which period is coincident with the termination or execution of judgment upon the fallen and apostolic race, which involves an utter end of all things temporal, and the ushering in of the eternal day and order of things; when will be accomplished that which is written, "Behold I create all things new," at which time man, with his kind celestial, will join their voices in the new song of which the Psalmist gave intimation, which will be infinitely more glorious than that uttered at the morning of creation by the "Morning Stars" and the "Sons of God." Thus will mankind glorified join their voices in the singing of that new song, which will constitute the morning anthem of the perfect and eternal day.

The foregoing, we are aware, relates to the omega, and extends to that which lies far beyond nevertheless it constitutes a theme on which we have for many years, delighted to meditate, in view of which we may have been led to anticipate somewhat, certain important antedating points.

Hence we return to a further consideration of the Adamic age, the length of the same, as well as its relation to the Angelic age. To the former we stand at present directly related, and in which we are deeply interested; in view of which, we shall approach a further consideration of this subject, hoping to be able to make such presentation of Scriptural truth relating to it, as will enable our readers possibly to attain to a more harmonious as well as a better understanding of the unexpired portion of our age, a misunderstanding of which constitutes the foundation or groundwork of the major differences that obtain on the part of those professedly holding and teaching "present truth," so-called, which, strictly speaking, represents or embodies the true scriptural relation of our times to the near future. All such as love the truth and take it in righteousness will welcome any light on this subject from any source, however humble.

In the first place we remark that there are certain points on which we, or at least a large number of us, are agreed. Now it is proposed that, as many of us are like minded, set down strokes or dots, points, and there let them remain until we shall be able to see aright on Bro. as to pronounce our hermeneutic faith.

It is assumed on our part, that we believe that fire is to be the great and active agent in the consummation of the ultimate purposes of God both as regards sin and the apostate Angelic.

To do this circle is appointed a "burning day," which is treated of by Ezekiel, Malachi and Peter. Fire is to destroy the devil and all his works; which same is true as regards the flesh; dependent of sex race; in as much as the words of Christ are, "These all be cast into the fire prepared for the devil and his angels.

Hence there is to be but one agent and one event in order to the accomplishment of the two great purposes as above cited. The writer places himself entirely on this proposition, however others may believe.

Assuming that we are agreed as to the premises, it only remains for us to ascertain the time for the fulfillment of the coming events, in order to do which it is only necessary to determine the length of the Adamic age. This once settled and ascertained, will inevitably do away with a large portion of the theological speculation which obtains in relation to the subject.

It may be conceded that the events above noticed, are to be coincident, and not neither to occur anterior to the first appearance we have only to find the consummation of the Adamic age in order to have the end of both.

We may remark here that there are those, and in considerable number, who hold, believe and teach that the fiery consummation is to occur at the end of the six thousand years, with which view we purpose here to take radical issue.

Our first step in the solution of this problem will be a consideration of the great anti-typical week of creation which we may say is stated, universally accepted as typifying seven thousand years of the Adamic age—six of the typical days were devoted to labor, while the seventh was observed as a day of rest. Even so the six anti-typical days of one thousand years each are devoted to labor, and the sixth day's work is now almost done.

Now the question arises, are we to leave no anti-typical Sabbath, or millennial day of rest to our world?

Certainly to complete the lesson clearly inculcated by the type, there must remain a rest for this, the world, which has been in labor now almost six thousand years.

While we deem our point clearly made out, we are not obliged to rest our case here. The cutting off of flesh and blood will most certainly follow as a result of the "burning day," which result is typified by the ordinance of circumcision, which is nothing more or less than the cutting off of flesh and blood, which, according to law, was required to be done on the eighth day, which is the next day after the seventh; which goes to prove that God counts seven days to the anti-typical week; and furthermore, that flesh and blood will continue during the seventh day, else it could not be cut off on the eighth.

It would seem that we might even here agree that the seven anti-typical days represent seven thousand years to the Adamic age, of which over one thousand still remain.

From the foregoing we think it must satisfactorily appear that God's order relating to this matter, places the "burning day," which is to cut off all flesh and blood, destroy the devil, and constitute the inauguration of his own glorious kingdom, at the end of or after the seventh day. In further support of which we will adduce still other proof which we find in connection with the transfiguration, which is a miniature representation of the state or order of being which is to obtain after the cutting off of flesh and blood, which Christ denominated the "kingdom of God," even the same which Paul has told us that "flesh and blood cannot inherit."

Christ, on a certain occasion, was teaching his disciples concerning the "kingdom of God." Mark viii. 38, and Luke ix. 26. "For the Son of Man shall come (or appear) in the glory of his father with his holy angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works." Notice the time of the reward, which is not till he appears as the righteous judge in the glory of his father. Paul evidently understood this matter. Again, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me, &c., of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed when he cometh (appeareth) with the glory of the Father, and with the holy angels."

We remark again that it is a Scriptural and universally accepted fact that the natural man cannot behold the glory of God the Father and live; hence Christ cannot be thus revealed in such glory until after the cutting off of flesh and blood, on the eighth or perfect day, when man in the new creation, will be fully qualified to be made joint partaker of the divine nature, and the glory which shall be revealed.

For the purpose of more forcibly impressing this lesson on the minds of the disciples, God in Christ, instituted the vision of the holy mount, known as the transfiguration.

In connection with the foregoing teaching, he said unto his disciples, "Verily I say unto you, that there be some of them that stand here which shall not taste of death till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power."

It will be borne in mind that the question under present consideration relates to the time when, &c.

"And it came to pass after about an eight days after these sayings that he took Peter and James and John up into a high mountain apart and was transfigured before them; and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was as white as light," or, as another evangelist states, "His raiment became shining exceeding white as snow, as no fuller on earth can white them."

The record further states that Moses and Elias appeared with him in glory, and talked with him concerning the decease he should accomplish at Jerusalem. No one can question for a moment but that the foregoing was a miniature representation of the kingdom of God and its glory, concerning which he had been teaching his disciples; which, moreover, is the kingdom for which he taught his disciples to pray on this wise, "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name; Thy Kingdom come," &c. "For thine is the power and the glory," &c. This certainly is no form of prayer for the coming and kingdom of Christ, or the kingdom of heaven.

But to return. The particular point to which we invite the reader's attention is the fact that Christ, in order to perfect the lesson he would inculcate, suffered seven days to intervene between the promise to the disciples and its fulfillment, which must have been in accordance with a design, rather than a matter of coincidence. It is true that some of the evangelists say and after six days, which exclusive of the day on which the promise was given, would produce exactly the same result.

Thus we see that Christ's teachings on this subject correspond perfectly with what we claim to be the lesson of the great anti-typical week, and also of the ordinance of circumcision.

We have not, by any means exhausted all of the Scriptural proofs having direct relation to this subject.

Having, however, introduced three witnesses which the word of the Lord teaches are sufficient to establish the truth of any matter, we will therefore rest our case here, believing that if the foregoing is not enough to satisfy the mind of any intelligent and honest reader, more would not suffice.

We have not attempted a detailed consideration of the personal right of Christ upon earth; neither more have we undertaken to consider at length the glories of the Kingdom of God the Father. Nevertheless, divine truth "rightly divided" will shed a flood of light upon these subjects, and will make clearly manifest the nature of the glory pertaining to each.

To this end it will only be necessary to read the scriptures understandingly, therein will and duly consider God's order, as regards the entirety of his works and declared purposes.

THE RESTITUTION.

WILL try to give an article on Gehenna next week, and also answer inquiries relative to some words rendered grave and pit in the English from other Hebrew words than sheol.

The Nursery, for March, is at hand. It is designed for the youngest readers, and is exactly adapted to the requirements of this class of learners. Published by John L. Shorey, 36 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass. One dollar and sixty cents a year.

WE are just now reading a book entitled "A Miracle in Stone: or the Great Pyramid of Egypt," by Joseph A. Seiss, D. D. We scarcely ever read a work in which we were more intensely interested. Will give some extracts next week, with fuller notice of this production of the eminent author.

A NUMBER of communications on hand will appear as soon as we can find room. We have delayed writing on some promised themes to give all possible room to our numerous correspondents. Our Letter Drawer department has not been filled in some numbers. We hope to have the columns under our different headings occupied with appropriate matter shortly.

Babyland, for March, received. It is singularly calculated to gratify the curiosity and inquisitiveness of very early childhood. Kind mothers who value the mental and moral development the very little ones will find it better to send fifty cents for this monthly than to spend the amount in vile candies. Address D. Lathrop & Co., Boston, Mass.

THE condition of affairs in the East remains static ary for the time being. The news is that a peace treaty has been drawn up by the representatives of the two belligerent powers, and is ready for signatures. There is such a complication of interests involved in the Eastern question that a final settlement is far from assured as yet. For ourself, we should only look upon any probable peace, at the present time, as a prolonged armistice. It would be only like the sun breaking through rifted clouds soon to gather into a more fearful tempest than ever.

THE RESTITUTION supplement, as was noticed last week, is furnished by the writer, C. T. Russell, to the readers of our paper at his own expense both for the printing and mailing. For ourself, we dissent from some conclusions set forth in this supplement, but do not wish to prejudice our readers, as it is a present to them which has been quite an expense to the writer. We merely say, now in the language of the apostle, "prove all things; hold fast that which is good." We think that the coming Messiah is the same Jesus that died, was buried, rose from the dead, and subsequently ascended from Mount Olivet into heaven; and we also think that he will "change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." We look for more tangibility in the resurrection than our brother seems to expect. We also think that Christ in the first stage of the advent will only descend to the aerial regions where he will be met by his raptured saints, with whom he will afterward descend to earth. The "fair chance" part of the supplement will probably please some of our readers. We are mostly solicitous to save some of the passing dispensation.

"The Truth."

It would be well for Orthodox "ministers of the gospel" if they took heed to the "law and testimony" and cease to teach "for doctrines the commandments of men." If they possessed the child-like faith and spirit of meekness, which is the spirit of Christ, they would soon be free from the condemnation, "Ye are blind leaders of the blind." They style themselves "preachers of the gospel," and yet, proclaim not the "kingdom of God." They "believe in Jesus Christ," and yet teach not that he shall reign "in Jerusalem and before his ancients gloriously;" "and of his throne and kingdom there shall be no end." They acknowledge him "King of kings," and yet treat with scorn the "idea" of his sitting on David's throne; and this latter they do notwithstanding God has sworn with an oath to David "that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his (David's) throne." From men whose teaching is so contrary to the teaching of God it is impossible to learn. Therefore, if we would understand and believe the "gospel," (which belief is absolutely essential to salvation) we must search the Scriptures, for in them, and in them alone, we have eternal life. In the promise: "In thee and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

We have, according to Paul's testimony, "the gospel." Gal. iii. "The Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying: "In thee shall all nations be blest." How is Abraham a blessing? Paul answers: "Even as Abraham believed God and it was accounted unto him for righteousness; so they which be of faith (like faith) are blessed with faithful Abraham." "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen." What was Abraham's faith? His faith was in the promise of God, and he believed that whatsoever God had promised he was able to perform. And we have the assurance that this faith of Abraham was accounted unto him for righteousness.

Now, what was the promise of God? In Genesis we have the answer. "I will make of thee a great nation, I will give thee the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; and in thee and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Now, Paul declares that to Abraham and to his seed were the promises made. His saith not; "and to seeds as of many, but as of one: and to thy seed which is Christ." Therefore a person to be a partaker of Abraham's faith, must believe: that God will make of Abraham a great nation (the Jews); that he and his seed will possess the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; and that in him (through the justification of faith) and his seed (Christ) shall all nations be blessed. Christ is a blessing to the world as Savior, Priest, and King.

First, as Savior. "For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. A light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of thy people Israel." Jesus of Nazareth came as the Christ or Anointed King of Israel. And, therefore, the Savior of his people. Paul declares that "before faith came we (the Jews) were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterward be revealed." Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. "Thus Christ hath redeemed us (the Jews) from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Gal. iii.

Paul, after preaching the justification of faith, concludes with the words: "For ye are all the children of God through faith in Jesus Christ. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Now pay strict attention, for in the words that follow, we have the reason for the putting on and believing in Christ. "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." Jesus came as a Savior to Israel, teaching that by faith in him as the covenanted Christ and by putting on his name, they were justified by faith, being freed from the curse of the law he (Christ) being made a curse for them, and as the promise to Abraham was through faith, so they by faith in the seed are accounted the children of God and heirs with Abraham to the promised land. But we being wholly mortal and partaking of the nature of mortal men, must necessarily be made immortal to become inheritors forever of the land of promise.

Again we look to the blessed Savior. Paul testifies: "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." But how? He hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. He hath brought life to light, "Being the first fruits of them that slept." He hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel, i. e., glad tidings of the kingdom of God in the name of Jesus the Christ. Now, of this kingdom of God through which we have immortality, I shall speak presently.

The grand testimony that embraces all the teaching of Christ and constitutes him a blessing in the character of Savior, is found in the words: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believed in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Second, as High Priest. Seeing that we have a great High Priest, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. "For he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham, wherefore it behooved him to be made like his brethren in all things, that he might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God to make reconciliation for the sins of the people." Thus, in infinite wisdom and mercy, Christ took upon Himself the seed of Abraham, that being born of a woman and partaking of the infirmities of the flesh, he is able to succor those who are tempted being tempted "in all points like as we are yet without sin." Having assurance then that we have a High Priest who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, let us come boldly to the throne of grace for strength to help in time of need. O glorious truth, that enables us to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth," in that we know Christ the just and merciful High Priest maketh intercession for the sins of the people; "and if any man err, we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ.

Third, as King. In Jesus the Christ as King, we have the fulfillment of all the promises of God and "the restitution of all things." The Orthodox world admit and teach that Christ will be "King of kings," and that he will rule over all; but as to the seat of his kingdom they are ignorant and blinded. The word of God contains no testimony of a mystical kingdom beyond the skies. Nor does it teach an immediate translation on angel wings to that heavenly realm, but the "law and the testimony" declare of Christ that he shall reign in Jerusalem and on the throne of David. "And of his kingdom there shall be no end." God declared unto David: "When thy days are fulfilled and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, and I will establish his kingdom." These words at first, may seem to refer to Solomon, but further on we read, "I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever." In accordance with this promise, hear David's last words: "The Rock of Israel spake to me; he that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of the Lord; and he shall be as the morning, even a morning without clouds. Therefore God hath made with me an everlasting covenant ordered in all things and sure; for this is all my salvation and all my desire."

Can there be any doubt as to the seed who will be established on David's throne? O men, perverted and blinded by the dust and rubbish of Orthodoxy; O ye who having ears hear not, and having eyes see not the things that so nearly concern your salvation; listen to the testimony of Peter. "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day; therefore being a prophet and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him that of the fruit of his loins according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his (David's) throne." "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made that same Jesus whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ." Do you doubt still? Then be convinced by the words of an angel: "Behold thou shalt bring forth a son and shalt call his name Jesus, and the Lord God will give unto him the throne of his father David. He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his throne and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke ii. Thus does the word of God in terms beyond all doubt or contradiction speak of Jesus the Anointed, and if men would only come to the living word, the fountain of truth, and drink of its waters, their souls would be refreshed and their minds made pure.

I have shown that it is God's purpose to establish a kingdom based on the covenants of promise to Abraham and David, and that the land of Canaan with Jerusalem, will be the territory and seat of the kingdom with Christ as King, and that the consummation of these things will be the fulfillment of the promise. "In thee, Abraham, and in thy seed, (Christ) shall all the nations of the earth be blest." Therefore the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ is the same gospel as that preached to Abraham in the words: "In thee shall all nations be blest." Now, Jesus hath brought life and immortality to light through this gospel. But how? By a resurrection from the dead being the first fruits of them that slept, and by a belief in the things of the kingdom, and by putting on by immersion the name of Christ, we are justified by our faith and made his brethren, and if by continued well doing, we show ourselves worthy of his name, we become like him conquerors of death and mortality and are raised to life eternal. Thus the wages of sin is death but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ the Lord. This belief of the "gospel of the kingdom" destroys at once the dogma of paganism, an immortal soul. A believer of the kingdom finds no place for immortal souls, and looks not for immortality save in the coming of Christ and resurrection from the dead.

These things constitute the truth of the word of God, and a person to be accepted of God must be a follower of truth. If we come boldly, and in defiance of the hate of the world, and investigate these things, proving them all and only holding fast to the good, how clearly will the light of the "law and testimony" shine through the mysteries of the apostasy. Believe the "gospel of the kingdom" for "it is the power of God unto salvation." "He that believeth (the gospel) and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not, shall be damned."

Inherent Immortality.

In a late international Sunday school lesson I saw a comment on the words "fell asleep and was gathered to his fathers," in which it was stated that this sentence did not prove that the soul is not immortal, and also that believers in ancient Jewish times knew that the soul (?) or person was immortal.

Here, then, we have a distinct issue. Not content with affirming the immortality of that ambiguous and indefinite term, the soul or spirit, the writer claims it for the person, which I take to be the individual entity, the real, responsible being or man. I wish to show in this article, the consequences that must ensue from this assumption. I will first lay down a primary rule; as follows:

Whatever the individual entity may be assumed to be, to it belong the name and personal pronouns.

Those who claim that the person or man is immortal, must accept this axiom, otherwise immortality involves a loss of individuality. Now let us take an example or two illustrating the principle at issue. We read: "Samuel died and was buried." "Oh, but," say the respondents, "death is a separation from the body." Well, let us see how much that quibble will help them. Read: "Samuel was separated from his body, and was buried." We still have the name Samuel in the grave, to the exclusion of the discarded body. There is no escaping this dilemma. Again, in Acts ii. 29, it is affirmed of the patriarch, prophet and name David, "that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us until this day." Here, then, the person, David, has either lost his name and individuality, if the person is an immortal soul, or else he fell asleep, ceased to live, was buried, saw corruption, and returned to dust, and instead of being with Christ in the spirit world, he is in the tomb at this time. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." And this brings us to a new phase of the question.

It is affirmed of the believer, by the Lord Jesus Christ, "I will raise him up at the last day." The personal pronoun him stands for the man or individuality, and if Christ meant what he said, the person is in the grave and requires raising, instead of being alive. And with Christ Paul says, "the dead in Christ rise first," and "we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed;" which the theologists of the day would alter to read, "Those who are alive, and with Christ, must be united to their bodies, first," and "we shall not all be awake, but we shall remain as we are," etc. In short, for "life," read "death," and for "death" read "life," and for "meet the Lord in the air" read "come with him from the skies."

Do not the advocates of this unphilosophical and unscriptural doctrine see that although they may people an imaginary sphere, with unimaginable inhabitants, between death and the resurrection, yet they must with the Bible pierce the depths of the grave and the sea, in order to raise the dead or sleeping names in Christ, or else deny a literal resurrection altogether? They must inevitably change their personality, or else finally have two persons for one name; for while they claim one in the intermediate state the Savior has pledged his faith to bring up one from the grave at his coming. And let them remember that the Bible reads, "this mortal must put on immortality," while they say, "this immortal must put on (?) immortality." What an absurd and contradictory theory!

Again, we read in Genesis that the man who was made of dust "became a living soul," animal, or person, while Paul tells us that the first man was made a living soul. From this language it is presumed that he was an immortal being. But Paul also tells us that "the first man was of the earth, earthy" Now, either it must be admitted that the person is the corruptible, bodily man, or else that an immortal spirit or soul is of the earth, earthy, and consequently mundane and corruptible.

Job's hope, and fitting epitaph, was, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait until my change come, and if I wait, I have made the grave my house." There are more modern epitaphs to be seen in old churchyards in England, resurgam, "I shall rise again," and requiescat in pace, "resting in peace;" and it is tradition, and not a more intelligent understanding of the Scriptures that has changed them into, "Gone to a home in glory," and "Gone to be with Christ in heaven." If theologians will accept the Bible view of man, as a mortal being, with a possibility of his becoming immortal upon compliance with certain conditions, by a resurrection from the dead, through Jesus Christ our Lord, then they would not need a hell of everlasting fire in which to eternally burn—what? immortal sinners!

SELECTIONS.

Hoped-For Conquests in Asia Minor.

The Turk's possessions east of the Bosphorus include the scenes of many momentous events. If the Russian at last succeeds in conquering them, he will have won what the Crusaders failed to do after an effort which lasted two centuries. The Christians will rule in the Holy Land. With such a conquest, not only Bethlehem and Damascus, Mount Sinai and the banks of the Jordan, but Jerusalem itself, will be crowned by the banners of the Cross. Mount Ararat, too, would fall into Muscovite hands.

But the historical value of their conquests would not be confined to the sacred spot once familiar with the footsteps, voice and deeds of Christ. Much nearer Constantinople, their battalions would find themselves, perhaps camping on, at least treading, the classic soil of the Troad. Besika Bay, whither the British fleet was lately sent from Greece, is the very inlet, we are assured, where the much fewer barks of Agamemnon, King of Argos, and Menelaus, his brother-in-law, put in, farighted with the doughty Greeks, who were destined to besiege Priam's city. The Russians may find it romantic to bivouac within the excavations of Dr. Schliemann.

In another direction his acquisitions would be scarcely less interesting to the respecter of historical remains. In the long and lovely valley of the Euphrates—that valley by which, we may fairly infer, the Russian hopes one day to penetrate to the Persian Gulf, and thus find at once a point d' appui whence, sooner or later, to attack India, and an outlet for that Oriental commerce which he hopes to monopolize—in that valley are ruins as suggestive of mighty traditions, of titanic warriors, of colossal power and arrogant wealth, as any that still remain to attest the towering pride of man. The still stately ruins of Nineveh would become his, and the still not wholly revealed remains of haughty Babylon.

Another famed city of old, now sunk in sloth and decay, would become a portion of his victory. To all who have read "The Arabian Knights," the name of Bagdad will always fall pleasantly and romantically upon the ear. As the city of the good Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, it is dear to the millions who have greedily devoured those marvelous tales. Bagdad, too, would become Russian. The birthplace of Homer, as well as the memorable scene of his Iliad, would pass from the Moslem to the Christian; and Aleppo, and other once great and thriving seaports of the eastern Mediterranean, together with Cyprus, that realm of romance and beauty, would change hands.

To the antiquary and archæologist this transfer of the dominion of the teeming east would be welcome. It is probable that under Russian rule obstacles would no longer be put in the way of those researches and excavations which will some day bring to light many marvels of those departed empires, and make us more familiar with the men of old. We should probably see the walls of Jerusalem wholly revealed; the secrets beneath the soil of Babylon would become open facts; and in many places now held as a sealed book by Turkish jealousy and dog-in-the-manger obstinacy, revelations would result from the indefatigable toils of new Schliemanns and Cesnolas illuminating periods intensely interesting to modern Christendom, as being periods during which the faith of the Christian was founded and nourished. Thus the present war may bring its contribution to learning, gained, however, at a terrible and cruel cost.—Appleton's Journal.

Egypt's Obelisks.

Egypt is rich in obelisks. Among the ruins of San—the Zoan of the Hebrews—in the Delta, lie no less than ten, all overthrown and some shattered. At Heliopolis, an obelisk sixty-eight feet high, which was four centuries old when Moses was born, still stands erect. In the temple of Luxor there is one of seventy-five feet in height, the mate of that in Paris. Karnak possesses four, two of which are ninety-two feet high, and in the granite quarries at Assouan lies a monolith of ninety-five feet, which appears to have been left there on account of a flaw in the stone. All these keep their original places, and the ruins of the ages recorded in their inscriptions lie around them. The one which is destined for New York, has a height of seventy-one feet, with a base of seventy feet seven inches square. Its material is the rosegray granite of Assouan, the ancient Syenne.—*N. Y. EASTERN ITEMS.

The peace conditions contained a stipulation that the six principal Turkish iron clads should be ceded to Russia on the ground that otherwise the Porte might sell them to England. The Sultan objected to this stipulation. He stated he would prefer to destroy the vessels, and promised not to transfer them to any foreign powers. The incident terminated by the Sultan undertaking not to sell the iron clads to England, in consideration of which Russia withdrew her demand for their immediate cession.

A correspondent at Vienna states that the intention to immediately mobilize a portion of the army has been abandoned, but the Austro-Hungarian delegation will be asked to vote 80,000,000 florins, in order that the government may have the means in readiness in case a mobilization should become necessary.

A telegram from Athens reports that the Turks occupied Platonos this morning, and burned a portion of the town. The insurgents, receiving reinforcements, recaptured the place at noon.

BELGRADE, February 22.—The Roumanian forces, having left Bulgaria, the Russians have requested a Servian division to occupy Widin and Belgradchik.

LONDON, February 23.—5 a. m.—A special dated Constantinople, Wednesday, reports that the Czar has telegraphed that the Russians will occupy Constantinople if the Turks continue to delay signing the terms of peace, which include the cession of Armenia and the surrender of the Turkish fleet. Many Turkish deputies have been arrested and sent into exile.

The Agence Russe says: "Nemyk Pasha will not come to St. Petersburgh. Such a mission as was intrusted to him could serve no purpose, as the Grand Duke Nicholas is invested with full powers to treat with Turkey. The journey of Nemyk Pasha would only increase delay in the negotiations for peace. Turkey is wrong to persevere in this course."

ST. PETERSBURG, February 23.—The Golos says of the protracted peace negotiations: "Either the British squadron should withdraw to Besika Bay, or the Porte should receive the proof that it reckons in vain upon the presence of the British iron-clads in the Sea of Marmora. Turkey should be informed that if peace is not signed at the earliest practicable date, hostilities will be resumed."

A Pera dispatch says Russia demands that peace shall be concluded before the 2d of March, and that the Mussulmans shall quit Bulgaria within a year, with the right to sell their property.

CONSTANTINOPLE, February 24.—The Grand Duke Nicholas, accompanied by a detachment of troops and the Turkish plenipotentiaries, has arrived at St. Stefano. Raouf and Mehemet Ali Pashas have gone to welcome him.

The number of Russians who accompany the Grand Duke Nicholas to St. Stefano is estimated at ten thousand. It may be taken for granted that this is only a step in the settled plan for entering Constantinople.

The Turks assert that the Russians will bring only about fifteen hundred men to St. Stefano, but ten thousand is the more probable number.

Admiral Commerell, commanding the division of the British fleet remaining at Gallipoli, has placed ships on both sides of the promontory, so that their guns can sweep it from shore to shore, and boats patrol nightly to prevent laying torpedoes.

Prof. Diman, of Brown University, gives his opinion on the hell question as follows: "I affirm that there is no warrant whatever for erecting the bold, literal dogma of everlasting punishment into an article of the Christian faith; that a grievous wrong is done when any who shrink from accepting it are excluded from the communion of Christian people, and that the religious body which insists on this as an essential test will inevitably bar from its ministry many of the most faithful and the most conscientious of the present generation. Those who affirm it affirm what Jesus himself made no part of his direct and explicit teaching, and where he was silent we well may pause."

Business Notice.

Brother Chaplin:—We notice that Brother J. W. Becker, formerly of Dixon, Ills., has located in Chicago, and opened the commission business at 108 and 110 South Water Street. Having known Brother Becker for many years, we take pleasure in commending him to our brethren as in all respects worthy of their esteem and patronage. Anything consigned to him will receive prompt attention.

POETRY.

Sometime.

I am waiting for the shadows round me flying
To drift away;
I am waiting for the sunlight, always flying,
To come and stay;
I know there's light beyond the cloudy curtain,
A light sublime!
That it will shine on me I know is certain,
Sometime! sometime!

I am waiting for the summer's golden flower,
Now 'neath the snow;
When golden fruits around my life shall cluster,
I'm sure they grow.
We read of [illegible] flowers in fabled story,
In [illegible] clime,
And I shall [illegible] in their pristine glory,
Sometime! sometime!

Then I shall hear the voice of loved ones call me,
To their dear side;
And I shall clasp, whatever may befall me,
Hands unfettered;
For on my ear sweet notes of love shall tremble
In [illegible] rhyme,
From heart-strings that never can dissemble,
Sometime! sometime!

I am waiting; but at times I grow so weary—
Patience the way
When all the joys which makes our lives so dreary
Shall pass away.
I know the heart, of God with tones of sadness
Like [illegible] chime,
Shall echo back with tones of love and gladness
Sometime! sometime!

"Conditional Prophecy."

WILLIAM SHEPHERD.

As much is said upon this subject of late, and as many of our advent friends hold to this theory, I wish to express my opinion respecting the matter, and shall attempt to do so in the light of love and interest of the cause of divine truth. It is my desire in proceeding to be guided both by the spirit of truth and the words of truth.

"Conditional prophecy," of course we all know, is a phrase not found in the Bible, and one used to express the idea that the prophecies and promises contained in the scriptures are conditional, or contingent; that is, that their accomplishment depends upon certain conditions that man must comply with; or, in other words, that man must meet God half-way else God will not fulfill those promises; and this, according to the advocates of this theory holds good respecting nations and kingdoms as well as single individuals; especially will this principle be carried out toward the Jewish nation. So say our friends, as this subject is never discussed. But when the matter of "the return of the Jews" is brought up to notice there appears to be no more effectual way (in the minds of our brethren) to dispose of this question of the return of the wandering Jews to the land of their fathers and their gods, than this, that this return is conditional. Now in regard to conditional prophecy, I freely admit that in an individual point of view the promises of God are conditional, though not so with the great leading prophecies of the Bible, though promises are involved in these predictions to a great extent, but they, as with the predictions, possess a national aspect. I am disposed to make a marked distinction between an individual and a national aspect, and this point seems to have been lost sight of by the brethren who differ with us in their investigations and discussions upon this subject. They have made no distinction between that class of promises which are made to individual Jews and those promises and prophecies which are made to the Jews in a national capacity, and even admitting, for the sake of argument that there are prophecies relative to the Jews as a nation that bear a contingent aspect, that is, which will never be accomplished unless on certain conditions; yet we must remember that there are prophecies which are uttered by God's holy seers, and predictions which are declared in the most solemn manner represented as having been given by God himself through the hallowed mouth of his prophet, which are most positive and absolute in their nature—prophecies that have not the slightest coloring of an if; not the remotest intimation of a condition as to whether they will, or will not be consummated; prophecies that are dependent upon no human contingencies as to their accomplishment, but will most certainly be brought about when the time has come, as the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. It should be remembered that there are predictions that God has most solemnly sworn by himself must come to pass. Shall we presume to say that the will of man may interfere here in the face of these solemn asseverations of the great God of integrity and truth and say: prevent the accomplishment of his word?

Let us look for a moment at the character of some of those prophecies which have no ifs or ands affixed to them. When "Jacob called unto his sons" to inform them what should befall their descendants in the last days he did not say what perhaps might befall them or what likely should take place if they should do thus and so, but he said I will "tell you that which shall befall you in the last days." Gen. xlix. Here he goes on to recount the remote and ultimate destiny of the numerous posterity of each patriarch in their order: when he comes to the third patriarch, he declares "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise, thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; thy father's children shall bow down before thee . . . . The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, for Shiloh (i. e. Messiah) shall come and unto him shall be the gathering of the people." Is we see anything like a condition here? No, indeed; it is to unto us shall. It is sure, and will and shall come to pass. Observe the promises to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and I ask if there is anything looks like conditionality there? Notice that to Jacob spoken by the Lord himself from the summit of the angelic ladder reaching up to heaven. Gen. xxviii. 10-15. Does the prophecy or proclamation concerning the establishment of Zion's kingdom Zion's luck will depend in any way upon human contingencies? Can the absolute decrees of God be changed? Examine this Psalm carefully: here are the immutable decrees of Jehovah in regard to setting his king upon his "holy hill of Zion," and what Jehovah declares his son will perform when he gets enthroned there. Psa. ii. I ask is the (Psa. lxxiii.) conditional? where can we find anything in it that partakes of the least coloring in that direction. We find the auxiliary verb shall in forming a future tense twenty-four times in it but if is not found there once. I may hear one say this Psalm had its fulfillment in Solomon, yea it, or part of it had a primary accomplishment in him and that is the most can be said of it there. It is a prediction of Christ's millennial kingdoms and reign when Israel and the surviving nations shall be gathered and abide under his mild and peaceful reign.

The prophecy in Isa. ii. 1-5 contains a most glowing prediction "concerning Judah and Jerusalem" in the latter days. I am well aware how this prediction is spiritualized and applied to the Gentile churches; and I regret that it should be so figured away by those who claim to contend for the primitive faith and the literal interpretation of the word. The parallel passage in Micah iv. 1-4, does not afford any warrant to give it a figurative sense, as the connection would prove, the last two verses of Micah iii. we find speak of Zion and Jerusalem that should be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem made heaps. This surely means literal Zion and Jerusalem, which prediction was verified. Now by what right, I ask, should we change the principle of interpretation when we come to the Zion and Jerusalem in the few following verses of the next chapter? Surely anyone with open eyes must see that it is the very same Zion and Jerusalem spoken of in the former chapter. The prophecy in Isa. lxv. 17-25, concerning the rebuilding or restoration of Jerusalem and the reinstatement of Israel in permanent habitations has not the least shade of condition about it, whatever, but it contains positive statements of what God declares he will do. These few verses which are so rich in precious promises, are no less interspersed with the personal pronoun I and the auxiliary verb shall. The prophecy is absolute and expresses the fixed and unalterable will and purpose of the Most High, in so many words I will and they shall. In the first three verses we have the "I" repeated four times from the nineteenth verse to the end, we have the word "shall" repeated thirteen times, but "if" is not found once in the entire prophecy. We may feel assured that this is the Sovereign word of God, and will certainly be accomplished in its time, and so with the following chapter.

Passing over many statements in Jeremiah that have more of an individual than national character, we come to chapter xxiii. 1-8, here we have the absolute word again: God declaring what he designs to do in reference to the ingathering of Israel in the latter days when the "righteous branch shall reign and prosper," etc; "in whose days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely," etc. We find the Lord does not consult the wishes of men here, what they think about this scheme, whether they approve or disapprove of his plan. Oh, no; but he tells us what he intends to do, and we may rest assured he will fill out the word of his promise without the shadow of a condition in the case. Chapter xxx. to end, we have another absolute promise, "For I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord; because they called thee an outcast, saying this is Zion, whom no man seeketh after." It would seem as if God was displeased with those who undervalue his people Israel and now, for this cause among others, he will exhibit his love [illegible] the sight of their enemies. [illegible] the earth [illegible] I have mercy [illegible] the Jews [illegible] her own [illegible] shall return [illegible] etc. [illegible] captivity [illegible] shall [illegible] will make [illegible] will [illegible] gather [illegible] and [illegible] I will [illegible] pledge [illegible] them in again, even [illegible] from whence they were driven [illegible] his people return [illegible] Judah and Israel, and see if he has [illegible] conditional; and as the case [illegible] such a condition as this.

The RESTITUTION of which [illegible] to be a new [illegible] Ezek. xx. 34. Here Jehovah is represented [illegible] saying, "Though I have cast them off, have scattered them, yet [illegible] I will gather them, [illegible] from the land of Israel, and take away all their abominations, and [illegible] and a new spirit," give them a heart of flesh. Mark you they are to be gathered as a nation; for we do not wish to be understood that in this gathering there is involved the salvation of the entire nation. No; quite the contrary, and bringing again their captivity, and salvation from sin and death, are two different things. We must not confound them, but keep up the distinction, and this idea is thrown out in verse 38, "But as for them whose heart walketh after the heart of the detestable things and their abominations, I will recompense their way upon their own heads, saith the Lord God." I am certain we read in Rom. xi. 26, "And so all Israel shall be saved;" but that does not mean the whole nation who shall look upon him the Messiah, whom they have pierced, and mourn as for their only son, (Zech. xii. 10) and with penitential tears bitterly weep over the turpitude of their past lives, and at the thought of the iniquities and wrongs they had heaped (though blindly so to a great extent Rom. xi. 25,) upon their true Messiah. This idea agrees fully with the prophecy of Ezek. xx. concerning them where we learn they are to be brought out from among the heathen with a high hand and an outstretched arm, and are to pass through a trying ordeal when God will plead with them face to face, and all the rebels are to be purged out with a "flaming flame." Here again we have no "if's" or "ands" but a profusion of I's, wills and shalls, which gives a sovereign zeal of God to the entire prophecy, and leaves no room for doubt or uncertainty as regards its perfect and final accomplishment when the auspicious day of his power shall come,—that day when people shall be willing (Psa. cx. 3.), when they shall be as clay in the potter's hands. There is something at the close of this prophecy that I wish to call particular attention to. It seems to have been anticipated that this prophecy would be tampered with or all figured away as the prophet so expresses his fears thus: "Then said I to the Lord God; they say of me, Doth he not speak parables."

In chapter xxviii. 24-26, we have a continuation of the infallible word of God, what he intends to do concerning Israel in the latter days. In chapter xxxiv. 8-31, we have another prophecy in relation to the house of Israel. Here we have the personal pronoun "I" repeated twenty-seven times used in connection "for I live" "I will both search out my sheep," "I will bring them from out the people, "I will feed them in a good pasture," "I will seek that which was lost," "I will set up one shepherd over them," "I the Lord will be their God," "I will make with them a covenant of peace," "I will make them and the places round about my hill (of Zion) a blessing and will cause the showers to come down," etc., "I will raise up for them a plant of renown." "Thus shall they know that I, Lord God, am with them," etc. In chapter xxxv. God is represented as severely rebuking the enemies of Israel, and because of their rejoicing over their downfall and the desolations of the "mountains of Israel." "Therefore as I live, saith the Lord God, (this is an expression only used when the blessed God is determined upon the accomplishment of any particular thing he has in view, something that he has resolved his soul delighteth in, that it shall be done) I will even do [illegible] according to [illegible] which thou hast used out of thy hatred against them: and I will make myself known among them, when I have judged thee, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord. [illegible] I have heard all thy blasphemies which thou hast spoken against the mountains of Israel, saying, [illegible] they are laid desolate, they are given us to consume. Thus with your mouth ye have boasted against me and have multiplied your words against me: I have heard them. Thus saith the Lord, when the whole earth rejoiceth, I will make thee desolate." [illegible] concerning the restoration of Israel, and also the house of Israel, Jehovah here, by the mouth of his holy seer, is represented [illegible] concerning the mountains of Israel, which are [illegible] desolate. Here the enemies of God's people and of his land are admonished again to beware how they harass his people, and speak reckly of the land. "Therefore, thus saith the Lord God; I have lifted up mine hand, surely the heathen that are round about you, they shall bear their shame. But ye mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people Israel; for they are at hand to come. For behold, I am for you, and I will turn unto you, and ye shall be tilled and sown: and will multiply men upon you and the house of Israel even all of it; and the cities shall be inhabited and the wastes shall be builded, and I will multiply upon you man and beast." . . . . Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God; I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for mine holy name's sake," etc., compare Rom. xi. 27-29. We have in this chapter thirty-six I's stating what God will do, and not one if that we can find. There is nothing that intimates condition here in the least; the whole entire prophecy is characterized with the idea of sovereign power; with a word that has gone forth and will not return unto God void in accomplishing that for what it was sent. Isa. lv. 11.

Whatever terms may be employed in reference to God's dealings with Judah and Israel, and however frequently ifs and other terms of like import may be used to distinguish certain conditions upon which their salvation depends, all through their intermediate state of Gentile supremacy there is one thing certain, these prophecies which we have cited are in no way suspended upon the pivot of an if, or the hinge of a condition, they are among that class of positive declarations of Jehovah, and he has pledged himself to fulfill them. Amen. There is a large number of prophecies of the same character contained in the minor prophets, that for instance in Hosea ii. where Israel is represented as the divorced wife, or one that has left her husband, and gone and played the harlot, and after awhile returning to her "first husband;" and the Lord is said to allure in order to accomplish this, and betrothing her unto him in righteousness; judgment, loving kindness, mercy, faithfulness, etc. The last chapter is beautiful on this point of their return by divine power, so the last point of Joel's prophecy; so with the last part of they prophecy of Amos; so with Obadiah; so with Micah. "Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgressions of the remnant of his heritage? he retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy. He will turn again; he will have compassion on us; (i. e. Israel, for here the prophet is speaking of Israel and of his assurance of what Jehovah will do;) he will subdue our iniquities; and thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea. (Compare Jer. l. 19, 20.) Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, which thou hast sworn unto our fathers from the days of old." Zephaniah in the last part of his prophecy, also sweetly accords with the above,—"Behold at that time I will undo all that afflict thee; and I will save her that halteth, and will gather her that was driven out and I will get them praise (or set them for a praise, margin) and fame in every land where they have been put to shame (or of their shame;) at that time will I bring you again, even in the time that I gather you; for I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth, when I turn back your captivity before your eyes, saith the Lord." Haggai speaks of the glory of the latter house exceeding the glory of the former house: The glory of the latter house we conceive to be Ezekiel's temple which he so minutely describes in his prophecies, with which Israel is so intimately connected in the restoration. We call particular attention to Zechariah which is so full of this sentiment; so full of the divine sovereignty indicative of Jehovah. We dare not quote for want of space.

Malachi we shall pass over with the exception of saying that here the Messiah, Lord promises to send Elijah the prophet as one of the mighty agencies by which he is to accomplish these sublime and merciful purposes contained in these prophecies to which we have referred. Elijah must come then, and fulfill the work assigned him in the divine scheme indicated in the last verse of this prophecy, that is of restoring and bringing back the lost tribes of Israel, and uniting the two houses in one, and aiding and furthering the final accomplishment of the glorious restitution of all things.

Some may think that this article is somewhat tinctured with the doctrine of election, or predestination; well, let me say once for all I am neither an Arminian nor a Calvinist in the popular acceptation, or popular significance of those terms, but I do believe in the doctrine of free exercise of sovereign grace; I do believe, to a limited extent, in the doctrine of election, in the exercise of the power of the restraining, controlling, and directing grace of God; and hold firmly to the belief of this; and were it not for the exercise of the divine sovereignty toward the race, there would not be, nor would not have been any certainty as to anything that has already come to pass; and what is declared will yet come to pass as spoken of in the word. Yes, to my mind, were it not for this immutable Rock of Ages, all things would have gone to ruin and wreck. We should have had no Savior, no gospel, no church, but the human family would have gone down, sunk beneath the shades of one long oblivious night.

I understand that God's love is from everlasting to everlasting. (Jer. xxxi. 1-6.) that he is a God that does not change, therefore the sons of Jacob are not consumed. Mal. iii. 6. That whom Jesus loved, he loved unto the end. John xiii. 1. For one I am glad it is so, for were it not, there would be reason for me to doubt whether I should be here to-day penning these lines to the praise of God's glory for the exercise of his sovereign power, all of which I humbly submit by his grace.

The Famine in China.

The telegram from Shanghai calls attention to a state of distress concerning which there can be no more doubt than if we could see the starving with our own eyes. The telegraphic reports are confined to the accounts of journeys, made in the autumn, into the famine region, brought by Shanghai newspapers. Even then, after the harvest, and before winter set in, there was the beginning of suffering and death for want of food. Here are a few quotations from one account: "This extended tour, 700 miles, revealing the fact of a vast deal of suffering in (the provinces) Chihli, Shansi, Honan, and Northern Shantung. Multitudes are now on the verge of starvation, many have already died, while multitudes have not half enough to carry them through the winter. Men heretofore well-to-do, having several acres of land, and six, eight or ten rooms in their house, have, in multitudes of cases, torn down and sold all the wood—doors, windows, rafters, etc.,—of all the rooms save one, for a mere trifle to get a little money with which to buy food. It was made manifest, too, how easily and to what a terrible degree, drought may effect the north of China, and bring suffering and death to thousands of its inhabitants."

Of one district it is said: "This year there was absolutely no harvest, and the crop had been very small the two preceding years. Well-to-do farmers and mechanics have been reduced to beggary. Hundreds are leaving the province daily in search of food. Women and girls are being sold for a trifling sum, and thus hundreds of families are being broken up and scattered. From the harvest at Linching it soon fell to three-tenths, two-tenths, one-tenth of a crop; and chaff, the leaves of the sweet potato, the pear and apricot tree, were saved with great care, and mixed with the grain for food."

Of another district: "The yield of the year varied from nothing to 'four-tenths' of a crop. Said one old man: 'It is difficult to get food now; what are we to do when winter comes?' Many houses have already some inmates dead of hunger. I personally entered one hundred and twenty houses in six or seven villages. The scenes were heartrending, yet borne with a patient cheerfulness that fairly astonished me."

Joint Discussion

As many may feel interested and desire to attend I will announce through THE RESTITUTION, that beginning on Monday, April 8th, at Irving, Iowa, the Methodist Episcopal pastor here and myself have agreed to discuss before the public the following propositions, either in person or by substitutes:

POETRY.

His Coming.

"At even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning."

"It may be in the evening,
When the work of the day is done,
And you have time to sit in the twilight
And watch the sinking sun,
While the long, bright day dies slowly
Over the sea,
And the hour grows quiet and holy
With thoughts of Me.
While you hear the village children
Passing along the street,
Among the throngs footsteps
May come the sound of my feet;
Therefore I tell you, Watch!
By the light of the evening star,
When the room is growing dusky
As the clouds mar;
Let the door be on the latch
In your house,
For it may be through the gloaming
I will come.

"It may be when the midnight
Is heavy upon the land,
And the black waves lying dumbly
Along the sand;
When the moonless night draws close,
And the lights are out in the house;
When the fire burns low and red,
And the watch is ticking loudly
Beside the bed;
Though on -lerp, tired out on your couch,
Still your heart must wake and watch
In the dark room,
For it may be that at midnight
I may come.

"It may be at the cock-crow,
When the night is dying slowly
In the sky,
And the sea looks calm and holy Waiting for the dawn of the golden sun
Which draweth nigh;
When the mists are on the valley, shading
The rivers chill,
And the morning star is fading, fading
Over the hill;
Behold, I say unto you, Watch!
Let the door be on the latch
In your house;
In the hall before the dawning,
Between the night and morning,
I may come.

"It may be in the morning,
When the sun is bright and strong,
And the dew is glittering sharply
Over the little lawn;
When the waves are laughing loudly
Along the shore,
And the little birds are singing sweetly
About the door;
With the long day's work before you,
You rise up with the sun,
And the neighbors come in to talk a little
Of all that must be done;—
But remember that I may be the next
To come in at the door,
To call you from all your busy work
Forevermore.
As you work, your heart must watch,
For the door is on the latch
In your room,
And it may be in the morning
I will come."

So He passed down my cottage garden,
By the path that leads to the sea,
Till He came to the turn of the little road,
Where the birch and the laburnum tree
Lean over and arch the way;
There I saw him a moment stay,
And turn once more to me,
As I knelt at the cottage door,
And lift up His hands in blessing;—
Then I saw His face no more.
And I stood still in the door way,
Leaning against the wall,
Not heeding the fair white roses,
Though I crushed them and let them fall;
Only looking down the path way,——
And looking toward the sea,
And wondering and wondering
When He would come back for me,
Till I was aware of the angel
Who was going swiftly by
With the gladness of one who goeth
In the light of God Most High.
He neared the gate of the cottage
Towards the garden gate;
I suppose he had come down
By the setting of the sun
To consult it some one in the village
Whose dwelling was desolate.
And he passed before the door
Beside my place;
And the silence of a smile
Was on his face;
"Weep not," he said, "for unto you is given
To watch for the coming of His feet
Who is the glory of our blessed Heaven;
The work and watching will be very sweet
Even in an earthly home,
And in such an hour as ye think not
He will come."

So I am waiting quietly
Every day;
Who never the sun shines brightly,
I rise and say:
"Surely, it is the shining of His face!"
And look into the gates of His high place
Beyond the sea;
For I know He is coming shortly
To summon me;
And when a shadow falls across the window
Of my room
Where I am working my appointed task,
I lift my head to watch the door, and ask
If He I come!
And the angel answers sweetly
In my home:
"Only a few more shadows,
And He will come."

ST LECTIONS.

The Election of a Pope—The Conclave—Interesting Details of the Ceremonies.

To elect a Pope the Cardinals enter the conclave, which, in pursuance to a decree of Pope Gregory X., of the year 1271, they are not allowed to leave until after their choice has been made. The conclave occupies a large space, beginning at the Tribune of St. Peter's Church, where the Pope gives his benediction, and extending through the whole first story of the Vatican Palace. To each Cardinal a cell is assigned, with a few rooms for his retinue. The conclave is provided with eight dumb-waiters (ruote), such as we commonly meet with in convents, by means of which victuals and other necessaries are introduced. The food is always ostensibly "visited," lest collieis should occasionally be smuggled in. Nevertheless, the Ambassadors and many others know accurately what is going on in the conclave. The dumb-waiters are guarded by the most distinguished prelates, such as the chierici de camera and the conservators of the city. Besides these dumb-waiters, there is a window in the main door through which foreign Ambassadors receive audience, but they cannot look in, the curtain being down.

Ten days after the Pope's death the Cardinals go into conclave, the Maggior duomo of the deceased, who always becomes the Governor of the conclave, taking possession of his room in front of the conclave at the head of the staircase, and stationing his guards. The Marshal of the Conclave, an office hereditary in the family of Chigi, has his apartment not far distant, and he opens the conclave whenever anybody is to be let out or admitted. He has his guard at the stairs below, while the remaining Papal guards occupy the other approaches to the Vatican. The Cardinals hold their entrance very solemnly, and are accompanied by the carriages of all their acquaintances. On entering the conclave the Cardinals repair first to St. Peter's, where the Mass of the Holy Ghost is said, and thence they go in double file, followed by the conclavists (servants, etc.), singing the hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus," to the Pauline Chapel of the Vatican, where the Papal bulls prescribing the rules for their conduct, and in one of which they are designated as "Infallibiles aterne sapientie consultores," are read to them. They have to swear to these, and the Cardinal Deacon admonishes them, in a short address, to make the best choice according to their conscience. Thereupon the Cardinals receive the visits of the aristocracy, the prelates, ambassadors and their acquaintance, and toward evening, when everything not remaining in the conclave is gone, a signal is given with a bell to close the same, whereupon the Cardinal Camerlengo, with three others—called capi d' ordine—makes his round, inspecting everything lest anything should remain open or aught not belonging there should remain in the conclave.

Each Cardinal retains with him one or two conclavists and one valet de chambre. Besides these there remain in the conclave the Master of Ceremonies, the Secretary of the Conclave, one confessor, a few sacristans, two physicians, one surgeon, one apothecary, four barbers, one mason, one joiner, and some thirty waiters. An instrument is drawn up by a notary concerning all the persons and the nature of the four locks. Then follows an accurate description of the proceedings during the scrutinium. Petruccelli della Gattina, in his "Histoire Diplomatique des Conclaves," Part I., p. 38, gives accurate information concerning the act of election itself, which is regulated by a bull of Gregory XV. According to this bull the election may be held in one of three forms, viz., either in that of compromise, or of quasi-inspiration, or of the scrutinium. That of compromise was employed in former times, in case no agreement was reached by the Cardinals respecting a choice. The right might then be conferred upon a certain Cardinal to name the Pope. If we are not mistaken, this mode was resorted to last time at the election of John XXII. He had been elected at his own instance, and especially upon the recommendation of Cardinal Napoleon Orsini, to designate a Pope. To the no little astonishment of the Sacred College he nominated himself, saying: "Papa ego."

The mode of election by quasi-inspiration takes place when at least two-thirds of the assembled Cardinals go up to that one of their colleagues upon whose choice they have agreed, without a preceding scrutinium in order, after "adering" him (i. e., kissing his hand, feet, breast and forehead), to proclaim him Pope. The scrutinium is the usual form which has latterly been employed exclusively. This mode of election is described in its minutest details in the bulls of Gregory XV. and of Urban VIII. The election takes place in Pauline Chapel, after mass has been heard, and was formerly public. Now it is secret, by ballot, and is repeated until one of the candidates has received two-thirds of the votes. The Pope elect is apprised of the result by the Cardinal Deacon, whereupon he, after declaring his purpose to accept, in the first place chooses the name which, as Pope, he intends to bear. He then exchanges his attire as Cardinal for the Papal robe, ascends the throne and bestows the benediction upon the Cardinals, who kiss his hand. The ceremony ends by the Cardinal Camerlengo's placing upon his finger the ring of the fisherman, which he then hands to the Master of Ceremonies that his new name may be engraved upon it. Meanwhile the Cardinal Deacon, accompanied by a Master of Ceremonies, repairs to the great balcony over the main entrance to St. Peter's, which was walled up at the beginning of the conclave, orders it to be opened, publicly announces the election (Papam habemus), as well as the name of the Pope, and throws a slip of paper, upon which the name is written, among the multitude. At the same time the cannons in the Castle St. Angelo are fired, the soldiers on parade in the piazza of St. Peter's fire a salute, and all the bells in the city ring.

Rome and the Catholic world have a Pope again. During the first week, however, until the time of his consecration and coronation, the new Pope performs no public functions, and although he already actually governs, he does not yet issue bulls under the leaden seal, but only briefs sealed with the fisherman's ring. The ceremonial observed at the coronation is regulated with Byzantine circumstantiality. The solemnity culminates at the moment when the Pope, after having celebrated mass and received holy communion, mounts the throne on the great balcony over the main entrance of St. Peter's Church, in view of the whole people, and is crowned by the Cardinal Deacon with the triple crown. The latter addresses the Pope in these words: "Receive the tiara crowned with three crowns and know that thou art the father of Princes and Kings, the ruler of the universe, on earth the Vicar of our Savior Jesus Christ, to whom be honor and glory world without end. Amen."—Evening Journal.

Endless Misery, Etc.

There are two passages of holy writ that are specially relied on, in the present wide-spread discussion of future punishment, to bolster up the falling theory of endless misery. Let us consider them and see whether they really teach that doctrine. "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" "For the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and then he shall reward every man according to his works. (Matt. xvi. 20, 27.) This passage teaches,

1. That there will be no reward of good or evil till the coming of the Son of Man in his glory."

2. The loss of the soul is explained in a parallel passage in Luke (ix. 25), "For what is a man advantaged if he gain the whole world and lose himself or be cast away?" If a man loses himself he loses his life or being.

3. The passage, most certainly, should have been translated "lose his life," instead of soul. The verse next before reads, "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it."

The Greek word pseuche translated life in this verse, as every scholar knows, is translated soul twice in the next verse. It is perfectly incredible that Jesus should begin to talk about losing or saving life and suddenly break off to speak of something entirely different, namely an immortal soul. All must agree that the word pseuche should be translated uniformly in the same discourse, either life or soul. Try soul: "Whosoever shall save his soul, shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his soul shall save it." Please tell us, ye learned doctors, how a man can save his soul and lose it, or lose his soul and save it at the same time? Translate the original word life throughout, and it makes good sense, and that sense is clear that those who dare to give up the present life for Christ's sake will receive in exchange the future eternal life promised in the gospel. The question then stands thus: How much will it profit a man to gain the whole world, if he fall of eternal life? Or, what can a man give in exchange for that life if once lost? It is the possession of the world on one hand and eternal death; on the other hand, sacrifice and death, if necessary for Christ, and eternal life hereafter.

The Presbyterian, Dr. Macknight, translates pseuche life instead of soul throughout the passage, and Dr. Clarke says it should be. Hence the doctrine of endless pain of an immortal soul has no support from this scripture. The other passage is found in Matt. xxviii: "Fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." (Gehenna). Do these words mean the exact opposite of what they seem to teach, viz the literal destruction of both soul and body in the fire of Gehenna. Does destroy mean preserve wicked men in that fire—or "burn them up, root and branch?" Whatever soul means in the passage, it is destructible, as well as the body. Indeed, we never read of an "immortal soul" in the Bible, and surely God will not give the wicked immortal bodies on purpose to have them tormented forever! We are told that those only who seek for immortality, by patient well doing, shall put it on at the resurrection, while those "who sow to the flesh shall reap corruption"—and the "second death." The Greek word psuche here rendered soul, is translated life in the same chapter. "He that findeth his life (by denying me) shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake, shall find it;" i. e., he shall find the future eternal life which will be beyond the reach of persecution and death. But the resurrected bodies of the unjust will be mortal (as was Lazarus and others already raised by the Life Giver), and God, unless they fear him, may destroy that future life and body by means of literal fire. That eternal death may be preceded by shame, suffering and waiting, but the suffering will not be endless but terminate in death. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23.—E. Hoyt in Grand Rapids Daily Times.

The Latest Ballot.

NEW YORK, February 20.—A dispatch from Rome says the operations of the Sacred Conclave culminated in the ballot taken this morning, between 10 and 11 o'clock, in the election of Cardinal Joachim Pecci, who assumes the title of Pope Leo XIII.

The conclave has been in session since Monday evening, and, as only two ballots daily have been taken, Cardinal Pecci was chosen on the third ballot. The Moderates hesitated between Cardinals Franchi and Pecci, but conflicting elements became harmonized and the result was the election of the latter.

Cardinal Joachim Pecci, an Italian, has been elected by the Conclave of Cardinals in Rome as the successor of Pope Pius IX., whose appointee he was as Camerlengo, or High Chamberlain of the Vatican, and who, it is understood, had, before his death, privately expressed a preference for him for the Pontifical succession.

Pecci is sixty-eight years of age, and is a native of Carpenetto, in the Diocese of Arragul. He was created a Cardinal December 19, 1853, and, in addition to being Camerlengo, was the Archbishop of Perugia. Pope Pius had great confidence in him, and Antonelli, the late Papal Premier, was exceedingly jealous of him, and dreaded his influence in the Vatican.

Pecci is described as "a man of power—cool, deep, with a keen insight into character, stern and resolute, and always noted for his influence over others. It was for this latter trait that Antonelli dreaded him at Rome, well knowing that he would, if anybody could, undermine his authority and sap his influence with the Pope." He is what in Papal politics is called a "Moderate," being in this respect like his illustrious predecessor.

Of high intellect, of a well-tried and energetic nature, Pecci made not only an excellent Bishop, but realized the type of a perfect Cardinal. As an administrator he managed to clear Benevento of smuggling and brigandage, as well as of the underhand intrigues of the party of the nobility. As a man of intelligence, he does not regard with such a pessimist eye as his colleagues the reciprocal sensations of the church and society. He has evidently found a solution in his own mind for existing and eventual difficulties. His position as Camerlengo was not deemed favorable to his chances of election to the Papal throne, but he occupied it so short a time that he has not had time to create any jealousies or enmities.

The new Pope is described as "tall and thin. His features have an aristocratic stamp, and are characterized by great finesse. He has a resemblance at once to Voltaire and Richelieu. The voice strikes one disagreeably at first. It is so nasal in its tones, but one soon gets accustomed to this peculiarity, owing to its fullness and resonance. Although simple in manner, he is of all the Cardinals the one who carries himself with most Pontifical majesty, resembling in this Pius IX., who, in his early days passed for incomparable."

Pecci will be the 258th Pope of the Church of Rome. He will assume the title of Leo XIII.—Evening Journal.

Wild Men.

In the island of Rio there are wild men who live in trees, and have no language but cries; and in Sumatra, the residents of Palembang said there were men who lived in the forests, with whom not only the European, but the Malays, could have no intercourse. He himself had never seen one. Yet, strange to say, they have a petty traffic with the outer world, yet not through the medium of speech. They live in the woods and live by the chase. They hunt tigers, not with the gun, but with arrows, which they blow out of a tube with such force, and which are so keen of point, and touched with such deadly poison, that a wound is almost immediately fatal.

These tiger skins or elephant tusks they bring for barter—not for sale—for they never sell anything for money is about the most useless thing they can have. They cannot eat it or drink it or wear it. But as they have wants they exchange; yet they themselves are never seen. They bring what they have to the edge of the forest, and leave it there, and the Malays come and place what they have to dispose of and retire. If the offer is satisfactory, when they return again they find what they brought gone, and take what is left and depart. If not, they add a few trifles more to tempt the eyes of these wild men of the woods, and so at last the exchange is effected, yet all the while the sellers keep themselves invisible.—Chicago Evening Journal.

SENTENTIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The mountains which faith would remove will crush beneath their resistless weight the soul of unbelief.

With love, the heart becomes a fair and fertile garden, glowing with sunshine and warm hues, and exhaling sweet odors.

I cannot find what good we get by the amusements which are only calculated to kill time, when we are directed to redeem it.

The chief properties of wisdom are to be mindful of things past, careful of things present, and provident of things to come.

Aloft, on the throne of God, and not below, in the footprints of a trampling multitude, are the sacred rules of right, which no majorities can displace or overturn.

We should act with as much energy as those who expect everything from themselves; and we should pray with as much earnestness as those who expect everything from God.

Let bygones be bygones; if bygones were clouded
By aught that occasioned a pang of regret,
Oh, let them in darkest oblivion be shrouded;
'Tis wise and 'tis kind to forgive and forget.

What a lesson the word diligence contains! How profitable is it for every one of us to be reminded—as we are reminded when we make ourselves aware of its derivation from diligo, to love—that the only secret of true industry in our work is love of that work.

False religions creeds are, in the beginning, like despised weeds which are blown about and inclined by every wind, but in time they become trees of stately growth, under which nations repose, and and the shade of which often casts a deadly influence around.

If the world 's a vale of tears,
Smile till rainbows span it;
Breath the love that life endears,
Clear of clouds to fan it,
Of your goodness lend a gleam
Unto souls that shiver;
Show them how dark sorrow's stream
Blends with hope's bright river.

How many take a wrong view of life, and waste their energies and destroy their nervous system in endeavoring to accumulate wealth, without thinking of the present happiness they are throwing away. It is not wealth or high station which makes a man happy. Many of the most wretched beings on earth have both, but it is a radiant, sunny spirit, which knows how to bear little trials and enjoy comforts, and thus extract happiness from every incident in life.

Duty is duty, and if you are not faithful in that which is least, would you be so in that which is greater? If you owe but a single dollar, are you not as much bound to pay this, as you would be bound to pay if you owed a hundred dollars or more? Allow that your position, in life or church, is the most humble; you are as fully bound to discharge the duties of that position as you would be those of one far higher, and having far more depending upon it.—The Pastor's Gift.

Truth will never die; the stars will grow dim, the sun will pale his glory; but truth will be ever young; integrity, uprightness, honesty, love, goodness—these are all imperishable. No grave can ever entomb these immortal principles. They have been in prison, but they have been freer than before; those who have enshrined them in their hearts have been burned at the stake; but out of their ashes other witnesses have arisen. No sea can drown, no storm can wreck, no abyss can swallow up the ever-living truth of God. You cannot kill goodness, and truth, and integrity, and faith, and holiness; the way that is consistent with these must be a way everlasting.—Spurgeon.

Particulars of the last moments of Victor Emanuel are minutely described. The King met death with the simplicity of a brave man who has striven to do his duty. He had a private colloquy with his eldest son, now King of Italy, which must have tried his failing forces. He took a calm farewell of all those officers of his household and other personages who happened to be within the palace at the time. His eyes never lost their clear, candid look until they closed in death. Prof. Scipione Vannutelli, one of the most distinguished painters in Rome, was sent for by Prince Humbert to paint the dead King's face as it lay peacefully on the pillow where he died.

The Bishop of the African Methodist church of Louisiana recommends that every elder, deacon, and preacher in that conference district shall use his utmost endeavors among the people in their various charges to discountenance the idea of emigration to Liberia, and urge upon them the urgent necessity of remaining in this country, to till the soil, cultivate feelings of friendship with their former owners, and attend to the mental and spiritual education of their progeny.

BREVITIES.

The simultaneous release of many bad characters consequent upon the Royal Amnesty of minor offenders causes considerable uneasiness in Italian cities.

The Mormons are building a magnificent temple on the summit of a high mountain in Manti, Utah. Five hundred men are at work on it, and it will not be completed for four years.

A number of Whitehead, or fish torpedoes have been shipped from England to the Mediterranean. The tests in the canal at Woolwich show that each one may be depended on to make a straight run of at least half a mile.

The King of Italy is said to have made but one alteration in the Minister's draft of his accession proclamation. In the sentence, "Italians, your first King is dead. His successor must prove that institutions do not die," the King, it is said, at his wife's suggestion, substituted "will" for "must."

England's representative at the funeral of Victor Emanuel was the Earl of Roden, a grandson of Lord Palmerston. His mother, Viscountess Jocelyn, was long a lady-in-waiting, a special favorite of the Queen. France was represented by Marshal Canrobert, and Austria by the Archduke Regnier.
